THE

PREFACE

TO THE

HISTORICAL BOOKS.

THIS methodized and practical exposition of the Historical Books ventures abroad, with fear and trembling, in the same plain and homely dress with the former, on the Pentateuch: omni res jam negat, contenta docet. The subject requires no ornament, to have it apprehended is all. But I trust, through grace, it proceeds from the same honest design, that is, to promote the knowledge of the scripture, in order to the reforming of men's hearts and lives. If I may but be instrumental to make my readers wise and good, wiser and better, more watchful against sin, and more careful of their duty both to God and man, and, in order to that, more in love with the word and law of God, I have all I desire, all I aim at. May he that ministreth seed to the sower, multiply the seed sown, by increasing the fruits of righteousness, 2 Cor. 9. 10.

It is the history of the Jewish Church and Nation, from their first settlement in the promised land, after their four hundred and thirty years' bondage in Egypt, and their forty years' wandering in the wilderness, to their re-settlement there, after their seventy years' captivity in Babylon—from Joshua to Nehemiah. The five books of Moses were taken up more with their laws, institutes, and charters; but after these, more purely historical, and in that way of writing, a great deal of very valuable learning and wisdom has been conveyed from one generation to another.

The chronology of this history, and the ascertaining of the times when the several events contained in it, happened, would very much illustrate the history, and add to the brightness of it; it is therefore well worthy the search of the curious and ingenious, and they may find both pleasure and profit in pursuing the labours of many learned men who have directed their studies that way. I confess I could willingly have entertained myself and reader, in this preface, with a calculation of the times through which this history passes: but I consider, that such a babe in knowledge as I am, could not pretend either to add to, or correct what has been done by so many great writers, much less to decide the controversies that have been agitated among them. I had indeed some thoughts of consulting my worthy and ever-honoured friend Mr. Tallaents of Shrewsbury, the learned author of the View of Universal History, and to have begged some advice and assistance from him in methodizing the contents of this history; but in the very week in which I put my last hand to this part, it pleased God to put an end to his useful life, (and useful it was to the last,) and to call him to his rest in the eighty-ninth year of his age: so that purpose was broken off, that thought of my heart. But that elaborate performance of his, commonly called his Chronological Tables, gives great light to this, as indeed to all other parts of history. And Dr. Lightfoot's Chronology of the Old Testament, and Mr. Cradock's History of the Old Testament, methodized, may also be of great use to such readers as I write for.

As to the particular chronological difficulties which occur in the thread of this history, I have not been large upon them; because many times I could not satisfy myself; and how then could I satisfy my reader concerning them? I have not indeed met with any difficulties so great, but that solutions might be given of them, which are sufficient to silence the atheists and anticriturists, and roll away from the sacred records all the reproach of contradiction and inconsistency with themselves; for to do that, it is enough to show that the difference may be accommodated either this way or that, when at the same time one cannot satisfy one's self which way is the right.

But it is well that these are things about which we may very safely and very comfortably be ignorant and unresolved. What concerns our salvation, is plain enough, and we need not perplex ourselves about the niceties of chronology, genealogy, or chorography. At least, my undertaking leads me not into those labyrinths. What is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, is what I intend to observe; and I would endeavour to open what is dark and hard to be understood, only in order to that. Every author must be taken in his way of writing; the sacred penmen, as they have not left us formal systems, so they have not left us formal annals, but useful narratives of things proper for our direction in the way of duty, which some great judges of common writers have thought to be the most pleasant and profitable histories, and most likely to answer the end. The works of the Prophet, Habakkuk; Ezekiel; Malachi; Obadiah, 'Isaius exercet; (Aug. in Joh. Tract. 45.) as one of the Ancients expresses it, that is, it has enough in it that is easy, to nourish the meanest to life eternal, yet enough that is difficult, to try the industry and humility of the greatest.

There are several things which should recommend this part of sacred writ to our diligent and constant search.

I. That it is history; and therefore entertaining and very pleasant, edifying, and very serviceable to the conduct of human life. It gratifies the inquisitive with the knowledge of that which the most intense speculation could not discover any other way. By a retirement into ourselves, and a serious contemplation of the objects we are surrounded with, close reasoning may advance many excellent truths without being beheld to any other. But for the knowledge of past events, we are entirely indebted (and must be so to) the reports and records of others. A notion or hypothesis of a man's own framing may gain him the reputation of a wit, but a history of a man's own framing will lay him under the reprobate of a cheat, any further than it respects that which he himself is an eye of or ear witness of. How much are we indebted then to the divine wisdom and goodness for these writings, which have made things so long since past as familiar to us as any of the occurrences of the age and place we live in!

History is so edifying, that parables and apochopos have been invented to make up the deficiencies of it, for our instruction concerning good and evil; and whatever may be said of other history, we are sure that in this history there is no matter of fact recorded, but what has its use, and will help either to ex-pound God's providence or guide man's prudence.

II. That it is true history, and what we may rely upon the credit of, and need not fear being deceived in. This history, the best known, reckoned _tempus salutis_, that is, which they knew not long ago all, and _tempus pietatis_, that is, the account of which was wholly fabulous, is to us _tempus insipiens_, that is, what we have a most authentic account of. The Greeks were with them the most celebrated historians, and yet their successors in learning and dominion, the Romans, put them into no good name for their credibil-ity, witness that of the poet: _Et quicquid Graecia mendax audet in Historia—All that lying Greece has dared to record_, Suet. Sat. 10. But the history which we have before us, is of undoubted certainty, and no cunningly-devised fable. To be well assured of this is a great satisfaction, especially since we meet with so many things in it truly miraculous, and many more great and marvellous.

III. That it is ancient history, far more ancient than was ever pretended to come from any other hand. Homer, the most ancient genuine heathen writer now entirely extant, is reckoned to have lived at the beginning of the Olympiads, near the time when it is computed that the city of Rome was founded, which was but about the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah. And his writings pretend not to be historical, but poetical fiction all over: rhapso-odies indeed they are, and the very Alcoran of Paganism.

The most ancient authentic historians now extant are Herodotus and Thucydides, who were contemporaries with the latest of our historians, Ezra and Nehemiah, and could not write with any certainty of events much before their own time. The obscurity, deficiency, and uncertainty, of all ancient history, except that which we find in the scripture, is abundantly made out by the learned Bishop Stiling-fleet, and others. It is well known that the first Greek historian, the so-called Thucydides, was no historian at all; or, so far as he wrote, was only a chronicler of the affairs of other nations, except only as they fall in with the affairs of the Jews; for the Lord's portion is his people, _Jacob is the lot of his inheritance_, Deut. 32. 8, 9. Such a concern has God for his church in every age, and so dear have its interests been to him; let them therefore be so to us, that we may be _followers of him as dear children_.

IV. That it is a divine history, given by inspiration of God, and a part of that blessed book which is to be the standing rule of our faith and practice. And we are not to think it a part of it which might have been spared, or which we may now pass over, or cast a careless eye upon, as if it were indifferent whether we read it or no; but we are to read it as a sacred record, preserved for our benefit _on whom the ends of the world are come_.

1. This history is of great use for the understanding of some other parts of the Old Testament. The account we have here of David's life and reign, and especially of his troubles, is a key to many of his Psalms. And much light is given to most of the prophecies by these histories.

2. Though we have not altogether so many types of Christ here, as we had in the history of the law of Moses, yet even here we meet with divers who were figures of Him that was to come, such as Joshua, Samson, Solomon, Cyrus, but especially David, whose kingdom was typical of the kingdom of the Mes-siah and the covenant of royalty made with him, a dark representation of the covenant of redemption made with the eternal Word; nor know we how to call Christ the son of David, unless we be acquainted with this history; nor how to receive it that John Baptist was the Elias that was to come, Matt. 11. 14.

3. The state of the Jewish Church, which is here set before us, was typical of the Gospel Church, and the state of that in the days of the Messiah; and as the _prophecies_ which related to it, looked farther to the latter days, so did the histories of it; and still _these things happened to them for examples_, 1 Cor. 10. 11. By the tenor of this history we are given to understand these three things concerning the church; for the _thing that hath been, is that which shall be_, Eccl. 1. 9. (1.) That we are not to expect the perfect purity and unity of the church in this world, and therefore not to be stumbled, though we are grieved, at its corruptions, distempers, and divisions; not to think it strange concerning them, as though some strange thing happened, much less to think the worse of its laws and constitutions for the sake of them, or to despair of its perpetuity. What wretched stains of idolatry, impiety, and immor-tality, appear on the Jewish Church; and what a woful breach was there between Judah and Ephraim, yet God took them (as I may say) with all their faults, and never wholly rejected them, till they rejected the Messiah. _Israel hath not been forsaken, nor Judah, of her God, though their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel_, Jer. 51. 5. (2.) That we are not to expect the constant tranquillity and prosperity of the church. It was then often oppressed and afflicted from its youth, had its years of servitude, as well as its days of triumph, was often obscure, diminished, impoverished, and brought low; and yet still God secured to himself a remnant, a _holy seed_, which was _the substance_ thereof, Isa. 6. 13. Let us not then be surprised to see the Gospel-Church sometimes under hatches, and even into the wilderness without a crown against it. (3.) That yet we need not fear the utter extermination of it. The Gospel-Church is called, _the Israel of God_, Gal. 6. 16. and the _Jerusalem which is above_, Gal. 4. 26. _the heavenly Jerusalem_, as _for Israel after the flesh_, and the _Jerusalem that was_, by the wonderful care of the divine Providence, outrode all the storms with which they were
1. Tossed and threatened, and continued in being till they were made to resign all their honours to the Gospel-Church, which they were the figures of; so shall that also, notwithstanding all its shocks, be preserved, till the mystery of God shall be finished, and the Kingdom of Grace shall have its perfection in the kingdom of Glory.

2. This history is great use to us for our direction in the way of our duty; it was written for our learning, that we may see the evil we should avoid, and be armed against it, and the good we should do, and be quickened to it. Though they are generally judges, and kings, and great men, whose lives are here written, yet in them, even those of the meanest rank may see the deformity of sin, and hate it, and the beauty of holiness, and be in love with it; nay, the greater the person is, the more evident are both these; for if the great be good, it is their goodness that makes their greatness honourable; if bad, their greatness does but make their badness the more shameful. The failings even of good people are also recorded here for our admonition, that he who thinks he stands, may take heed lest he fall; and that he who has fallen, may not despair of forgiveness, if he recover himself by repentance.

3. This history, as it shows what God requires of us, so it shows what we may expect from his providence, especially concerning states and kingdoms. By the dealings of God with the Jewish nation, it appears that as nations are, so they must expect to fare; that while princes and people serve the interests of God's kingdom among men, he will secure and advance their interests; but that when they shake off his government, and rebel against him, they can look for no other than an inmundation of judgments. It was so all along with Israel; while they kept close to God, they prospered; when they forsook him, every thing went cross. That great man, Archbishop Tillotson, (Vol. I. Serm. 3. on Prov. 14. 34.) suggests, That though as to particular persons, the providences of God are promiscuously administered in this world, because there is another world of rewards and punishments for them, yet it is not so with nations as such, but national virtues are ordinarily rewarded with temporal blessings, and national sins punished with temporal judgments; because, as he says, public bodies and communities of men, as such, can be rewarded and punished only in this world, for in the next they will all be dissolved. So plainly is God's ways of disposing kingdoms laid before us in the glass of this history, that I could wish Christian statesmen would think themselves as much concerned as preachers, to acquaint themselves with it; they might fetch as good maxims of state and rules of policy from this as from the best of the Greek and Roman historians. We are blessed (as the Jews were) with a divine revelation, and make a national profession of religion and relation to God, and therefore are to look upon ourselves as in a peculiar manner under a divine regiments, so that the things which happened to them, were designed for ensamples to us.

I cannot pretend to write for great ones. But if what is here done, may be delightful to any in reading, and helpful in understanding and improving, this sacred history, and governing themselves by the dictates of it, let God have all the glory, and let all the rivers return to the ocean from whence they came. When I look back on what is done, I see nothing to boast of, but a great deal to be ashamed of; and when I look forward on what is to be done, I see nothing in myself to trust to for the doing of it; I have no sufficiency of my own, but by the grace of God, I am what I am, and that grace shall, I trust, be sufficient for me. Surely in the Lord have I righteousness and strength. That blessed 1 Pet. 5. 10, in which the apostle speaks of, Phil. 1. 19. that continual supply or communication of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, is what we may in faith pray for, and depend upon, to furnish us for every good word and work. The pleasantness of the study has drawn me on to the writing of this, and the candour with which my friends have been pleased to receive my poor endeavours on the Pentateuch, encourages me to publish it; it is done according to the best of my skill, without some care and application of mind, in the same method and manner with that; I wish I could have done it in less compass, that it might have been more within the reach of the poor of the flock. But then it would not have been so plain and full as I desire it may be for the benefit of the lambs of the flock; Briefs esse laboro, obscurus fio—Labouring to be obscure.

With an humble submission to the divine providence and its dispositions, and a humble reliance on the divine grace and its conduct and operation, I purpose still to proceed, as I have time, in this work. Two volumes more will, if God permit, conclude the Old Testament; and then, if my friends encourage me, and God spare me, and enable me for it, I intend to go on to the New Testament. For though many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those parts of scripture which are yet before us, (Luke 1. 1.) whose works praise them in the gates, and are likely to outline mine, yet while the subject is really so copious as it is, and the manner of handling it may possibly be so various, and while one book comes into the hands of some, and another into the hands of others, and all concur in the same design to advance the common interests of Christ's kingdom, the common faith once delivered to the saints, and the common salvation of precious souls; (Tit. 1. 4. Jude 3.) I hope store, of this kind, will be thought no sere. I make bold to mention my purpose to proceed thus publicly, in hopes I may have the advice of my friends in it, and their prayers for me, that I may be made more ready and mighty in the scriptures, that understanding and utterance may be given to me, that I may obtain of the Lord Jesus, to be found his faithful servant, who am less than the least of all that call him Master.

EXPOSITION,
WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, UPON THE BOOK OF JOSHUA.

1. We have now before us, the history of the Jewish nation, in this book, and those that follow it to the end of the book of Esther. These books, to the end of the books of the Kings, the Jewish writers call, the first book of the prophets, to bring them within the distribution of the books of the Old Testament, into the law, the prophets, and the Chetubim, or Hagiographa, Luke 24. 44. The rest they make part of the Hagiographa. For though history is their subject, it is justly supposed that prophets were their penmen: to those books that are purely and properly prophetical the name of the prophet is prefixed, because the credibility of the prophecies depended much upon the character of the prophets; but these historical books, it is probable, were collections of the authentic records of the nation, which some of the prophets (the Jewish Church was for many ages more or less continually blessed with such) were divinely directed and helped to put together for the service of the Church to the end of the world; as their other officers, so their Historiographers, had their authority from Heaven.—It should seem that though the substance of the several histories was written when the events were fresh in memory, and written under a divine direction, yet that under the same direction, they were put into the form in which we now have them, by some other hand, long afterward, probably, all by the same hand, or about the same time. The grounds of the conjecture are, 1. Because former writings are so often referred to, as the Book of Jasher, Josh. 10. 13. and 2 Sam. 1. 18. and the Chronicles of the kings of Israel and Judah often; and the books of God, Nathan, and Jiddo. 2. Because the days when the things were done, are spoken of sometimes as days long since passed; as 1 Sam. 9. 9. He that is now called a prophet, was then called a seer. And 3. Because we so often read of things remaining unto this day, as stones, Josh. 4. 9.—7. 26.—8. 29.—10. 27. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Names of places, Josh. 5. 9.—7. 26. Judg. 1. 26.—15. 19.—18. 12. 2 Kings 14. 7. Rights and possessions, Judg. 1. 21. 1 Sam. 27. 6. Customs and usages, 1 Sam. 5. 5. 2 Kings 17. 41. Which clauses have been since added to the history by the inspired collectors, for the confirmation and illustration of it to those of their own age. And if one may offer a mere conjecture, it is not unlikely that the historical books to the end of the Kings were put together by Jeremiah the prophet a little before the captivity, for it is said of Ziklag, 1 Sam. 27. 6. it pertains to the kings of Judah (which style began after Solomon, and ended in the captivity) unto this day: And it is still more probable that those which follow, were put together by Ezra the scribe, some time after the captivity. However, though we are in the dark concerning their authors, we are in no doubt concerning their authority; they were a part of the oracles of God, which were committed to the Jews, and were so received and referred to by our Saviour and the apostles.—In the five books of Moses we had a very full account of the rise, advance, and constitution, of the Old Testament Church, the family out of which it was raised, the promise, that great charter by which it was incorporated, the miracles by which it was built up, and the laws and ordinances by which it was to be governed. From which one would conceive an expectation of its character and state very different from what we find in this history. A nation that had statutes and judgments so righteous, one would think, should have been very holy; and that had promises so rich, should have been very happy. But, alas! a great part of the history is a melancholy representation of their sins and miseries, for the law made nothing perfect; that was to be done by the bringing in of a better hope. And yet if we compare the history of the Christian Church with its constitution, we shall find the same cause for wonder, so many have been its errors and corruptions; for neither does the Gospel make any thing perfect in this world, but leaves us still in the expectation of a better hope in the future state.

II. We have next before us the book of Joshua, so called, perhaps, not because it was written by him, though that be, it is written concerning him, and if any other wrote it, it was collected out of his journals, or memoirs. It contains the history of Israel under the command and government of Joshua, how he presided as general of their armies, 1. In their entrance into Canaan, ch. 1. 5. 2. In their conquest of Canaan, ch. 6. 12. 3. In the distribution of the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel, ch. 13. 21. 4. In the settlement and establishment of religion among them, ch. 22. 24. In all which he was a great example of wisdom, courage, fidelity, and piety, to all that are in places of public trust. But that is not all the use that

Dr. Lightfoot thinks that Phinehas wrote it. Bishop Patrick is clear that Joshua wrote it himself.
JOSHUA, I.

CHAP. I.

The book begins with the history, not of Joshua's life, (many remarkable passages of that we had before in the books of Moses,) but of his reign and government. In this chapter, I. God appoints him in the stead of Moses, gives him an ample commission, full instructions, great encouragements, v. 1-6. II. He accepts the government, and addresses himself immediately to the business of it, giving orders to the officers of the people in general, v. 16, 11. And particularly to the two tribes and a half, v. 12-15. III. The people agree to it, and take an oath of fealty to him, v. 16-18. A reign which thus began with God, could not but be honourable to the prince, and comfortable to the subject. The last words of Moses are still verified, Happy art thou, O Israel! who is like unto thee, O people? Deut. 33. 29.

I. NOW after the death of Moses the servant of the Lord, it came to pass, that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying, 2. Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. 3. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses. 4. From the wilderness and this Lebanon, even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast. 5. There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. 6. Be strong and of a good courage; for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I sware unto their fathers to give them. 7. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. 8. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. 9. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.

Honour is here put upon Joshua, and great power lodged in his hand, by Him that is the Fountain of honour and power, and by whom kings reign; instructions are given him by infinite wisdom, and encouragements by the God of all consolation. God had before spoken to Moses concerning him, Num. 27. 18. But now he speaks to him, v. 1, probably, as he spake to Moses, Lev. 1. 1, out of the tabernacle of the congregation, where Joshua had with Moses presented himself, Deut. 31. 14. to learn the way of attending there. Though Eleazar had the brevity of judgment, which Joshua was directed to consult as there was occasion, Num. 27. 21, yet, for his great encouragement, God here speaks to him immediately, some think, in a dream or vision, (as Job 33. 15.) for though God has tied us to instituted ordinances, in them to attend him, yet he has not tied himself to them, but that he may, without them, make himself known to his people, and speak to their hearts otherwise than by their ears.

Concerning Joshua's call to the government, observe here,

I. The time when it was given him, After the death of Moses. As soon as ever Moses was dead, Joshua took upon him the administration, by virtue of his solemn ordination in Moses's life-time; an interregnum, though but for a few days, might have been of ill consequence; but, it is probable, that God did not speak to him to go forward toward Canaan, till after the thirty days of mourning for Moses were ended; not, as the Jews say, because the sadness of his spirit during those days unfitted him for communion with God; (he sorrowed not as one that had no hope;) but by this solemn pause, and a month's adjournment of the public councils, even now when time was so very precious to them, God would put an honour upon the memory of Moses, and give time to the people not only to lament their loss of him, but to repent of their miscarriages toward him during the forty years of his government.
The place Joshua had been in before he was thus preferred. He was Moses's minister, that is, an immediate attendant upon his person and assistant in business. The LXX translate it ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἄντροπου, a workman under Moses, under his direction and command. Observe, 1. He that was here called to honour, had been long bred to business. Our Lord Jesus himself took upon him the form of a servant, and then God highly exalted him. 2. He was trusted in, in subjection, and under command. Those are fittest to rule, that have learnt to obey.

He that was to succeed Moses was intimately acquainted with him, that he might fully know his doctrine and manner of life, his purpose and long-suffering, (2 Tim. 3. 10.) might take the same measures, walk in the same spirit, in the same steps, having to carry on the same work. 4. He was here in a type of Christ, who might therefore be called Moses's Minister, because he was made under the law, and fulfilled all the righteousness of it.

The call itself that God gave him, which is very full.

1. The consideration upon which he was called to the government; Moses my servant is dead, v. 2. All good men are God's servants; and it is no disparagement, but an honour, to the greatest of men to make him his servant. Moses was not only called to extraordinary work, was a steward in God's house, and in the discharge of the trusts reposed in him, he served not himself but God who employed him; he was faithful as a servant, and with an eye to the Son, as is intimated, Heb. 3. 5. where what he did, is said to be for a testimony of the things that should be spoken after; God will own his servants, will confess them in the great day.

But Moses was not the last of those who were called to extraordinary work, Moses was called to extraordinary work, was a steward in God's house, and in the discharge of the trusts reposed in him, he served not himself but God who employed him; he was faithful as a servant, and with an eye to the Son, as is intimated, Heb. 3. 5. where what he did, is said to be for a testimony of the things that should be spoken after; God will own his servants, will confess them in the great day.

The time of the business Moses was called to, was very near the end of his days. It was in the midst of his work, that he was called to another task, his usefulness was cut short, and his employment entrusted to another.

The end is near at hand. Moses, the servant is dead, but God the Master is not, he lives for ever. (2.) "Because Moses is dead, therefore the work devolves upon thee as his successor, for hereunto thou wast appointed. Therefore there is need of thee to fill up his place, Up, and be doing." Note, [1.] The removal of useful men should quicken survivors to be as much the more diligent in doing good. Such and such are dead, and we must die shortly, therefore let us work while it is day.

2. Joshua must not be idle, he must not sit down, but go on. It is a great mercy to a people, if, when useful men are taken away in the midst of their usefulness, others are raised up in their stead to go on where they broke off. Joshua must not be idle, he must not sit down, but go on.

He is therefore called to do the work, to finish what Moses began, the latter generations enter into the labour of the former. And thus Christ, our Joshua, does that for us which could never be done by the law of Moses; justifies, Acts 13. 39. and sanctifies, Rom. 8. 3. The life of Moses made way for Joshua, and prepared the people for what was to be done by him: thus the law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. And then the death of Moses made room for Joshua: thus we are dead, and Joshua is alive; when we are taken away, that we may be married to Christ, Rom. 7. 4.

3. The particular service he was now called out to. "Arise, go over this Jordan, this river, which you have in view, and on the banks of which you lie encamped." This was a trial to the faith of Joshua, whether he would give orders to make preparation for passing the river, when there was no visible way of getting over it, at least, not at this place and at this time, when all the banks were overflowed, ch. 3. 15. He had no pontons or bridge of boats by which to convey them over, and yet he must believe, that God, having ordered them over, would open a way for them. "Going over Jordan was going into Canaan," a new birth; to be a minister, was to be joint heir with him; and though Joshua had not always the same presence of mind that Moses had, yet if he had always the same presence of God, he would do well enough. Note, It is a great comfort to the rising generation of ministers and Christians, that the same grace which was sufficient for those that went before them, shall not be wanting to them, if they be not wanting to themselves in the improvement of it. It is repeated here again, v. 9. "The Lord thy God is with thee as a God of power, and that power engaged for thee whithersoever thou goest." Note, Those that go where God sends them, shall have him with them wherever they go, and they need desire no more to make them easy and prosperous. (2.) That the presence of God should never be withheld from them, even when the law, and the humble people, and the "great and the exceeding" of the Canaanites, and the dividing of Canaan, these he must religiously observe. Joshua was a man of great power and authority, yet he must himself be under command and do as he is bid. No man's dignity or dominion, how great soever, sets him above the law of God. Joshua must not only govern by law, and take care that the people observe the law, but he must observe it himself, and so by his own example maintain the honour and authority of God's command. First, He must do what he writeth; it is not enough to hear and read the word, to commend and admire it, and know and remember it, to talk and discourse of it, but we must do it. Secondly, He must do according to what was written, exactly observing the law as his copy, and doing, not only that which was there required, but in all circumstances according to the appointment. Thirdly, He must do according to all that was written, without excuse or deviation, to respect all God's commandments, even those which are most displeasing to flesh and blood. Fourthly, He must observe to do so, observe the checks of conscience, the hints of providence, and all the advantages of opportunity: careful observance is necessary to universal obedience. Fifthly, He must not turn from it, either in his own practice, or in any act of government, to the right hand or to the left, for there are errors in both hands, and virtue is in the mean. Sixthly, He must be strict and courageous, that he may do according to the law. So many discouragements there are in the way of duty, that those who will proceed and persevere in it, must put on resolution. And (lastly) to encourage him in his obedience, he assures him, that then he shall do wisely, (as it is in the margin,) and make his way prosperous, v. 7. 8. They that make the word of God their rule, and conscientiously walk by that rule, shall find, as well as the whole church, to finish them with the best maxims by which to order their conversation, Ps. 111. 10. And it will entitle them to the best blessings; God shall give them the desire of their heart. (2.) That he encourage himself herein with the promise and presence of God, and make those his stay, v. 6. Be strong and of a good courage. And again, v. 7. as if this was the one thing needful, only be strong and very courageous. And he encourages with this, v. 9. Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed. Joshua had long since signalized his valour in the war with Amalek, and in his dissent from the report of the evil spies, and yet God sees fit thus to inculcate this precept upon him. Those that have grace, have need to be called upon again and again to exercise grace and to improve in it. Joshua was humble and low in his own eyes, and this he was told of God as his portion. He was not diffident of himself, and of his own wisdom, and strength, and sufficiency for the work, especially coming after so great a man as Moses; and therefore God repeats this so often, "Be strong and of a good courage; let not the sense of thine own infirmities dishearten thee, God is almighty. Have not I commanded thee?" [1.] I have commanded thee to do according to all this law. To this end he must meditate therein, not for contemplation sake only, or to fill his head with notions, or that he might find something to puzzle the priests with, but that he might both as a man and as a magistrate observe to do according to what was written therein; and several things were written there, which had particular reference to the business he had now before him, whether concerning the law of the dividing of the Canaanites, and the destroying of the Canaanites, and the dividing of Canaan, these he must religiously observe. Joshua was a man of great power and authority, yet he must himself be under command and do as he is bid. No man's dignity or dominion, how great soever, sets him above the law of God. Joshua must not only govern by law, and take care that the people observe the law, but he must observe it himself, and so by his own example maintain the honour and authority of God's command.

commanded, called, and commissioned, to do it, and therefore will be sure to own thee and strengthen thee, and bear thee out in it." Note. When we are in the way of our duty, we have reason to be strong and very courageous; and it will help very much to animate and embolden us, if we keep our eye upon the divine warrant, and hear God saying, "Have not I commanded thee? I will therefore help thee, succeed thee, accept thee, reward thee." Our Lord Jesus, as Joshua here, was borne up under his sufferings by a regard to the will of God, and the commandment he had received from his Father, John 10. 18.

10. Then Joshua commanded the officers of the people, saying, 11. Pass through the host, and command the people, saying, Prepare your victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land, which the Lord your God giveth you to possess it. 12. And to the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to half the tribe of Manassé, spake Joshua, saying, 13. Remember the word which Moses the servant of the Lord commanded you, saying, The Lord your God hath given you rest, and hath given you this land. 14. Your wives, your little ones, and your cattle, shall remain in the land which Moses gave you on this side Jordan; but ye shall pass before your brethren armed, all the mighty men of valour, and help them, 15. Until the Lord have given your brethren rest, as he hath given you, and they also have possessed the land which the Lord your God giveth them; then ye shall return unto the land of your possession, and enjoy it, which Moses, the Lord's servant, gave you on this side Jordan, toward the sun-rising.

Joshua, being settled in the government, immediately applies himself to business; not to take state or to take his pleasures, but to further the work of God among the people over which God had set him. As he that desires the office of a minister, (1 Tim. 3. 1.) so he that desires the office of a magistrate, desires a work, a good work; neither is preferred to be idle.

1. He issues out orders to the people to provide for a march; and they had been so long encamped in their present post, that it would be a work of some difficulty to decamp. The officers of the people that commanded under Joshua in their respective tribes and families, attended him for orders which they were to transmit to the people. Inferior magistrates are as necessary and as serviceable to the public good in their places as the supreme magistrate in his. What would Joshua have done without officers? We are therefore required to be patient and provident in choosing men for office, not to governors, as to them that are sent by him, 1 Pet. 2. 13, 14. By these officers, 1. Joshua gives public notice, that they were to pass over Jordan within three days. These orders, I suppose, were not given till after the return of the spies that were sent to bring an account of Jericho, though the story of that affair follows, ch. 2. And perhaps that was such an instance of his jealousy, and excessive caution, as made it necessary that he should be so often "bidden as he was, to be strong and of a good courage. Observe with what assurance Joshua says it to the people, because God had said to him, Ye shall pass over Jordan, and shall possess the land. We greatly honour the truth of God, when we stagger not at the promises of God. 2. He gives them directions to prepare victuals, not to prepare transport vessels; that he bore them out of Egypt upon eagles' wings, would in like manner bear them into Canaan, to bring them to himself, Exod. 19. 4. But those that were minded to have other victuals beside the manna, which had not yet ceased, must prepare it, and have it ready against the time appointed. Perhaps, though the men of war did not cease till they were come into Canaan, ch. 5. 12, yet since they were come into a land inhabited, (Exod. 16. 35.) where they might be furnished in part with other provisions, it did not fall so plentifully, nor did they gather so much as when they had it first given them in the wilderness, but decreased gradually, and therefore they are ordered to provide other victuals, in which perhaps was included all other things necessary to their much. And some of the Jewish writers considering that having manna, they needed not to provide other victuals, understand it figuratively, that they must repent of their sins, and make their peace with God, and resolve to live a new life, that they might be ready to receive this great favour. See Exod. 19. 10, 11. 2. He reminds the two tribes and a half of the obligation they were under to go over Jordan with their brethren, though they were absent from the land, and families left behind. Interest would make the other tribes glad to go over Jordan, but in this it was an act of self-denial, and against the grain: therefore it was needful to produce the agreement which Moses had made with them, when he gave them their possession before their brethren, v. 13. Remember the word which Moses commanded you. Some of them perhaps were ready to think now that they were too good, which it would be too hard upon them in this matter, they might find some excuse or other to discharge themselves from this engagement, or might prevail with Joshua to dispense with them; but he holds them to it, and lets them know, though Moses was dead, his commands and their promises were still in full force. He reminds them, 1. Of the advantages they had received in being first settled: "The Lord your God hath given you rest, and you now know what you have to trust to, and are not as the rest of the tribes, waiting the issue of the war first and then of the lot. He has also given your families rest, your wives and children, whose settlement is your satisfaction. He has given you rest, by giving you this land, this good land, which you are in full and quiet possession of." Note, When God by his providence has given us rest, we ought to consider how we may honour him with the advantages of it, and what service we may do to our brethren who are unsettled, or not so well settled as we are. When God had given David rest, (2 Sam. 7. 1.) see how restless he was till he had found out a habitation for the ark, Ps. 132. 4, 5. When God has given us rest, we must take heed of slothfulness, and of settling upon our lees. 2. He reminds them of their agreement to help him in the return in the name of God, and that if they should be like sooner given them rest, v. 14, 15. This was, (1.) reasonable in itself; so closely were all the tribes incorporated, that they must needs look upon themselves as members one of another. (2.) It was enjoined them by Moses, the servant of the Lord; he commanded them to do this, and Joshua his successor would see his commands observed. (3.) It was the only expedient they had to save themselves from the guilt of a great sin in settling on that side Jordan, a sin which would one time or other find them out, Num. 32. 23. (4.) It was the condition of the grant Moses had made them of the land they were possessed of, so that they could not be subject to a goatherd, to do for the common enjoyment of the land of their possession, as it is here called, \( v. 15 \). if they did not fulfil the condition. (5.) They themselves had covenanted and agreed therefore unto, Numb. 32. 25. \( Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth. \) Thus we all lie under manifold obligations to strengthen the hands one of another, and not to seek our own welfare only but one another's.

16. And they answered Joshua, saying, All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go. 17. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses. 18. Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death: only be strong and of a good courage.

This answer was not given by the two tribes and a half only, (though they are spoken of immediately before,) but by the officers of all the people, (\( v. 10 \)) as their representatives, concurring with the divine appointment, by which Joshua was set over them, and they did it heartily, and with a great deal of cheerfulness and resolution.

1. They promise him obedience, \( v. 16 \) not only as subjects to his prince, but as soldiers to their general, of whose particular orders they are to be obedient; he that hath soldiers under him, saith to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; Matt. 8. 9. This the people of Israel here engage themselves to J-shu, \( \text{4all that thou commandest us to do we will readily do, without murmuring or disputing;} \) and whithersoever thou sendest us, we will do it upon our most difficult and perilous expedition, we will go." We must thus swear allegiance to our Lord Jesus, as the Captain of our salvation, and bind ourselves to do what he commands us by his word, and to go whither he sends us by his providence.

And since Joshua, being humbly conscious to himself how far short he came of Moses, feared he should not have such influence upon the people, and such an interest in them, as Moses had, they here promise that they would be as obedient to him as ever they had been to Moses, \( v. 17 \). To speak truth, they had no reason to boast of their obedience to Moses; he had found them a stiff-necked people, Deut. 9. 24. But they mean that they would be as obedient of Joshua as they should have been, and an answer was given (the generality of them at least sometimes) of Moses. Note, We must not so magnify that they are gone, how eminent soever they were, either in the magistracy or in the ministry, as to be wanting in the honour and duty we owe to those that survive and succeed them, though in gifts they may come short of them. Obedience for conscience sake will continue, though Providence may change the hands by which it is done and acts. 2. They pray for the presence of God with him, \( v. 17 \). "\( \text{Only the Lord thy God be with thee, to bless and prosper thee, and give thee success, as he was with Moses.}\) Prayers and supplications are to be made for all in authority, 1 Tim. 2. 1. 2. And the best thing we can ask of God for our magistrates, is, that they may have the presence of God with them; that will make them blessings to us, so that in seeking this for them, we consult our own interest. A reason is here intimated, why they would obey him as they had obeyed Moses, because they believed (and in faith prayed) that God's presence would be with him as it was with Moses.

Those that we have reason to think have favored from God, should have honour and respect from us. Some understand it as a limitation of their obedience, "We will obey only as far as we perceive the Lord is with thee, but no further. While thou keepest close to God, he will keep close to thee; hitherto shall our obedience come, but no further." But they were so far from having any suspicion of Joshua's deviating from the divine rule, that the thought of it needed not such a proviso.

3. They pass an act to make it death to any Israelite to disobey Joshua's orders, or rebel against his commandment, \( v. 18 \). Perhaps, if such a law had been in Moses's time, it might have prevented many of the rebellions that were formed against him, for most men fear the sword of the magistrate more than the justice of God. Yet there was a special reason for the making of this law, now that they were entering upon the ways of Canaan, for in time of war the severity of military discipline is more necessary than at other times. Some think that in this statute they have an eye to that law concerning the prophet God had given like unto Moses, which they think, though it refer chiefly to Christ yet takes in Joshua by the way, as a type of him, that whosoever would not hearken to him, should be cut off from his people, Deut. 18. 19. I will require of him of.

4. They animate him to go on with cheerfulness in the work to which God had called him; and, in viewing that he would be strong and of a good courage, they do in effect promise him that they would do all they could, by an exact, bold and cheerful observance of all his orders, to encourage him. It very much heartens those that lead in a good work, to see those that follow, follow with a good will. Joshua, though of approved valour, did not take it as an affront, but as a great kindness, for the people to bid him be strong and of a good courage.

CHAP. II.

In this we have an account of the scouts that were employed to bring an account to Joshua of the pastures of the land of Jericho: Observe, 1. God sent them, \( v. 1, 2 \). How Rahab received them and protected them, and told a lie for them, \( v. 2, 7 \), so that they escaped out of the hands of the enemy. 2. The account she gave them of the present posture of Jericho, and the fear they were struck with upon the approach of Israel, \( v. 8, 11, 14 \). The bargain she made with them for the security of herself and her relations in the ruin she saw coming upon her city, \( v. 12, 21 \). Their safe return to Joshua, and the account they gave him of their expedition, \( v. 22, 24 \). And that which makes this story most remarkable, is, that Rahab, the person principally concerned in it, is twice celebrated in the New Testament as a great believer, Heb. 11. 31, and as one whose faith proved itself by good works, James 2, 25.

1. And Joshua the son of Nun sent out of Shittim two men to spy secretly, saying, Go view the land, even Jericho. And they went, and came into a harlot's house, named Rahab, and lodged there. 2. And it was told the king of Jericho, saying, Behold, there came men in hither to-night of the children of Israel, to search out the country. 3. And the king of Jericho sent unto Rahab, saying, Bring forth the men that are come to thee, which are entered into thine house: for they be come to search out all the country. 4. And the woman took the two men, and hid them, and said thus, There came men unto me, but I wist not whence they were: 5. And it came to pass, about the time of shutting of the gate, when it was dark, that the men went out: whether the men went I wot not: pursue after them quickly; for ye shall overtake them. 6. But she had brought them up to the roof of the house, and hid them with the stalks of flax, which she had laid in order upon the roof. 7. And the men pursued after them the way to Jordan, unto the fords: and as soon as they which pursued after them were gone out, they shut the gate.

In these verses we have,

I. The prudence of Joshua, in sending spies to observe this important pass, which was likely to be disputed at the entrance of Israel into Canaan, v. 1. Go view the land, even Jericho. Moses had sent spies, Num. 13. (Joshua himself was one of them,) and it proved of ill consequence: yet Joshua now sends, not without a special intreaty to survey the whole land, but Jericho only; not to bring an account to the whole congregation, but to Joshua only; who, like a watchful General, was continually projecting for the public good, and was particularly careful to take the first step, and not to stumble at the threshold. It was not fit that Joshua should venture over Jordan, to make his remarks incognito—in disguise, but he sends two men, two truly appointed of time. Joshua is sure he has God with him, and yet sends men before him. We do not trust God, but tempt him, if our expectations slacken our endeavors. See how ready these men were to go upon this hazardous enterprise; though they put their lives in their hands, yet they ventured in obedience to Joshua their General, in zeal for the service of the camp, and in dependence upon the power of that God, who being the keeper of Israel in general, is the Protector of every particular Israelite in the way of his duty.

II. The providence of God, directing the spies to the house of Rahab. How they got over Jordan we are not told, but into Jericho they came, which was about seven or eight miles from the river, and there seeking for a convenient inn, were directed to the house of Rahab, here called a harlot; a woman that formerly been of ill fame, the reproach of which stuck to her name, though of late she had repented and reformed. Simon the leper, (Matt. 26. 6.) though cleansed from his leprosy, wore the reproach of it in his name as long as he lived; so Rahab the harlot, and she is so called in the New Testament, where both her faith and her good works are praised; to teach us, 1. That the greatness of sin is no bar to pardoning mercy, if it be truly repented of. 2. That there are many, who before their conversion were very wickand would not have justified her. But by this it appeared to be both alive and lively, that she exposed herself to the utmost peril, even to death, in obedience to her faith. Note. Those only are true believers, that can find in their hearts to venture for God; and those that by faith take the Lord for their God, take his people for their people, and cast in their lot among them. They that have God for their refuge and hiding-place, must testify their gratitude by their readiness to shelter his people who have occasion: let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Isa. 49:26. And we shall be glad of an opportunity of testifying the sincerity and zeal of our love to God, by hazardous services to his church and kingdom among men.

But, (2.) There is that in it which it is not easy to justify, and yet it must be justified, or else it could not be so good a work as to justify her. [1.] It is plain that she betrayed her country by harboring the spies, and, if, and aiding those that were designing its destruction, which could not consist with her allegiance to her prince, and her affection and duty to the community she was a member of. But that which justifies her in this, is, that she knew that the Lord had given them this land, v. 9. knew it by the incontestable miracles God had wrought for them, which confirmed that grant; and her obligations to God were higher than her obligations to her king, and the prince, or any other. If she knew God had given them this land, it would have been a sin to join with those that hindered them from possessing it. But since no such grant of any land to any people can now be proved, this will by no means justify any such treachery practices against the public welfare. [2.] It is plain that she deceived the officers that examined her, with an untruth. That she knew not whence the men were, that they were gone out of the land, neither where they were gone. What shall we say to this? If she had either told the truth, or been silent, she had betrayed the spies, and that had certainly been a great sin: and it does not appear that she had another way of concealing them, than by this ironical direction to the officers to pursue them another way, which if they would suffer themselves to be deceived by, they were bound to accuse themselves, or their friends, of that which, though inquired after as a crime, they know to be a virtue. This case was altogether extraordinary, and therefore cannot be drawn into a precedent: and that may be justified here, which would be by no means lawful in a common case. Rahab knew by what was already done on the other side Jordan, that no mercy was to be shown to the Canaanites, and from thence inferred, if mercy were not owing them, truth was not; they that might be destroyed, might be deceived. Yet divines generally conceive that it was a sin, which however admitted of this extenuation, that being a Canaanite she was not better taught the evil of lying; but God accepted her faith and pardoned her infirmity: however it was in this case, we are sure it is our duty to speak every man the truth to his neighbour, to dread and detest lying, and never to do evil, that evil, that good may come of it, Rom. 3. 8. But God accepts what is sincerely and honestly intended, though there be a mixture of frailty and folly in it, and is not extreme to mark what we do amiss. Some suggest that what she said might possibly be true of some other men.*

* However the guilt of Rahab’s falsehood may be extenuated, it seems best to admit nothing which tends to explain it away. We are told in Galatians 3:13, that what was good in her conduct, and what was bad, rewarding the former, and pardoning the latter. Her views of the divine law must have been exceedingly dim and confused; a similar falsehood, told by those who enjoy the light of revelation, however laudable the motive, would of course deserve much heavier censure.

8. And before they were laid down, she came up unto them upon the roof; 9. And she said unto the men, I know that the Lord hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you. 10. For we have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed. 11. And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you: for the Lord your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath. 12. Now therefore, I pray you, swear unto me by the Lord, since I have showed you kindness, that ye will also show kindness unto my father’s house, and give me a true token: 13. And that ye will save alive my father, and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters, and all that they have, and deliver our lives from death. 14. And the men answered her, Our life for yours, if ye utter not this our business. And it shall be, when the Lord hath given us the land, that we will deal kindly and truly with thee. 15. Then she let them down by a cord through the window: for her house was upon the town wall, and she dwelt up upon the wall. 16. And she said unto them, Get you to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you; and hide yourselves there three days, until the pursuers be returned: and afterward may ye go your way. 17. And the men said unto her, We will be blameless of this thine oath which thou hast made us swear. 18. Behold, when we come into the land, thou shalt bind this line of scarlet thread in the window which thou didst let us down by; and thou shalt bring thy father, and thy mother, and thy brethren, and all thy father’s household, home unto thee. 19. And it shall be, that whoever shall go out of the doors of thy house into the street, his blood shall be upon his head, and we will be guiltless: and whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him. 20. And if thou utter this our business, then we will be quit of thine oath which thou hast made us to swear. 21. And she said, According unto your words so be it. And she sent them away, and they departed: and she bound the scarlet line in the window.

The matter is here settled between Rahab and the spies, respecting the service she was now to do for them, and the favour they were afterward to show to her. She secures them on condition that they should secure her.

I. She gives them, and by them sends to Joshua and Israel, all the encouragement that could be desired to make their intended descent upon Canaan. This was what they came for, and it was worth considering what. Rahab had done and said.

II. She engaged them to take her and her relations under their protection, that they might not perish in the destruction of Jericho, v. 12, 13. Now, 1. It was an evidence of the sincerity and strength of her faith concerning the approaching revolution in her country, that she was so solicitous to make an interest for herself with the Israelites, and court their favour, and to secure their kindness for her, and of her country, and in the belief of that beneficial lift in her favor from the conquerors. Thus Noah, being moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house, and the condemnation of the world, Heb. 11. 7. They who truly believe the divine revelation, concerning the ruin of sinners, and the grant of the heavenly land to God's Israel, will give diligence to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold on eternal life, 2 Pet. 2. 21.

2. The provision she made for the safety of her relations, as well as for herself, is a laudable instance of natural affection, and an intimation to us in like manner to do all we can for the salvation of the souls of those that are dear to us, and, with ourselves, to bring them, if possible, into the bond of the covenant. No mention is made of her husband and children, but only her parents and brothers and sisters, whom, though she was herself a housekeeper, she retained a due concern for. 3. Her request that they would swear unto her by Jehovah, is an instance of her acquaintance with the only true God, and her faith in him, and devotion toward him, one act of which is religiously to swear by his name. 4. Her petition is very just and reasonable, that since she had protected them, and should protect her; and since her kindness to them extended to their people, for whom they were now negotiating, their kindness to her she should take in all her's. It was the least they could do for one that had saved their lives with the hazard of her own. Note, Those that show mercy may expect to find mercy. Observe, She does not demand any preference by way of reward for her kindness to them, though they lay so much at her feet: she has the kindness, gratitude, and remembrance of them, but only intends for her life, which in a general destruction would be a singular favour. Thus God promised Ebed-Melech in recompense for his kindness to Jeremiah, that in the worst of times he should have his life for a prey, Jer. 39. 18. Yet this Rahab was afterward advanced to be a princess in Israel, the wife of Salmon, and one of the ancestors of Christ, Matt. 1. 5. Those that faithfully serve Christ, he will not only protect, but prefer, and will do for them more than they are able to ask or think.

III. They solemnly engaged for her preservation in the common destruction, v. 14, "Our life for yours. We will take as much care of your lives as of our own, and would as soon hurt ourselves as any of you. Nay, they impregate God's judgment upon them all, if she should not make the promise to her. She had pawned her life for their's, and now they in requital pawn their lives for her's, and (as public persons) with them they pawn the public faith and the credit of their nation, for they plainly interest all Israel in the engagement of those words, When the Lord has given us the land, meaning not themselves only, but the people whose agents they were. No doubt, they knew themselves sufficiently authorised to treat with Rahab concerning this matter, and were confident that Joshua would ratify what they did, else they had not dealt kindly and truly with them, v. 14. We will not only be kind in promising now, but true in performing what we promise, and not only true in performing just what we promise, but kind in out-doing thy demands and expectations. The goodness of God is often expressed by his kindness and truth, (Ps. 117. 2.) and in both these we must be followers of him. In particular, "If a hand be upon any in the house with thee, his blood shall be upon our head, v. 19. If hurt come through our carelessness to those whom we are obliged to protect, we thereby contract guilt, and blood will be found a heavy load." 2. The provisos and limitations of their promises. Though they were in haste, and it may be in some confusion, yet we find them very cautious in settling this agreement and the terms of it, not to bind themselves to more than was fit for them to perform. Their servants must be made well provided, (1.) That she tie the scarlet cord with which she was now about to let them down, in the window of her house, v. 18. This was to be a mark upon the house, which the spies would take care to give notice of to the camp of Israel, that no soldier, how hot and eager soever he was in military executions, might offer any violence to the house that was thus distinguished. This was like the blood sprinkled upon the lintel and two sides which secured the first-born from the destroying angel, and being of the same colour, some allude to this also, to represent the safety of believers, under the protection of the blood of Christ sprinkled on the conscience. The same cord that she made use of for the preservation of these Israelites, was to be made use of for her preservation. What we serve and honour God with, we may expect he will bless and make it serviceable to us. (2.) That she should have all those whose safety she had desired in the house with her, and keep them there; and that at the time of taking the town, none of them should dare to stir out of doors, v. 18, 19. This was a necessary proviso, for Rahab's kindred could not be distinguished any other way than by being in her distinguished house; should they mingle themselves with their neighbours, they were taken; But the sword would devour one as well as another. It was a reasonable proviso, that since they were saved purely for Rahab's sake, her house should have the honour of being their castle; and that if they would not perish with them that believed not, they should thus far believe the certainty and severity of the rain coming upon their city, as to retire into a place made safe by promise, as Noah in the ark, and Lot into Zoar. They were saved from this worldwide generation, by separating from it. It was likewise a significant proviso, intimating to us that those who are added to the church that they may be saved, must keep close to the society of the faith-ful, and having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust, must take heed of being again entangled therein. (3.) That she should keep counsel, v. 14, 20. If thou utter this our business, that is, "If thou betray us when we are gone, or if thou make this agreement public, so as that others tie scarlet lines in their windows, and so confound us, then we will be quit of thine oath." They are unworthy of the secret of the Lord, that know not how to keep it to themselves when there is occasion. IV. She then took effectual care to secure her new friends, and sent them out another way, James 2. 25. Having fully understood the bargain they made with her, and consented to it, v. 21. she then let them down by a cord over the city wall, v. 15. the situation of her house befriending them herein: Thus Paul made his escape out of Damascus, 2 Cor. 11. 33. She also directed them which way to go for their own safety, being better acquainted with the country than they were, v. 16. She directs them to leave the high road, and abscond in the mountains till the pursuers were returned, for till then they could not safely venture over Jordan. Those that are in the way of God and their duty, may expect that Providence will protect them, but that will not excuse them from taking all prudent methods for their own safety. God will keep us, but we must not willfully expose ourselves. Providence must be our constant care; or, as some, vin thinksthat their charge to Rahab to keep this matter secret, and not to utter it, was intended for her safety, lest she, boasting of her security from the sword of Israel, should, before they came to protect her, fall into the hands of the king of Jericho, and be put to death for treason: thus do they prudently advise her for her safety, as she advised them for their's. And it is good advice, which we should at any time be thankful for, to take heed to ourselves.

22. And they went, and came unto the mountain, and abode there three days, until the pursuers were returned: And the pursuers sought them throughout all the way, but found them not. 23. So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain, and passed over, and came to Joshua the son of Nun, and told him all things that befell them: 24. And they said unto Joshua, Truly the Lord hath delivered into our hands all the land; for even all the inhabitants of the country do faint because of us.

We have here the safe return of the spies Joshua had sent, and the great encouragement they brought with them to Israel to proceed in their descent upon Canaan. Had they been minded to discourage the people, as the evil spies did that Moses sent, they might have told them what they had observed of the height and strength of the walls of Jericho, and the extraordinary vigilance of the king of Jericho, and how narrowly they escaped out of his hands: but they were of another spirit, and depending themselves upon the divine promise, they animated Joshua likewise.

1. Their return in safety was itself an encouragement to Joshua, and a token for good. That God provided for them so good a friend as Rahab was, in an enemy's country, and that he without standing in the way of the king of Jericho, and the eagerness of the pursuers, they were come back in peace, with such an instance of God's great care concerning them for Israel's sake, as might assure the people of the divine conduct and care they were under, which would undoubtedly make the progress of their arms glorious. He that so wonderfully protected their scouts, would preserve their men of war, and cover their heads in the day of battle.

2. The report they brought was much more encouraging, v. 24. "All the inhabitants of the country, though resolved to stand it out, yet do faint because of us, they have neither wisdom to yield, nor courage to fight;" whence they conclude, "Truly the Lord has delivered into our hands all the land; it is all our own, we have nothing to do, in effect, but to take possession." Sinners’ frights are sometimes sure presages of their fall. If we resist our spiritual enemies, they will flee before us, which will encourage us to hope that in due time we shall be more than conquerors.

CHAP. III.

This chapter, and that which follows it, gives us the history of Israel’s passing through Jordan into Canaan, and a very memorable history it is. Long after, they are bid to remember, what God did for them between Shittim (whence they decamped, v. 1) and Gilgal, where they next pitched, ch. 4. 10. This, that they might know the righteousness of the Lord. By Joshua’s order they marched up on the left of their side, v. 1. and then all mighty power led them through it. They passed through the Red-sea unexpectedly, and in their flight by night, but they have notice some time before of their passing through Jordan, and the expectations raised. I. The people are directed to follow the ark, v. 2. 4. II. They are commanded to sanctify themselves, v. 5. III. The priests with the ark are ordered to lead the van, v. 6. IV. Joshua is magnified and made commander in chief, v. 7. 8. V. Public notice is given of what God is about to do for them, v. 9. 13. VI. The thing is done, Jordan is divided, and Israel brought safely through it, v. 14. 17. This was the Lord’s doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.

AND Joshua rose early in the morning; and they removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over. 2. And it came to pass, after three days, that the officers went through the host; 3. And they commanded the people, saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it. 4. Yet shall there be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure; come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go: for ye have not passed this way heretofore. 5. And Joshua said unto the people, Sanctify yourselves: for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you. 6. And Joshua spake unto the priests, saying, Take up the ark of the covenant, and pass over before the people. And they took up the ark of the covenant, and went before the people.

Rahab, in mentioning to the spies the driving up of the Red Sea, ch. 2. 10. the report of which terrified the Canaanites more than any thing else, intimates that they on that side the water expected that Jordan, that great defence of their country, would in like manner give way to them; whether the Israelites had any expectation of it, does not appear. God often did things for them which they looked not for, Isa. 64. 5. Now here we are told, 1. That they came to Jordan and lodged there, v. 1. Though they were not yet told how they should pass the river, and were improvident for the passing of it in any ordinary way, yet they went forward in faith, having been told, ch. 1. 11. that they should pass it. We must go on in the way of our duty, though we foresee difficulties, trusting God to help us through them, when we come to them. Let us proceed as far as we can, and depend for success on divine sufficiency and grace, and ourselves not sufficient for. In this march Joshua led them, and particular notice is taken of his early rising; as there is afterward upon other occasions, ch. 6. 12.—7. 16. 8. 10. which intimates how little he loved his ease, how much he loved his business, and what care and pains he was willing to take in it. Those that would bring great things to pass, must rise early, lest they come to poverty. Joshua herein set a good example to the officers under him, and taught them to rise early, and to all that are in public stations especially to attend continually to the duty of their place.

II. That the people were directed to follow the ark; officers were appointed to go through the host to give these directions, v. 2. that every Israelite might know both what to do, and what to depend upon.

1. They might depend upon the ark to lead them; that is, upon God himself, of whose presence the ark was an instituted sign and token. It seems, the pillar of cloud and fire was removed, else that had led them, unless we suppose that that now overtook the ark, and so they had a double guide, hence was put upon the ark, and a defence upon that glory. It is called here the ark of the covenant of the Lord. Why? Because the people might understand it, and the inhabitants of Canaan, as to what they could have from this. That the Lord was their God, a God in covenant with them? Here was the ark of the covenant; if God be cur’s, we need not to fear any evil. He was nigh to them, present with them, went before them: What could come amiss to them that were thus guided, thus guarded? Formerly, the ark was carried in the midst of the camp, that now it was put behind the people, as the ark of the covenant. It now passed through the land of Canaan; and, as it were, to give them lively and sensi in the promised land, and put them in possession of it. In the ark the tables of the law were, and over it the mercy-seat, for the divine law and grace reigning in the heart are the surest pledges of God’s presence and favour; and these that would be led to the heavenly Canaan, must take the law of God for their guide. (If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.) and have the great Propitiation in their eye, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

2. They might depend upon the priests and Levites, who were appointed for that purpose to carry the ark before them. The work of ministers is to hold forth the word of life, and to take care of the administration of those ordinances which are the tokens of God’s presence, and the manifestations of his power and grace; and herein they must go before the people of God in their way to heaven.

3. The people must follow the ark. Remove from your place and go after it; (1.) As those that are resolved never to forsake it; wherever God’s ordinances are, there we must be; if they flit, we must remove and go after them. (2.) As those that are entirely satisfied in its guidance, that it will lead in the best way to the best end; and therefore, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. This must be all their care, to attend the motions of the ark, and follow it with an implicit faith. Thus must we walk after the rule of the word, and the direction of the Spirit in every thing, so shall ye be upon us, as it now was upon the Israel of God. They must follow the priests as far as they carried the ark, but no further; so we must follow our ministers only as they follow Christ.

4. In following the ark, they must keep their distance, v. 4. They must none of them come within a thousand yards of the ark. (1.) They must thus express their awful and reverent regard to that token of God’s presence, lest its familiarity with them should breed contempt. This charge to them, not to come near, was agreeable to that dispensation with respect to God’s tabernacle and brazen altar, but we may through Christ have access with boldness. (2.) Thus it was made to appear, that the ark was able to protect itself, and needed not to be guarded by the men of war, but was itself a guard to them. With what a noble defence of the enemy did it leave all its friends half a mile behind, but the unarmed priests that carried it, as perfectly sufficient for its own safety and their’s that followed it.

(3.) Thus it was the better seen by those that were to be led by it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go, seeing it, as it were, chalked out or tracked by the ark. Had they been allowed to come near it, they would have surrounded it, and none would have had the sight of it but those that were close to it; but as it was put at such a distance before them, they would all have the satisfaction of seeing it, and would be animated by the sight of it. And it was with good reason that this precision was made for their encouragement, for ye have not passed this way heretofore. This had been the character of all their way through the wilderness, it was an untraveled path, but this especially through Jordan. While we are here, we must expect and prepare for unusual events, to pass ways that we have not passed before: and much more will it be so, when we go hence, our way through the valley of the shadow of death is a way we have not gone before, which makes it the more formidable. But if we have the assurance of God’s presence we need not fear, that will furnish us with such strength as we never had, when we come to do a work we never did.

III. They were commanded to sanctify themselves, that they might be prepared to attend the ark; and will be so, when we are prepared to walk with God, tomorrow the Lord will do wonders among you, v. 5. See how magnificently he speaks of God’s works, he doeth wonders, and is therefore to be adored, admired, and trusted in. See how intimately acquainted Joshua was with the divine counsels, he could tell beforehand what God would do, and when. See what preparation we must make to receive the discoveries of God’s glory, and the communications of his grace, we must sanctify ourselves. This we must do when we are to attend the ark, and God by it is about to do wonders among us; we must separate ourselves from all other cares, devote ourselves to God’s honour, and cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. The people of Israel were now entering into the holy land, and therefore must sanctify themselves. This must be about to give them an unexampled view of his favour, which by meditation and prayer they must compose their minds to a very careful observation of, that they might give God the glory, and take to themselves the comfort, of these appearances.

IV. The priests were ordered to take up the ark and carry it before the people, v. 6. It was the Levites’ work ordinarily to carry the ark, Numb. 4. and Joshua says this must be the order, but he did not think it proper to be heard, and ordered to do it. And they did as they were commanded, took up the ark, and did not think themselves disparaged, went before the people, and did not think themselves exposed; the ark they carried was both their honour and defence. And now we may suppose that prayer of Moses used, when the ark set forward, Numb. 10. 35, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered. Magistrates are here instructed to stir up ministers to their work, and to make use of their authority for the furtherance of religion; ministers must likewise learn to go before in the way of God, and not to shrink or draw back when dangers are before them. They must expect to be most struck at, but they know whom they have trusted.

7. And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that, as i was with Moses, so I will be with thee. 8. And thou shalt command the priests that bear the ark of the covenant, saying, When ye come to the brink of the water of Jordan, ye shall stand still in Jordan. 9. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, Come hither, and hear the words of the Lord your God. 10. And Joshua said, Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you, and that he will without fail drive out from before you the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Hivites, and the Perizzites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Jebusites. 11. Behold, the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you into Jordan. 12. Now therefore take ye twelve men out of the tribes of Israel, out of every tribe a man. 13. And it shall come to pass, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark of the Lord, the Lord of all the earth, shall rest in the waters of Jordan, that the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the waters that come down from above; and they shall stand upon a heap.

We may observe here how God honours Joshua, and, by this wondrous work he is about to do, designs to make Israel know that he is their governor. And then, how Joshua honours God, and endea vours by it to make Israel know that he is their God. Thus those that honour God he will honour, and those whom he has advanced, should do what they can in their places to exalt him.

1. God speaks to Joshua to put honour upon him, v. 7, 8. 1. It was a great honour God did him that he spake to him, as he had done to Moses from off the mercy-seat, before the priests removed it with the ark. This would make Joshua easy in himself and great among the people, that God was pleased to speak to him alone. 2. That he designed to magnify him in the sight of all Israel. He had told him before he would be with him, ch. 1. 5. that comforted him, but now all Israel shall see it, and that magnified him. Those are truly great with whom God is, and whom he employs and owns in his service. God magnified him, because he would have the people magnify him. Pious magistrates are to be highly honoured and esteemed in their public blessings, and the more we see of God with them, the more we should honour them. By the dividing of the Red-sea, Israel was convinced that God was with Moses in bringing them out of Egypt; therefore they are said to be baptized into Moses in the sea, 1 Cor. 10. 2. And upon that occasion they believed him, Exod. 14. 31. And now by the dividing of Jordan, they shall be convinced, that God is in like manner with Joshua in bringing them into Canaan. God had magnified Joshua before on several occasions, but now he began to magnify him as the successor of Moses in the government. Some have observed, it was at the bank of Jordan that God began to magnify Joshua, and at the same place he began to magnify our Lord Jesus as Mediator; for John was baptizing at Bethabara, the house of passage, and there it was, that when our Saviour was baptized, it was proclaimed concerning him, This is my beloved Son.

3. That by him he gave orders to the priests themselves, though they were his immediate attendants, v. 8. Thou shalt command the priests, that they shall go before Jordan, to touch the brink of Jordan while the waters part, that it may appear to be at the presence of the Lord, of the mighty God of Jacob, that Jordan is driven back, Ps. 114. 5, 7. God could have divided the river without the priests, but they could not without him. The priests must herein set a good example to the people, and teach them to do their part in the service of God, and trust him for help in time of need.

II. Joshua speaks to the people, and therein honours God.

1. He demands attention, v. 9. "Come hither to me, as many as can come within hearing, and before you see the works, hear the words of the Lord your God, that you may consider them together, and they may be imprinted in your heart, and may be the pattern in your behaviour; for that which you see and hear, shall be a witness against you, if youfbe not faithful in the keeping of the commandments of God which he cometh to make them to hear."

2. He tells them at length, by what way they should pass over Jordan, by the stopping of its stream, v. 13. The waters of Jordan shall be cut off. God could by a sudden and miraculous frost have congealed the surface, so that they might all have passed over Jordan in dry land; but the doing that which was done in one country, by the ordinary power of nature, (Job 38. 30.) it would not have been such an honour to Israel's God, nor such a terror to Israel's enemies; it must therefore be done in such a way as had no precedent but the dividing of the Red-sea: and that miracle is here repeated, to show that God has the same power to finish his work of creation. Gen. 1. 6, 9. That by which we now saw, their belief of that which they there read, might be assisted, and they might know that the God whom they worshipped, was the same God that made the world, and that it was the same power that was engaged and employed for them.

3. The people having been directed before to follow the ark, are here told that it should pass before them into Jordan, v. 11. Observe, (1.) The ark of the covenant must be the guide. During the reign of Moses, the cloud was their guide, but now, in Joshua's reign, the ark; both were visible signs of God's presence and presidency, but divine grace under the Mosaic dispensation was wrapped up as in a cloud and covered with a vail, while by Christ, our Joshua, it is revealed in the ark of the covenant unveiled. (2.) It is called the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth. "He that is your God, v. 9. in covenant with you, is the Lord of all the earth, has both right and power to command, control, use, and dispose of all nations and of all creatures. He is the Lord of all the earth, therefore he needs not you, nor can be benefited by you; therefore it is your honour and happiness to have him for your God, if all the creatures are at your service, and when he pleases, shall be employed for you." When we are praising and worshipping God as Israel's God, and our's through Christ, we must remember that he is the Lord of the whole earth, and reverence him and trust in him accordingly. Some observe an accent in the original, which they think directs us to translate it somewhat more emphatically, Behold the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth. They are told that the ark should pass before them into Jordan, God would not appoint them to go any where, but where he himself would go before them, and go with them; and they might safely venture, even into Jordan itself, if the ark of the covenant led them. While we make God's precepts our rule, his promises our stay, and his providence our guide, we cannot but dread the forces of unbelief, and meet with in the way of duty. That promise is sure to all the seed, Isa. 43. 2. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.

4. From what God was now about to do for them, he infers an assurance of what he would yet further do. This he mentions first, so much was his heart upon it, and so great a satisfaction did it give him, v. 10. "Hereby you shall know that the living God (the true God, and God of power, not one of the dead gods of the heathen) is among you, though you see him not, nor are to have any image of him; is among you to give you law, secure your welfare, and receive your homage: is among you in this great undertaking now before you; and therefore ye shall, may, he himself, will, without fail, drive out from before you the Canaanites."

5. The conquers of Canaan, if the living God among you, exhaling he will exel, (so the Hebrew phrase is,) from before you the Canaanites. He will do it certainly, and do it effectually. What should hinder him? What can stand in his way, before whom rivers are divided, and dried up? The forcing of the lines was a certain presage of the ruin of all their hosts: how could they stand their ground when Jordan itself was driven back? When they did not courage to dispute this pass, but at the approach of the mighty God of Jacob, Ps. 114. 7. What opposition could they ever make after this? This assurance which Joshua here gives them, was so well grounded, as that it would enable one Israelite to chase a thousand Canaanites, and two to put ten thousand to flight: and it would be abundantly strengthened by remembering the song of Moses, dictated forty years before, which plainly told the dividing of Jordan, and the vengeance which would have upon the driving out of the Canaanites. Exod. 15. 15—17. The inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away, and so be effectually driven out, they shall be as still as a stone till thy people pass over, and then thou shalt bring them in and plant them. Note, God's glorious appearances for his church and people, ought to be improved by us for the encouragement of our faith and hope for the future. As for God, his work is perfect. If Jordan's flood cannot keep them out, Caanam's force cannot turn them out again.

5. He directs them to get twelve men ready, one of each tribe, who must be within call, to receive such orders as Joshua should afterward give them, v. 12. It does not appear that they were to attend the priests, and walk with them when they carried the ark, that they might more immediately be witnesses of the wonders done by it, as some think; but they were to be at hand for the service they were called to, ch. 4. 4, &c.

14. And it came to pass, when the people removed from their tents, to pass over Jordan, and the priests bearing the ark of the covenant before the people; 15. And as they that bear the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water, (for Jordan overflooweth all his banks at the time of harvest,) 16. That the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon a heap very far from the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan: and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed, and were cut off: and the people passed over right against Jericho. 17. And the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan; and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan.

Here we have a short and plain account of the dividing of the river Jordan, and the passage of the children of Israel through it. The story is not garnished with the flowers of rhetoric, gold need not to be painted; but it tells us, in short, matter of fact.

1. That this river was now broader and deeper than usually it was at other times of the year, v. 15. The melting of the snow upon the mountains of Lebanon, near which this river had its rise, was the occasion, that, at the time of harvest, barley-harvest, which was the spring of the year, Jordan overflowed all his banks. This great flood, just at that time, (which Providence might have restrained for once, or which he might have ordered them to cross at another time of the year,) very much magnified the power of God and his kindness to Israel. Note, Though the opposition given to the salvation of God's people, have all imaginable advantages, yet God can and will conquer it. Let the banks of Jordan be filled to the brink, filled till they run over, it is as easy to Omnipoerse to divide them, and dry them up, as if they were never so narrow, never so shallow; it is all one with the Lord.

2. That as soon as ever the feet of the priests dipped in the brim of the water, the stream stopped immediately, as if a sluice and been made to dam it up, v. 15, 16. So that the waters above swollen, stood on a heap, and ran back, and yet it should seem, did not spread, but congealed; which unaccountable rising of the river was observed with amazement by those that lived upward upon it many miles off, and the remembrance of it remained among them long after; the waters on the other side this invisible dam ran down of course, and the waters below the brink of the river dry as far as Jordan, it is likely, as they welled upward. When they passed through the Red-sea, the waters were a wall on either hand, here only on the right hand.

Note, The God of nature, can, when he pleases, change the course of nature, and alter its properties, can turn fluids into solids, waters into standing rocks, as on the contrary, rocks into standing waters, to serve his own purposes. See Ps. 114. 5, 8. What cannot God do? What will he do not do for the perfecting of his people's salvation? Sometimes he clears the earth with rivers, Hab. 3. 9, and sometimes, as here, clears the rivers without earth.

It is easy to imagine how, when the course of this strong and rapid stream was arrested on a sudden, the waters roared and were troubled, so that the mountains seemed to shake with the swelling thereof, Ps. 46. 3. how the floods lifted their voice, the floods lifted up their waves, while the Lord en high showed himself mightier than the noise of these many waters, Ps. 93. 3. 4. With reference to this, the prophet asks, Was the Lord displeased against the rivers, was thine anger against the rivers? Hab. 3. 8.

No, Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people, v. 13. In allusion to this, it is foretold among the great things God will do for the Gospel-church in the latter days, that the great river Eu-rup, the water whereof came down from the habitation of the SAXE of the east may be dried up, Rev. 16. 12. When the time is come for Israel's entrance into the land of promise, all the difficulties shall be conquered, mountains shall become plains, Zech. 4. 7. and rivers become dry, for the ransom of the Lord to pass over. When we have finished our pilgrimage through this wilderness, death will be like this Jordan between us and the heavenly Canaan, but the edge of the water of death has passed through it, it is the last enemy that shall be destroyed.

3. That the people passed over right against Jericho, which was (1.) An instance of their boldness, and a noble defiance of their enemies: Jericho was one of the strongest cities, and yet they dared to face it at their first entrance. (2.) It was an encouragement to them to venture through Jordan, for Jericho was a godly city, and the country about it cultivated. The flowers of the field desire not to be as their own, what difficulties could discourage them from taking possession? (3.) It would increase the confusion and terror of their enemies, who, no doubt, strictly observed their motions, and were the amazed spectators of this work of wonders.

4. That the priests stood still in the midst of Jordan while the people passed over, v. 17. There the ark was appointed to be, to show that the same power that parted the waters, kept them parted as long as there was occasion, and had not the divine presence, of which the ark was a token, been their security, the water had returned upon them and buried them. There the priests were appointed to stand still, (1.) To try their faith, whether they could venture to take their post when God assigned it them, with mountains of water over their heads: as they made a bold step when they passed the ford of Jordan, so made a bold step when they tarried longest in Jordan; but they knew they carried their own protection with them. Note, Ministers in times of peril should be examples of courage and confidence in the divine goodness. (2.) It was to encourage the faith of the people, that they might go triumphantly into Canaan, and fear no evil, no not in this valley of the shadow of death, (for so the divided river was) being assured of God's presence which interposed between them and the greatest danger, between them and the proud waters, which otherwise had gone over their souls.
Thus in the greatest dangers the saints are comforted with his rod and his staff, Ps. 23. 4.

CHAP. IV.

This chapter gives a further account of the miraculous passage of Israel through Jordan. I. The provision that was made at that time to preserve the memorial of it, by twelve stones set up in Jordan, v. 3, and other twelve stones taken up out of Jordan, v. 1. 8. II. The marks of the people through Jordan's channel, the two tribes first, then all the people, and the priests that bare the ark last, v. 10. 14. III. The closing of the waters again upon their coming up with the ark, v. 15. 19. IV. The erecting of the monument in Gilgal, to preserve the remembrance of this work of wonder to posterity, v. 20. 24.

1. And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over Jordan, that the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying, 2. Take you twelve men out of the people, out of every tribe a man, 3. And command you them, saying, Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan, out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones; and ye shall carry them over with you, and leave them in the lodging place where you shall lodge this night. 4. Then Joshua called the twelve men whom he had prepared of the children of Israel, out of every tribe a man: 5. And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the Lord your God into the midst of Jordan, and take ye up every man of you a stone upon his shoulder, according unto the number of the tribes of the children of Israel: 6. That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean you by these stones? 7. Then ye shall answer them, That the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off: and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever. 8. And the children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, and took up twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, as the Lord spake unto Joshua, according to the number of the tribes of the children of Israel, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there. 9. And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood: and they are there unto this day.

We may well imagine how busy Joshua and all the men of war were, while they were passing over Jordan, when beside their own marching into an enemy's country, and in the face of the enemy, which could not but occasion them many thoughts of heart, they had their wives, and children, and families, their cattle, and tents, and all their effects, bag and baggage, to convey by this strange and untried path which we must suppose either very muddy, or very stony, troublesome to the weak, and frightful to the timorous, the descent to the bottom of the river, and the ascent out of it steep, so that every man must needs have his head full of care and his hands full of business, and Joshua more than any of them. And yet in the midst of all his business, care must be taken to perpetuate the memorial of this wondrous work of God, and this care might not be adjourned to a time of greater leisure. Note, How much better we have to do of business for ourselves, and our families, we must not neglect or omit what we have to do for the glory of God and the serving of his honour, for that is our best business. Now, 1. God gave orders for the preparing of this memorial. Had Joshua done it without divine direction, it might have looked like a design to perpetuate his own name and honour, nor would it have commanded so sacred and venerable a regard from posterity, as now, when God himself appointed it. Note, God's works of wonder ought to be kept in everlasting remembrance, and means devised for the preserving of the memorial of them. Some of the Israelites that passed over Jordan, perhaps were so stupid, and had so little regard for the care of God to them, that they felt no concern to have it remembered; while others, it may be, were so much affected with it, and had such deep impressions made upon them by it, that they thought there needed no memorial of it to be erected, the heart and tongue of every Israelite in every age would be a living, lasting monument of it. But God, knowing their frame, and how apt they had been soon to forget his works, ordered an expedient for the keeping of this in remembrance to all generations, that those who could not, or would not, read the record of it in sacred history, might come to the knowledge of it by the monument set up in remembrance of it, which the common tradition of the country would be an explanation of; it would likewise serve to corroborate the proof of the matter of fact, and would remain a standing evidence of it to those who in after-ages might question the truth of it. A monument is to be erected, and 1. Joshua, as chief captain, must give directions about it, v. 1. When all the people were clean passed over Jordan, not even the feebler, that were the hindmost of them, left behind, so that God had done his work completely, and every Israelite got safe into Canaan, then must be the time to take the materials for this monument. It is the pious care of the learned Bishop Patrick, that Joshua was gone into some place of retirement, to return thanks immediately for this wonderful mercy, and then God met him, and spake thus to him. Or, perhaps, it was by Eleazar the priest, that God gave these and other instructions to Joshua, for though he is not mentioned here, yet when Joshua was ordained by God to take his station, he was not the only one to which he was sent, he was sent to Joshua and the Levites, Numb. 27. 21. 2. Eleazar should ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim, and at his word, Joshua, and all the children of Israel must go out and come in, Numb. 27. 21. 2. One man out of each tribe, and he a chosen man, must be employed to prepare materials for this monument, that each tribe might have the story told them by one of themselves, and each tribe might contribute to set before the glory of God thereby, v. 2. 4. Out of every tribe a man: Not the Levites only, but every Israelite must, in his place, help to make known to the sons of men God's mighty acts, Ps. 145. 12. The two tribes, though seated already in their possession, yet sharing in the mercy, must lend a hand to the memorial of it. 3. The stones that must be set up for this memorial, are ordered to be taken out of the midst of the channel, (where, probably, there lay abun dance of great stones,) and as near as might be from the very place where the priests stood with the ark, v. 3, 5. This intended monument deserved to have been made of stones curiously cut with the finest and most exquisite art, but these stones out of the bottom of the river were more natural and more apt indications of the miracle; let posterity know by this, that Jordan was driven back, for these very stones were then fetched out of it. In the institution of signs, God always chose that which was most proper and significant, rather than that which is pompous or curious; for God hath chosen the foolish things of the world. These twelve men, after they got over Jordan, must be sent back to the place where the ark stood, being permitted to come near it, (which others might not,) for this service; pass over before the ark, v. 5. that is, "into the presence of the ark, which now stands in the midst of Jordan, and thence fetch these stones." The use of these stones is here appointed for a sign, v. 6. a memorial, v. 7. They would give occasion to the children to ask their parents in time to come, How came these stones thither? Probably the land about was not stony: but the parents would inform them, as they themselves had been informed, that in this place Jordan was divided by the almighty power of God, to give Israel passage into Canaan, as Joshua enlarges on this head, v. 23.

II. According to these orders the thing was done.

1. Twelve stones were taken up out of the midst of Jordan, and carried in the sight of the people to the place where they had their head-quarters that night, v. 8. It is probable that the stones they took, were as big as they could well carry, and as near as might be of a size and shape. But whether they went away with them immediately to the place appointed, or whether they laid down the ark, and kept pace with the solemn procession of that, to grace its triumphant entry into Canaan, is not certain. By these stones, which they were ordered to take up, God did, as it were, give them livery and seisin of this good land, it is all their own, let them enter and take possession: therefore what these twelve did, the children of Israel are said to do, v. 8. because they were the representatives of their resolves and resolution. They would therefore, with the ark, serve, that when the Lord Jesus, our Joshua, having overcome the sharpness of death, and dried up that Jordan, had opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers, he appointed his twelve apostles, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, by the memorial of the gospel to transmit the knowledge of this to remote places and future ages.

2. Other twelve stones (probably, much larger than the other, for we read not that they were each of them one man's load) were set up, in the midst of Jordan, v. 9. piled up so high in a heap or pillar, as that the top of it might be seen above water, when the river was low, or seen in the water, when it was clear, or at least the noise or commotion of the water passing over it would be observable, and the bargemen would avoid it, as they do a rock; some way or other, it is likely, it was discernible so as to notify the very place where the ark stood, and to serve for a duplicate to the other monument, which was to be set on dry land in Gilgal, for the confirming of its testimony, and the preserving of its tradition. The sign being doubled, no doubt, the thing was certain.

10. For the priests which bare the ark stood in the midst of Jordan, until every thing was finished that the Lord commanded Joshua to speak unto the people, according to all that Moses commanded Joshua: and the people hasted and passed over. 11. And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over, that the ark of the Lord passed over, and the priests, in the presence of the people. 12. And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, passed over armed before the children of Israel, as Moses spake unto them: 13. About forty thousand prepared for war passed over before the Lord unto battle, to the plains of Jericho. 14. On that day the Lord magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel; and they feared him, as they feared Moses, all the days of his life. 15. And the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying, 16. Command the priests that bear the ark of the covenant, that they come out of Jordan. 17. Joshua therefore commanded the priests, saying, Come ye up out of Jordan. 18. And it came to pass, when the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord were come out of the midst of Jordan, and the soles of the priests' feet were lifted up unto the dry land, that the waters of Jordan returned unto their place, and flowed over all his banks, as they did before. 19. And the people came up out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month, and encamped in Gilgal, in the east border of Jericho.

The inspired historian seems to be so well pleased with his subject here, that he is loath to quit it, and is therefore very particular in his narrative, especially in observing how closely Joshua pursued the orders God gave him, and that he did nothing without divine direction, finishing all that the Lord had commanded him, (v. 10.) which is also said to be what Moses commanded. We read not of any particular command of Moses to Joshua about this matter, the thing was altogether new to him. It must therefore be understood of the general instructions Moses had given him to follow the divine conduct, to deliver that to the people, which he had received of the Lord, and to take all occasions to remind them of their duty to God, as the best return for his favours to them: This which Moses, who was now dead and gone, had said to him, he had in mind at this time, and did accordingly. It is well for us to have the good instructions that have been given us, ready to us, when we have occasion for them.

1. All the people hasted and passed over, v. 10. Some understand it of the twelve men that carried the stones, but it seems rather to be meant of the body of the people; for though an account was given of their passing over, v. 1. yet here it is repeated for the sake of this circumstance, which was added, that they passed over in haste, either because Joshua by their officers ordered them to make haste, for it was to be but one day's work, and they must not leave a hoof behind; or, perhaps, it was their own inclination that hastened them. (1.) Some hasted, because they were not able to trust God, they were afraid the waters should return upon them, being conscious of guilt, and diffluent of the divine power and goodness. (2.) Others, because they were not willing to tempt God to continue the mira-ele longer than needs must, nor would they put the patience of the priests that bare the ark too much to the stretch by any special delay. (3.) Others, because they were eager to be in Canaan, and would thus show how much they longed after that pleasant land. (4.) Those that considered least, yet tasted because others did. He that believeth, maketh haste, not to anticipate God's counsels, but to attend them. Isa. 28. 16.

2. The two tribes and a half led the van, v. 12, 13. They were, no doubt, chosen by lot, when they had their lot given them on that side Jordan, Num. 32. 27. And Joshua had lately reminded them of their promise, ch. 1. 12, &c. It was fit that they who had the first settlement, should be the first in the encounter of difficulties, the rather, because they had not the incumbrance of families with them as the other tribes had, and they were all chosen men, and fit for service, ready armed. It was a good instance, that they had so strong a body to lead them on, and would be an encouragement to the rest. And the two tribes had no reason to complain, the post of danger is the post of honour.

3. When all the people were got clear to the other side, the priests with the ark came up out of Jordan. This, one would think, should have been done of course, their own reason would tell them they were now safe and secure, and no need ofemons in punishing them, yet they did not stir a step till Joshua ordered them to move, and Joshua did not order them out of Jordan till God directed him to do so, v. 15. 17. So observant were they of Joshua, and he of God, which was their praise, as it was their happiness to be under such good direction. How low a condition soever God may at any time bring his priests or people to, let them patiently wait, till by his providence he shall call them up out of it, as the priests here were called to come up out of Jordan, and let them not be weary of waiting, while they have the tokens of God's presence with them, even the ark of the covenant, in the depth of their adversity.

4. As soon as ever the priests and the ark were come up out of Jordan, the waters of the river, which had stood on a heap, gradually flowed down again, and the usual stream was soon filled the channel again, v. 18. This makes it yet more evident, that the stop which had now been given to the river, was not from any secret natural cause; but purely from the power of God's presence, and for the sake of his Israel, for when Israel's turn was served, and the token of his presence was removed, immediately the water went forward again; so that if it be asked, What ailed thee, Lord Joshua, that thou wast driven back? It must be answered, It was purely in obedience to the God of Israel, and in kindness to the God of Israel: there is therefore none like unto the God of Joshua—happy art thou, O Israel! who is like unto thee, O people? Some observe here, by way of allusion, that when the ark and the priests that bare it, are removed from any place, the flood-gates are again opened, the defence is departed, and an inundation of judgments is to be expected shortly. Those that are unchurched, will soon be undone. The glory is departed, if the ark be taken.

5. Notice is taken of the honour put upon Joshua by all this, v. 14. On that day the Lord magnified Joshua, both by the fellowship he admitted him to with himself, speaking to him upon all occasions, and being ready to be consulted by him, and by the tokens he had call'd him up out of the stream, and people. Those that honour God he will honour, and when he will magnify a man, as he had said he would magnify Joshua, (ch. 3. 7.) he will do it effectually. Yet it was not for Joshua's sake only that he was thus magnified, but to put him in a capacity of doing so much the more service to Israel, for hereupon they feared him as they feared Moses. See here what is the best and surest way to command the respect of inferiors, and to gain their reverence and observance, not by blustering and threatening, and carrying it with a high hand, but by holiness and love, and all possible indications of a constant regard to their welfare, and to God's will and honour. These are feared in the best manner, and to the best purpose, who appear that God is with them, and that they set him before them. Those that are sanctified are truly magnified, and are worthy of double honour. Favourites of heaven should be looked on with awe.

6. An account is kept of the time of this great event, v. 19. It was on the tenth day of the first month, just forty years since they came out of Egypt, wanting five days. God had said in his wrath that they should wander forty years in the wilderness, but to make up that forty we must take in the first year, which was then past, and had been a year of triumph in their deliverance out of Egypt, and this last, which had been a year of triumph likewise on the other side Jordan, so that all the forty were not years of sorrow; and at last he brought them into Canaan, five days before the forty years were ended, to show how little pleasure God derived from their unhappiness, how swift he is to show mercy, and that for the elect's sake the days of trouble are shortened, Matt. 24. 22. God ordered it so that they should enter Canaan four days before the annual solemnity of the passover, and on the very day when the preparation for it was to begin, Exod. 12. 3. because he would have their entrance into Canaan grace and sanctified with that religious feast, and would have them to be reminded of their deliverance out of Egypt, that comparing them together, God might be glorified as the Alpha and Omega of their bliss.

20. And those twelve stones, which they took out of Jordan, did Joshua pitch in Gilgal. 21. And he spake unto the children of Israel, saying, When your children shall ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones? 22. Then ye shall let your children know, saying, Israel came over this Jordan on dry land. 23. For the Lord your God dried up the waters of Jordan from before you, until ye were passed over, as the Lord your God did to the Red Sea, which he dried up from before us, until we were gone over: 24. That all the people of the earth might know the hand of the Lord, that it is mighty; that ye might fear the Lord your God for ever.

The twelve stones which were laid down in Gilgal, v. 8. are here set up either one upon another, yet so as that they might be distinctly counted, or one by another in rows; for after they were fixed, they are not called a heap of stones, but these stones. I. It is here taken for granted, that posterity would inquire into the meaning of them, supposing them intended for a memorial. Your children shall ask their fathers, (for whom else should they ask?) What mean these stones? Note, These that will be wise when they are old, must be inquisitive when they are young. Our Lord Jesus, though he had in himself the fulness of knowledge, has by his examples taught children and young people to hear and ask questions, Luke 2. 46. Perhaps when John was baptizing in Jordan at Bethabara, (the house of passage where the people were gathered) he pointed at these very stones, while saying, Matt. 3. 9,

God is able of these stones (which were at first set up by the twelve tribes) to raise up children unto Abraham. The stones being the memorial of the miracles, the children's question gave occasion for the improvement of it; but our Saviour says, Luke 19. 40, If the children should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out; for one way or other the Lord will be glorified in his works of wonder.

II. The parents are here directed what answer to give to this inquiry, v. 22. Ye shall let your children know that which you have yourselves learned from the written word, and from your fathers. Note, It is the duty of parents to acquaint their children betimes with the word and works of God, that they may be trained up in the way they should go. I. They must let their children know that Jordan was driven back before Israel, who went through it upon dry land, and, that this was the very place where they passed over. They saw how deep and strong a stream Jordan now was, but the divine power put a stop to it, even then when it overflowed all its banks—this and this for you, that live so long after. Note, God's mercies to our ancestors were not meant only to be remembered by them, but should be the occasion of reviving the remembrance of the great things God did for our fathers in the days of old. The place thus marked would be a memorandum to them; Israel came over this Jordan. A local memory would be of use to them, and the sight of the place remind them of that which was done there; and not only the inhabitants of that country, but strangers and travellers, would look upon these stones, and receive instruction. Many an upstart, the sight of the stones, would go to their bibles, and there read the history of this wondrous work; and some, perhaps, upon reading the history, though living at a distance, would have the curiosity to go and see the stones.

2. They must take that occasion to tell their children of the drying up of the Red-sea forty years before, as the Lord your God did to the Red Sea. Note, It greatly magnifies later mercies to compare them with former mercies, for, by making the comparison, it appears that God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. (2.) Later mercies should bring to remembrance former mercies, and revive our thankfulness for them.

3. They must put them in the way of making a good use of these works of wonder, the knowledge whereof was thus carefully transmitted to them, v. 24. (1.) The power of God was hereby magnified. All the world was, or might be, convinced that the hand of the Lord is mighty, that nothing is too hard for God to do; nor can any power, no, not that of nature itself, obstruct what God will effect. The deliverances of God's people are instructions to all people, and fair warnings not to contend with Omnipotence. (2.) The people of God were engaged and encouraged to persevere in his service; This might be the Lord's doing, and he will subsequently do your duty to him, and this for ever, or all days. (Margin.) Every day, all the days of your lives, and your seed throughout your generations. The remembrance of this wonderful work should effectually restrain them from the worship of other gods, and constrain them to abide and abound in the service of their own God. Note, In all the instructions and informations parents give their children, they should have chiefly in their eye to teach and engage them to fear God forever. Serious godliness is the best learning.

Israel is now got over Jordan, and the waters which had opened before them to favour their march forward, are closed again behind them to forbid their retreat backward; they have now got footing in Canaan, and must apply themselves to the conquest of it; in order to which this chapter tells us, I. How their enemies were dispirited, v. 1. II. What was done at their first landing to assist and encourage them. 1. The covenant of circumcision was renewed, v. 2–3. 2. The Feast of the passover was celebrated, v. 10. 3. Their camp was visited with the corn of the land, whereupon the men ceased, v. 11, 12. 4. The Captain of the Lord's host himself appeared to Joshua, to animate and direct him, v. 13–15.
wilderness, is now come up from the wilderness, leaning upon her Beloved, and looks forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners: how terrible she was to all her enemies, we are here told.

v. 1, how fair and clear she was made in the eyes of her friends, by the rolling away of the reproach of Egypt, we are told in the following verses.

I. Here is the fright which the Canaanites were put into by their miraculous passing over Jordan, v. 1. The news of it was soon dispersed all the country over, not only as a prodigy in itself, but as an alarm to all the kings and Kingdoms of Canaan. Now, as when Babylon was taken, One prophet rode to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to carry the amazing tidings to every corner of their land. Jer. 51. 51. And here we are told what impressions the tidings made upon the kings of this land, their heart melted like wax before the fire, neither was there spirit in them any more. This intimates that though the heart of the people generally had fainted before, as Rahab owned, ch. 2. 9. yet the Kings held till now up their spirits pretty well, had promised themselves that, being in possession, their country populous, and their cities fortified, they should be able to make their part good against the invaders; but when they heard, not only that they were come over Jordan, and that that defence of their country was broken through, but that they were come over by a miracle, the God of nature manifestly fighting for them, their hearts failed them and they gave up the ghost for fear, and were now at their wits' end. And, 1. They had reason enough to be afraid; Israel itself was a formidable body, and much more so when God was its head, a God of almighty power. What can make him dread against them, if Jordan be driven back before them? 2. God impressed these fears upon them, and disproved them, as he had promised, Exod. 23. 33.

2. Here is the counsel which the spies gave up to the people, v. 2. God may make the wicked to fear where no fear is, Ps. 33. 5. much more where there is such cause for fear as was here. He that made the soul, can, when he pleases, make his sword thus to approach to it and kill with its terrors.

II. The opportunity which this gave to the Israelites to circumcise these among them who were uncircumcised, At that time, v. 2. when the country was thus opened up to them, God directed Joshua to circumcise the children of Israel, for at that time it might be done with safety even in an enemy's country; their hearts being melted, their hands were tied, that they could not take this advantage against them as Simeon and Levi did against the Shechemites, to come upon them when they were sore. Joshua could not be sure of this, and therefore if he had ordered this general circumcision then, he had been to his shame, to be justly have been censured as imprudent, for how good soever the thing was in itself, in the eye of reason it was not seasonable at this time, and might have been of dangerous consequence; but when God commanded him to do it, he must not consult with flesh and blood; he that bid them do it, no doubt, would protect them and bear them out in it. Now observe,

1. The occasion there was for this general circumcision. (1.) All that came out of Egypt were circumcised, v. 5. While they had peace in Egypt, doubtless, they circumcised their children the eighth day, according to the law. But after they began to be oppressed, especially when the edict was made for the destruction of their male infants, the administration of this ordinance was interrupted; many of them were uncircumcised, of whom there was a general circumcision, either during the time of the three days' darkness, as Dr. Lightfoot con-jectures, or a year after, just before their eating a second passover at mount Sinai, and in order to that solemnity, Numb. 9. 2. as many think. And it is with reference to that general circumcision, that the learned Masius thinks it refers to the general circumcision of Abraham's Family, when the ordinance was first instituted, Gen. 17. 25. That first confirmed the promise of the land of Canaan, this second was a thankful celebration of the performance of that promise. But, (2.) All that were born in the wilderness, namely, after their walking in the wilderness, became by the divine sentence a judgment upon them for their disobedience, as is intimated by that repetition of the sentence, v. 6. all that were born since that fatal day, on which God swore in his wrath that none of that generation should enter into his rest, were uncircumcised.

But what shall we say to this? Had not God enjoined it to Abraham under a very severe penalty, that every man-child of his seed should be circumcised, on the eighth day? Gen. 17. 9-14. Was it not the seal of the everlasting covenant? Was it not so great a stress laid upon it then when they were coming out of Egypt, that when immediately after the first passover the law concerning that feast was made perpetual, this was one clause of it, that no uncircumcised person should eat of it, but should be deemed as a stranger? And yet under the government of Moses himself, to have all their children that were born for thirty-eight years together left uncircumcised, is unaccountable. So great an omission could not be generally but by divine direction.

Now, [1.] Some think circumcision was omitted because it was needless: it was appointed to be a mark of distinction between the Israelites and other nations, and therefore, in the wilderness, where they were so perfectly separated from all, and mingled with none, there was no occasion for it. [2.] Others think that they did not look upon the precept of circumcision so, as to think themselves in Canaan, for in the covenant made with them at mount Sinai, nothing was said about circumcision, neither was it of Moses but of the fathers, John 7. 22. and with particular reference to the grant of the land of Canaan, Gen. 17. 8. [3.] Others think that God favourably dispensed with the omission of this ordinance in consideration of the unsettledness of their state, and their frequent removes while they were in that wilderness state. Either way, they who were uncircumcised, even after they were circumcised, should rest for some time while they were sore, and stirring them might be dangerous to them; God therefore would have mercy and not sacrifice. This reason is generally acquiesced in, but to me it is not satisfactory, for sometimes they stayed a year in a place, Numb. 9. 22. if not much longer; and in their removes the little children, though sore, might be wrappt so warm, and carried so tenderly, as to be as well instructed and might certainly be much better accommodated than the mothers in travail or while lying-in. Therefore, [4.] To me it seems to have been a continued token of God's displeasure against them for their unbelief and murmuring. Circumcision was originally a seal of the promise of the land of Canaan, as we observed before. It was in the believing hope of that promised land, that the patriarchs circumcised their children; but when God had this concern concerning the men of war which came out of Egypt, that they should be consumed in the wilderness, and never enter Canaan, nor come within sight of it, (as that sentence is here repeated, v. 6. reference being made to it,) as a further ratification of that sentence, and to be a constant memorandum of it to them, all that fell under that sentence, and were to fall by it, were forbidden to circumcise their children; by which they were plainly told, that whatever others might, they should never have the benefit of that promise which circumcision was the seal of. And this was such a significant indication of God's wrath, as the breaking of the tables of the covenant was, when Israel had broken the covenant by making the golden calf. It is true, there is no express mention of this judicial prohibition in the account of that sentence; but an intimation of it, Numb. 14. 35. Your children shall bear your iniquity, and hereafter be silenced, that they may observe them in the land which they were going, Deut. 6. 1, 12. 1. [3.] This second circumcision, as it is here called, was typical of the spiritual circumcision with which the Israel of God, when they enter into the gospel-rest, are circumcised; it is the learned Bishop Pierson's observation, That this circumcision being performed under the conduct of Jesus, Moses's successor, it placed men in the situation of another circumcision than that of the flesh, commanded by the law, even the circumcision of the heart, Rom. 2. 29, called the circumcision of Christ, Col. 2. 11.

3. The people's obedience to these orders. Joshua circumcised the children of Israel, v. 3. not himself with his own hands, but he commanded that it should be done, and took care that it was done; it might seem to be unnecessary, seeing the prohibition was that it should be done by a priest or Levite, but any one might be employed to do it. All those that were under twenty years old when the people were numbered at mount Sinai, and not being numbered with them, fell not by the fatal sentence, were circumcised, and by them all the rest might be circumcised in a little time. The people had promised to hearken to Joshua, as they had hearkened to Moses. v. 17. and by that promise they had engaged to their dutifulness, submitting to this painful institution, and not calling him for the sake of it a bloody governor, as Zipporah because of the circumcision called Moses a bloody husband.

Lastly, The names given to the place where this was done, to perpetuate the memory of it. (1.) It was called the hill of the foreskins, v. 5. Probably, the foreskins that were cut off, were laid on a heap, and covered with earth, so that they made a little hillock. (2.) It was called Gilgal, from a word which signifies to take away, from that which God said to Joshua, v. 2. This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt. God is jealous for the honour of his people, his own honour being so much interested in it; and whatever reproach they may lie under for a time, first or last it will certainly be rolled away, and every tongue that riseth up against them, he will condemn. [1.] Their circumcision rolled away the reproach of Egypt. They were hereby owned to be the free-born children of God, having all the seal of the covenant in their flesh, and so the reproach of their bondage in Egypt was removed. They were tainted with the idolatry of Egypt, and that was their reproach; but now that they were circumcised, it was now expected of God, or rather God expected of them, that their affection to Egypt would be rolled away. [2.] Their coming safe to Canaan rolled away the reproach of Egypt, for it silenced that spiteful suggestion of the Egyptians, that for mischief they were brought out, the wilderness had shut them in, Exod. 14. 3. Their wandering so long in the wilderness confirmed the reproach, but now that they had entered Canaan in the truth, that reproach was done away. When God glorifies himself in perfecting the salvation of his people, he not only silences the reproach of their enemies, but rolls it up on themselves.

10. And the children of Israel encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on the burteenth day of the month, at even, in the plains of Jericho. 11. And they did eat of the old corn of the land, on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes and parched corn in the self-same day. 12. And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.

We may well imagine that the people of Canaan were astonished, and that when they observed the motions of the enemy they could not but think them very strange. When soldiers take the field, they are apt to think themselves excused from religious exercises, (they have not time or thought to attend them,) yet Joshua opens the campaign with one act of devotion after another. What was afterwards said to another Joshua, might truly be said to this, Hear now, O Joshua, thou, and thy fellows that sit before thee, are men wondered at, Zech. 3. 8. and yet indeed he took the right method. This is likely to end well, that begins with God.

Here is,

I. A solemn passover kept, at the time appointed by the law, the fourteenth day of the first month, and in the same place where they were circumcised, v. 10. While they wandered in wilderness, they were denied the benefit and comfort of this ordinance, as a further token of God's displeasure; but now, in answer to the prayer of Moses, upon the passing of that sentence, Ps. 90. 15. God comforted them again, after the time that he had afflicted them, and therefore now that joyful ordinance is revived again. Now that they had entered into Canaan, it was very reasonable to remember those wondrous works of divine power and goodness, by which they were brought out of Egypt. The finishing of mercies should bring to mind the beginning of them; and when it is perfect day we must not forget how welcome the morning light was, when we had long waited for it. The solemn passover followed immediately after the solemn circumcision; thus, when they that received the word were baptized, immediately we find them breaking of bread, Acts 2. 41. 42. They kept this passover in the plains of Jericho, as it were in defiance of the Canaanites that were round about them and enraged against them, and yet could not give them any disturbance. Thus God gave them an early instance of the performance of that promise, that when they went up to keep the feasts, their land should be taken under the special protection of the Divine Providence, Exod. 23. 4. 5. Neither of it to any desire thy land. He now prepared a table before them in the presence of their enemies, Ps. 23. 5.

II. Provision made for their camp of the corn of their land, and the ceasing of the manna thereupon, v. 11, 12. Manna was a wonderful mercy to them when they needed it; but it was the mark of a wilderness state, it was the food of children, and therefore, though it was an angel's food, and common to all, it was peculiar to them, as light bread, yet it would be more acceptable to them to eat of the corn of the land, and that they are now furnished with; the country people being retired for safety into Jericho, left their barns and fields, and all that was in them, which served for the subsistence of this great army. And the supply came very seasonable, for, 1. After the passover, they were to keep the feast of unleavened bread, which they could not do according to the appointment, when they had nothing but manna to live upon; perhaps this was one reason why it was intermitted in the wilderness. But now they found old corn enough in the barn of the Canaanites to supply them plentifully for that occasion; thus the wealth of the earth was laid up for the just, and little did they who laid it up, think, whose all it should be, which they had provided. 2. On the morrow after the passover-sabbath, they were to wave the sheaf of first-fruits before the Lord, Lev. 23. 10, 11. And this they were particularly ordered to do, when they were come into the land which God would give them; and they were furnished for this with the fruit of the land that year, v. 12. which was then growing and beginning to be ripe. Thus they, were well provided for, both with old and new corn, as good householders, Matt. 13. 32. And as soon as ever the fruits of this good land came to their hands, they had an opportunity of honouring God with them, and employing them in his service according to his appointment. And thus, behold all things are clean and comfortable to them. Calvin is of opinion, that they had kept the passover every year in its season during their wandering in the wilderness, though it is not mentioned, and that God dispensed with their being uncircumcised, as he did not withstanding that, admit them to offer other sacrifices. But some gather from Amos 5. 25. that after the sentence passed upon them, there were no sacrifices offered till they came to Canaan, and consequently no passover kept. And it is observable, that after that sentence, Num. 14. the law which follows, ch. 15. concerning sacrifices, begins, v. 2. When ye shall be come into the land of your habitations, you shall do so and so.

Notice is taken of the ceasing of the manna as soon as ever they had eaten the old corn of the land; (1.) To show that it did not come by chance or common providence, as snow or hail does, but by the special designation of divine wisdom and goodness; (2.) To teach us not to expect extraordinary supplies, when they may be had in an ordinary way. If God had dealt with Israel according to their deserts, the manna had ceased then when they called it light bread; but as long as they needed it, God continued it, though they despised it; and now that they needed not, God withdrew it, though perhaps some of us may be tempted to remember, though wise Father, who knows the necessities of his children, and accommodates his gifts to them, not to their humours. The word and ordinances of God are spiritual manna, with which God nourishes his people in this wilderness, and though often forfeited, yet they are continued while we are here; but when we come to the heavenly Canaan, this manna will cease, for we no longer have need of it.

13. And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and beheld, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand: and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? 14. And he said, Nay; but as captain of the host of the Lord am I now come. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, and said unto him, What saith my Lord unto his servant? 15. And the captain of the Lord's host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy. And Joshua did so.

We have hitherto found God often speak to Joshua, but we read not till now of any appearance of God's glory to him; now that his difficulties increased, his encouragements were increased in proportion. Observe,

I. The time when he was favoured with this vision; it was immediately after he had performed the great solemnities of circumcision, and the passover: then God made himself known to him. Note, We are not to expect the dispensations of the divine grace, when we are found in the way of our duty, and are diligent and sincere in our attendance on holy ordinances.

II. The place where he had this vision; it was by Jericho, in Jericho, so the word is, in it by faith and hope, though as yet he had not begun to lay siege to it; in it in thought and expectation, or in the fields of Jericho, hard by the city; there, it should seem, he lay still, all alone, fearless of danger, because sure of the divine protection. There he was (some think) meditating and praying, and to those who are so employed, God often graciously manifests himself. Or, perhaps, there he was to take a view of the city, to observe its fortifications, and contrive how to attack it, and perhaps he was at a loss within himself how to make his approaches, when God came and directed him. Note, God will often reveal himself to men, in ways that are all alone, and in dark and secret places, because sure of the divine protection. He was (some think) meditating and praying, and to those who are so employed, God often graciously manifests himself. Or, perhaps, there he was to take a view of the city, to observe its fortifications, and contrive how to attack it, and perhaps he was at a loss within himself how to make his approaches, when God came and directed him. Note, God will often reveal himself to men, in ways that are all alone, and in dark and secret places, because sure of the divine protection.

III. The appearance itself; Joshua, as is usual with those that are full of thought and care, was looking downward, his eyes fixed on the ground, when of a sudden he was surprised with the appearance of a man who stood before him at some little distance, which obliged him to lift up his eyes, and gave a diversion to his musings, v. 13. he appeared unto him as a man, but a considerable man, and one fit to be taken notice of. Now, 1. We have reason to think that this man was the Son of God, the eternal Word, who before he assumed the human nature for a perpetuity, frequently appeared in a human shape. So Bishop Patrick thinks, consomant to the judgment of the Fathers. Joshua gave him divine honours, and he received them, which a created angel would not have done, and he is called Jehovah, ch. 6. 2. He here appeared as a soldier, with his sword drawn in his hand. To Abraham in his tent, he appeared as a traveller; to Joshua in the field as a man of war: Christ will be to his people what their faith expects and desires. Christ had his sword drawn, which served, (1.) To justify the war Joshua was engaging in, and to show him that it was of God, who gave him commission to kill and slay. If the sovereign draws the sword, that proclaims war, and authorizes the subject to do too. The sword is then well drawn when Christ draws it, and gives the banner to them that fear him, to be displayed because of the truth, Ps. 60. 4. (2.) To encourage him to carry it on with a cheerful spirit. Joshua's sword drew a red line; in his hand it denotes how ready he is for the defence and salvation of his people, who through him shall do valiantly. His sword turns every way.

IV. The bold question with which Joshua accosted him; he did not send a servant, but stepped up to him himself, and asked, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? Which intimates his readiness to entertain him if he were for them, and to fight him if he were against them. He was a brave soldier, and himself a brave commander. His own courage and resolution. He was not ruffled by the suddenness of the appearance, nor daunted with the majesty and bravery, which no doubt appeared in the countenance of the person he saw; but, with a presence of mind that became so great a General, put this fair question to him. God had bid Joshua be courageous, and by this it appears that he was so for what God by his word requires of his people, he does by his grace work in them. 2. His great concern for the people and their cause; so heartily has he embarked in the interests of Israel, that none shall stand by him with the face of a man, but he will know whether he be a friend or a foe. It should seem, he suspected him for an enemy, a Goliath that was come to destroy the armies of the living God, and to give him a challenge. Thus apt are we to look upon that as against us, which is most for us. The question plainly implies, that the cause between the Israelites and Cannanites, between Christ and Belzebub, will not admit of a neutrality. He that is not with us, is against us. V. The account he gave of himself, v. 14. " Nay, not for your adversaries, you may be sure, but I am for you, to assist you. I am come, not only for you as a friend, but over you, as commander in chief." Here were now, as of old, Gen. 32. 2. Mahanaim, two hosts, a host of Israelites ready to engage the Cannanites, and a host of angels to protect them therein, and he, as Captain of both, conducts the host of Israel, and commands the host of angels to their assistance. Perhaps in allusion to this, Christ is called the Captain of our salvation, Heb. 2. 10. as a Captain over the multitude to the people, Isa. 55. 5. They cannot but be victorious, that have such a Captain. He now came as Captain to review the troops, to animate them, and to give the necessary orders for the besieging of Jericho.

VI. The great respect Joshua paid him when he understood who he was; it is probable that he perceived not only by what he said, but by some other sensible indications, that he was a divine person, and not a man.

1. Joshua paid homage to him. He fell on his face to the earth and did worship. Joshua was himself General of the forces of Israel, and yet he was far from looking with jealousy upon this stranger, who produced a commission as Captain of the Lord's host above him; he did not offer to dispute his claims, but cheerfully submitted to him as his commander. It well becomes the greatest men to be humble and reverent in their addresses to God.

2. He begged to receive commands and directions from him, What saith my Lord unto his servant? His former question was not more bold and soldier-like, than this was pious and saint-like; nor was it any disparagement to the greatness of Joshua's spirit, thus to humble himself when he had to do with God; even crowned heads cannot bow too low before the throne of the Lord Jesus, who is King of kings, Ps. 2. 10. 11. —72. 10. 11. Rev. 19. 16. Observe, (1.) The relation he owns between himself and Christ; that Christ was his Lord, and himself his servant and under his command, Christ his Captain, and himself a soldier under him, to do as he is bidden, Matt. 8. 9. Note, The foundation of all acceptable obedience is laid in a sincere dedication of ourselves, 2 Cor. 10. 5. as soldiers of our Lord, Eph. 6. 10. 16. (2.) The inquiry he makes pursuant to this relation, What saith my Lord? Which implies an earnest desire to know the will of Christ, and a cheerful readiness and resolution to do it. Joshua owns himself an inferior officer, and stands to receive orders; this temper of mind shows him fit for the post he was in, for those know best how to command, that know how to obey.

VII. The further expressions of reverence which this divine Captain required from Joshua, v. 15. Looseth thy shoe from off thy foot, in token of reverence and respect, which with us are signified by uncovering the head; and as an acknowledgment of a divine presence, which, while it continued there, did in a manner sanctify the place and dig ify it. We often say of a person whom we have a great affection for, that we love the very ground he goes upon; thus Joshua must show his reverence for this divine person, he must not tread the ground he stood on with his shoes on, Excl. 3. 1. Outward expressions of inward reverence, and a religious awe of God, well become us, and are required of us, whenever we approach to him in solemn ordinances. Bishop Patrick well observes here, that the very same orders that God gave to Moses at the bush, when he was sending him to bring Israel out of Egypt, Exod. 3. 5. he here gives to Joshua, for the confirming of his faith in the promise he had lately given him, that as he had been with Moses, so he would be with him, ch. 1. 5. Had Moses such a presence of God with him, as, when it became sensible, sanctified the ground? So had Joshua.

CHAP. VI.

Joshua opened the campaign with the siege of Jericho, a city which could not trust so much to the courage of its people, as to act offensively and to send out its forces to oppose Israel's landing and encamping, but trusted much to the strength of its walls, as to stand upon its defence, and not to surrender, or desire conditions of peace. Now here we have the story of the taking of it.
I. The directions and assurances which the Captain of The Lord's host gave concerning it, v. 1. 3. III. The trial of the people's patient obedience in walking round the city six days, v. 6. 14. III. The wonderful delivery of it into their hands the seventh day, with a solemn charge to them to use it as a devoted thing, v. 13. 21.
and v. 24. IV. The preservation of Rahab and her relations, v. 22, 23, 25. V. A curse pronounced upon the man that should dare to rebuild this city, v. 26, 27. An ab

1. NOW Jericho was strangely shut up, because of the children of Israel; none went out, and none came in. 2. And the Lord said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valour. 3. And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city once.
Thus shalt thou do six days. 4. And seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns: and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets. 5. And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the rams' horns, and when ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up, every man straight before him.

We have here a contest between God and the men of Jericho, and their different resolutions, upon which it is easy to say whose word shall prevail.

1. Jericho resolves Israel shall not be its master,
v. 1. It was straitly shut up, because of the children of Israel it did shut up, and it was shut up.
So it is in the margin, it did shut up itself, being strongly fortified both by art and nature, and it was shut up, by the obstinacy and resolution of the inhabitants, who agreed never to surrender or so much as sound a parley; none went out as deserts or to treat of peace, nor were any admitted in to offer peace. Thus were they infuriated, and their hearts hardened to their own destruction—the misrable case and character of all those that strengthen themselves against the Almighty, Job 15. 25.

2. God makes the word to be done, and very quickly. The captain of the Lord's host, here called Jehovah, taking notice how strongly Jericho was fortified, and how strictly guarded, and knowing Joshua's thoughts and cares about reducing it, and perhaps his fears of a disgrace there, and of stumbling at the threshold, gave him here all the assurance he could desire of success, v. 2. See, I have given into thine hand Jericho. Not, "I will reduce it to ruins, but I will give it to thee, and as it were already in thy possession." It was designed that this city, being the first-fruits of Canaan, should be entirely devoted to God, and that neither Joshua nor Israel should ever be one mime the richer for it, and yet it is here said to be given into their hand, for we must reckon that most our own, which we have an opportunity of honouring God with, and employing in his service. Now, 1. The captain of the Lord's host gives directions how the

5. To magnify his own power, that he might be structor in his own strength, Ps. 21. 13. not in the strength of instruments. God would hereby yet further make bare his own almighty arm for the encouragement of Israel, and the terror and confusion of the Canaanites. 2. To put an honour upon his ark, the instituted token of his presence, and to give a reason for the laws by which the people were obliged to look upon it with the most profound veneration and respect. 3. While all this was going on, the ark was brought into the camp with its appointed ceremonies, even through the orders of God, it was looked upon as a profession of it, and the people paid dear for their presumpsion, 1 Sam. 4. 5, 8c. But now that it was done by the divine appointment, it was an honour to the ark of God, and a great encouragement to the faitb of Israel. 3. It was likewise to put honour upon the priests, who were appointed upon this occasion to carry the ark and sound the trumpet, and in this case they were all employed, and not merely the priests excused from war; that that privilege, with other honours and powers that the law had given them, might not be grudged them, in this service they are principally employed, and so the people are made sensible what blessings they were to the public, and how well worthy of all the advantages conferred upon them. 4. It was to try the faith, obedience, and patience, of the people, to try the public spirit of the nation, to oblige them to observe a peculiar, which to human policy seemed foolish to obey, and believe a promise which in human probability seemed impossible to be performed.

They were also proved, whether they could patiently endure the reproaches of their enemies, and patiently wait for the salvation of the Lord. Thus, by faith, not by force, the walls of Jericho fell down.
It was to encourage the hope of Israel, with reference to the remaining difficulties that were before them. That suggestion of the evil spies, that Canaan could never be conquered, because the cities were walled up to heaven, (Deut. 1. 28.) would by this be for ever silenced. The strongest and highest walls cannot hold out against Omnipotence; they needed not to fright, and therefore needed not to fear, because God fought for them.

6. And Joshua the son of Nun called the priests, and said unto them, Take up the ark of the covenant, and let seven priests bear seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the Lord. 7. And he said unto the people, Pass on, and compass the city, and let him that is armed pass on before the ark of the Lord. 8. And it came to pass, when Joshua had spoken unto the people, that the seven priests bearing the seven trumpets of rams' horns passed on before the Lord, and blew with the trumpets; and the ark of the covenant of the Lord followed them. 9. And the armed men went before the priests that blew with the trumpets, and the rearward came after the ark, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets. 10. And Joshua commanded the people, saying, Ye shall not shout nor make any noise with your voice, neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth, until the day I bid you shout; then shall ye shout. 11. So the ark of the Lord compassed the city, going about it once: and they came into the camp, and lodged in the camp. 12. And Joshua rose early in the morning, and the priests took up the ark of the Lord. 13. And seven priests, bearing seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the Lord, went on continually, and blew with the trumpets: and the armed men went before them but the rearward came after the ark of the Lord, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets. 14. And the second day they compassed the city once, and returned into the camp: so they did six days. 15. And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they rose early about the dawning of the day, and compassed the city after the same manner seven times: only on that day they compassed the city seven times. 16. And it came to pass at the seventh time, when the priests blew with the trumpets, Joshua said unto the people, Shout; for the Lord hath given you the city.

We have here an account of the cavalcade which Israel made about Jericho, the orders Joshua gave concerning it, as he had received them from the Lord, and their punctual observance of these orders. We do not find that he gave the people the express assurances God had given him, that he would deliver the city into their hands; he tried whether they would obey orders with a general confidence that it would end well, and we find them very observant both of God and Joshua.

I. Wherever the ark went the people attended it, v. 9. The armed men went before it to clear the way, not thinking it any advantage to keep near the ark, to be pioneers to the ark of God. If any obstacle should be found in crossing all the roads that led to the city, (which they must do in walking round it,) they would remove it; if any opposition should be made by the enemy, they would encounter it, that the priests' march with the ark might be easy and safe. It is an honour to the greatest of men to do any good offices for those that are styling under God's protection, and to send them forward in the religion in their country. The rearward, either another body of armed men, or Dan's squadron, which marched last through the wilderness, or, as some think, the multitude of the people who were not armed or disciplined for war, (as many of them as would,) followed the ark, to testify their respect to it, to grace the solemnity, and to be witnesses of what was done. Every faithful zealous Israelite did their utmost to help in the work, and to share in the same hazard with the priests that bare the ark.

II. Seven priests went immediately before the ark, having trumpets in their hands, with which they were continually sounding, v. 4, 5, 9, 13. The priests were God's ministers, and thus in his name, 1. They proclaimed war with the Canaanites, and so struck a terror upon them; for by terrors upon their spirits they were to be conquered and subdued. Thus God's ministers, by the solemn declarations of his wrath against all ungodliness, and unrighteousness of men, must blow the trumpet in Sion, and sound an alarm in the holy mountain, that the sinners in Sion may be afraid. They are God's heralds to denounce war against all those that go on still in their trespasses, but say, "We shall have peace, though we go on." 2. They proclaimed God's gracious presence with Israel, and so put life and courage into them. It was appointed that when they went to war, the priests should encourage them with the assurance of God's presence with them, Deut. 20. 2... 4. And particularly their blowing with trumpets was to be a sign to the people, that they should be remembered before the Lord their God in the day of battle, Num. 10. 9. It encouraged Abijah, 2 Chron. 13. 12. Thus their thunders by sounding forth the jubilee note of the everlasting gospel, which proclaims liberty and victory, must encourage the good soldiers of Jesus Christ in their spiritual warfare.

III. The trumpets they used, were not these silver trumpets which were appointed to be made for their ordinary service, but trumpets of rams' horns, bored hollow for the purpose, as some think; these trumpets were of the basest matter, dully sounding, goad-like to show that the excellency of the power might be of God. Thus by the foolishness of preaching, fitly compared to the sounding of these rams' horns, the devil's kingdom is thrown down, and the weapons of our warfare, though they are not carnal, nor seem to a carnal eye likely to bring any thing to pass, are yet mighty through God to the pulling down of strong-holds, 2 Cor. 10. 4, 5. The word here translated 'trumpet' is, such trumpets as they used to blow withal in the year of jubilee; many interpreters understand it so, as signifying the complete liberty to which Israel was now brought, and the bringing of the land of Canaan into the hands of its just and rightful owners.

IV. All the people were commanded to be silent, not to speak a word, nor make any noise, v. 10, that they might the more carefully attend to the sound of the sacred trumpets, which they now were to look upon as the voice of God among them; and it does not become us to speak when God is speaking. It likewise intimates their reverent expectation of the event, Zech. 2. 13, Be silent, O all flesh before the Lord. Exod. 14. 14, God shall fight, and ye shall hold your peace.

V. They were to do this once a day for six days together, and seven times the seventh day, v. 14, 15. God could have caused the walls of Jericho to fall upon the first surrounding of them, but they must go round them thirteen times before they fall, that they might be kept waiting patiently for the Lord. Though they were lately come into Canaan, and their time was very precious, (for they had a great deal of work before them,) yet they must linger so many days about Jericho, seeming to do nothing, nor to make any progress in their business. As promised deliverances must be expected, God's way, so they must be expected in his time. He that believes, does not make haste, nor more haste than God would have him make. Go yet seven times before any thing hopeful appears, 1 Kings 18. 43.

VI. One of these days must needs be a sabbath-day, and the Jews say that it was the last, but that is not certain; however, if he that appointed them to rest on the other sabbath-days, appointed them to work on this, they were not so much as to justify them in it; he never intended to bind himself by his own laws, but that when he pleased him might dispense with them. The impotent man went upon this principle when he argued, John 5. 11, He that made me whole (and therefore has a divine power,) he said unto me, Take up thy bed. And in this case here, it was an honour to the sabbath-day, by which our time is divided into weeks, that just so much work in this work, and seven priests were employed to sound seven trumpets; that number being, on this occasion, as well as many others, made remarkable, in remembrance of the six days' work of creation, and the seventh day's rest from it. And, besides, the law of the sabbath forbids our own work, which is servile and secular, but this which they did, was a religious act. It is certainly no breach of the sabbath rest, therefore, for the sake of which the rest was instituted; and what is the sabbath-work but to attend the ark in all its motions?

VII. They continued to do this, during the time appointed, and seven times the seventh day, though they saw not any effect of it, believing that at the end the vision would speak and not lie, Hab. 2. 3. If we persevere in the way of duty, we shall lose nothing by it in the long run. It is probable they walked at such a distance from the walls, as to be out of the reach of the enemies' arrows, and out of the hearing of their scoffs. We may suppose the oddness of the thing did at first amuse the besieged, but by the seventh day they were grown secure, feeling no harm from that, which perhaps they looked upon as an enchantment. Probably, they bantered the besiegers, as they, Neh. 4. 2, "What do these feeble Jews? Is this the people they thought so formidable? Are these their methods of attack?" Thus they cried Peace and Safety, that the destruction might be the more terrible when it came. Wicked men (says Bishop Hall) think God in jest when he is preparing for their judgment; but they will be convinced of their mistake when it is too late.

VIII. At last they were to give a shout, and did so, and immediately the walls fell, v. 16. This was a shout for mastery, a triumphant shout, the shout of a king is among them, Numb. 23. 21. This was a shout of faith; they believed that the walls of Jericho would fall, and by that faith they were thrown down. It was a shout of prayer, an echo to the sound of the trumpets which proclaimed the promise that God would remember them; with one accord, as one man, they cry to heaven for help, and help comes in. Some allude to this to show that we must never expect a complete victory over our own corruptions till the very evening of our last day, and then we shall shout in triumph over them, when we come to the number and mastery of our Israelite gods. Bishop Hall explains it, A good heart (says he) groans under the sense of his infirmities, faint would be rid of them, and strives and prays, but when all is done, until the end of the seventh day it cannot be; then judgment shall be brought forth unto victory. And at the end of time, when our Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, and the sound of a trumpet, Satan's kingdom shall be completely ruined, and not till then, when all opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be effectually and eternally put down.

17. And the city shall be assured, even it and all that are therein, to the Lord: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because she hid the messengers that we sent. 18. And you, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take off the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it. 19. But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the Lord: they shall come into the treasury of the Lord. 20. So the people shouted when the priests blew with the trumpets: and it came to pass, when the people heard the sound of the trumpet, and the people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city: 21. And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword. 22. But Joshua had said unto the two men that had spied out the country, Go into the harlot's house, and bring out thence the woman, and all that she hath, as ye have sworn unto her. 23. And the young men that were spies went in, and brought out Rahab, and her father, and her mother, and her brethren, and all that she had; and they brought out all her kindred, and left them without the camp of Israel. 24. And they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein: only the silver, and the gold, and the vessels of brass and of iron, they put into the treasury of the house of the Lord. 25. And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, and her father's household, and all that she had; and she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day; because she hid the messengers which Joshua sent to spy out Jericho. 26. And Joshua adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it. 27. So the LORD was with Joshua; and his fame was noise[d] throughout all the country.

The people had religiously observed the orders given them concerning the besieging of Jericho, and now at length Joshua had told them, v. 16, "The Lord hath given you the city, enter and take possession." Accordingly, in these verses we have, I. The rules they were to observe in taking possession; God gives it them, and therefore may direct it to what uses and intents, and clothe it with what provisos and limitations he thinks fit. It is given to them, to God, and therefore must be devoted to God, and perhaps the worst, of all the cities of Canaan.

I. The city must be burnt, and all the lives in it sacrificed without mercy to the justice of God. All this they knew was included in those words, v. 17. The city shall be a charem, a devoted thing, it and all therein, to the Lord; no life in it might be ransomed upon any terms, they must all be surely put to death, Lev. 27. 29. So He appoints, from whom as creatures they had received their lives, and from whose sinners they had forfeited them; and who may dispute his sentence? Is God unrighteous, who thus taketh vengeance? God forbid we should entertain such a thought! There was more of God seen in the taking of Jericho, than of any other of the cities of Canaan, and therefore that must be more than any other devoted to him. And the severe usage of this city would strike a terror upon all the rest and melt their hearts yet more before Israel. Oh! when this severity is ordered, Rahab and her family are excepted; she shall live and all that are with her. She had distinguished herself from her neighbours by the kindness she shewed to Israel, and therefore shall be distinguished from them by the speedy return of that kindness.

2. All the treasure of it, the money and plate and valuable goods, must be consecrated to the service of the tabernacle, and brought into the stock of dedicated things: The Jews say, because the city was taken on the sabbath-day. Thus God would be honoured by the beautifying and enriching of his tabernacle; thus preparation was made for the extraordinary expenses of his service; and thus the Israelites were taught not to set their hearts upon worldly wealth, nor to aim at heaping up abundance of it for themselves. God had promised them a land flowing with milk and honey, not a land abounding with silver and gold, for he would have them live comfortably in it, that they might serve him cheerfully, but not covet either to trade with distant countries, or to hoard for aftertimes. He would likewise have them reckon themselves enriched in the enriching of the tabernacle; and to think that which was laid up in God's house as truly their honour and wealth as if it had been laid up in their own.

A particular caution is given them to take heed of meddling with the forbidden spoil; for what was devoted to God, if they offered to appropriate it to their own use, would prove accursed to them; therefore, v. 18, "In any wise keep yourselves from the accursed things; you will find yourselves inclined to reach towards it, but check yourselves, frighten yourselves, lest you fall into any temptation to do with it." He speaks as if he foresaw the sin of Achan. We have an account of it in the next chapter, when he gives that reason for the caution, lest ye make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it, as it proved that Achan did.

II. The entrance that was opened to them into the city by the sudden fall of the walls, or at least that part of the wall over-against which they then were when they gave the shout, v. 20, The wall fell down flat, and, probably, killed abundance of people; the guards that stood sentinel upon it, or others that crowded upon it, to look at the Israelites that were walking around. We read of thousands killed by the fall of a wall, 1 Kings 20. 30. That which they trusted to for defence, proved their destruction. The sudden fall of the wall, no doubt, put the inhabitants into such a consternation, that they had no strength nor spirit to make any resistance, but they became an easy prey to the sword of Israel, and saw to how little purpose it was to shut their gates against a people that had the Lord on the head of them, Mic. 2. 13. Note, The God of heaven easily can, and certainly will, break down all the opposing power of his and his church's enemies. Gates of brass and bars of iron, before are as nothing as straw and rotten wood, Isa. 45. 1, 2. Who will bring me into the strong city? Will not thou, O God? Ps. 60. 9, 10. Thus shall Satan's kingdom fall, nor shall any prosper, that hardened themselves against God.

III. The execution of the orders given concern this devoted city. All that breathed, were put the sword; not only the men that were found in the city, but also the cattle and all that breathed. Though they cried for quarter, and begged ever earnestly for their lives, there was no room for compassion, pity must be forgotten, they utterly were destroyed, v. 21. If they had not had a divi warrant, under the seals of miracles for this execution, it could not have been justified, nor can justify the like now, when we are sure no such warrant can be produced. But being appointed by the righteous judge of heaven, whoever is not unrighteous in taking vengeance, they are to be applauded in doing it, as the faithful ministers of his justice. Work for God was then bloody work; and cursed was he that did it deceitfully, keeping back his sword from blood, Jer. 48. 10. But the spirit of the gospel is very different, for Christ came not to destroy men's lives but to save them, Luke 9. 56. Christ's victories were of another nature, the whole world was to be his, and we were to be his owners, as additional sacrifices to the divine justice. The cattle of the Israelites, when slain at the altar, were accepted as sacrifices for them, but the cattle of those Canaanites were required to be slain as sacrifices with them, for their iniquity was not to be purged with sacrifice and offering: both were for the glory of God. 2. The city was burnt with fire, and all that was in it, v. 24. The Israelites, perhaps, when they had taken Jericho, a large and well-built city, hoped they should have that for their head-quarters; but God will have them yet to dwell in tents, and therefore fires this nest, lest they should nestle in it. 3. All the silver and gold, and all those vessels which were capable of being purified by fire, were brought into the treasury of the house of the Lord; not that he needed it, but he would have honoured it, and the rest of his hosts, of their best, in particular, the God that gave the victory, and therefore might demand the spoil; either the whole, as here, or, as sometimes, a tenth, Heb. 7. 4.

IV. The preservation of Rahab the harlot, or inn-keeper, who perished not with them that believed not, Heb. 11. 31. The public faith was engaged for her safety, by the two spies, who acted therein as public persons; and therefore though the hurry they were in at the taking of the town, no doubt, was very great, yet Joshua took effectual care for her preservation. The same persons that she had secured, were employed to secure her, v. 22, 23. They were best able to do it, who knew her and her house, and they were fittest to do it, that it might appear it was for the sake of her kindness to them; that she useless, and had her life given her for a prey. All her kindred were saved with her; like Noah she believed to the saving of her house; and thus in faith Christ brings salvation to the house, Acts 16. 31. Some ask, how her house, which is said to have been up on the wall, ch. 2. 13, escaped falling with the wall; we are sure it did escape, for she and her relations were safe in it; either though it joined so near to the wall as to be said to be upon it, yet it was so far off as not to fall either with the wall or under it; or rather that part of the wall on which her house stood, fell not. Now being preserved alive, 1. She was left for some time without the camp to be purified from the gentle superstition, which she was to renounce, and to be distributed for her admission as a proselyte. 2. She was in due time incorporated with the church of Israel, and she and her posterity dwelt in Israel, and her family was remarkable long after. We find her the wife of Salmon, prince of Judah, mother of Boaz, and named among the ancestors of our Saviour, Matt. 1. 5. Having received Israelites in the name of Israelites, she had an Israelite's reward. Bishop Pearson's promise of the habitation of the harlot, and admitting her into Israel, was a figure of Christ's receiving into his kingdom, and entering there, the publicans and the harlots, Matt. 21. 31. Or it may be applied to the conversion of the Gentiles.

V. Jericho is condemned to a perpetual desolation, and a curse pronounced upon the man that at any time hereafter should offer to rebuild it, v. 26. Jericho. This is a happy striking of that is, the elders and the people of Israel, not only by their own consent, obliging themselves and their posterity never to rebuild this city, but by the divine appointment; God himself having forbidden it under the severe penalty here annexed. 1. God would hereby show the weight of a divine curse; where it rests there is no contending with it nor getting from under it; it brings ruin within the city or realm. 2. By it would it remain in its ruins a standing monument of his wrath against the Canaanites, when the measure of their iniquity was full; and of his mercy to his people, when the time was come for their settlement in Canaan. The desolations of their enemies were witnesses of his favour to them, and would upbraíd them with their ingratitude to that God who had done so much for them. The situation of the city was very pleasant, and probably, its nearness to Jordan was an advantage to it, which would tempt men to build up upon the same spot; but they are here told it is at their peril if they do it. Men build for their posterity, but he that builds Jericho, shall have no posterity to enjoy what he builds; his eldest son shall die when he begins the work, and if he take not warming by that stroke to desist, but will go on presumptuously, the finishing of his work shall be attended with the funeral of his sons, and we may suppose, those all the rest cut off between. This curse, not being a curse causeless, did come upon that man who long after rebuilt Jericho, 1 Kings 16. 34. but we are not to think it made the place over the worse when it was built, or brought any hurt to them that inhabited it. We find Jericho afterw ward graced with the presence, not only of these two great prophets Elijah and Elisha, but of our blessed Saviour himself, Luke 18. 35. Note, Though the children of Israel, in the ignorance of a dangerous thing to attempt the building up of that which God will have to be destroyed. See Mal. 1. 4.

Lastly, All this magnified Joshua and raised his reputation, v. 27. it made him not only acceptable to Israel, but formidable to the Canaanites, because it appeared that God was with him of a truth: the Word of the Lord was with him, so the Chaldee, even Christ himself, the same that was with Moses. Nothing can more raise a man's reputation, nor make him appear more truly great, than to have the evidences of God's presence with him.

CHAP. VII.

More than once we have found the affairs of Israel, then when they were in the happiest posture, and gave the most hopeful prospects, perplexed and embarrassed by sin, and a stop thereby put to the most promising proceedings. The golden calf, the murmuring at Kadesh, and the iniquity of Phoeb, had broken their measures and given them great disturbance; and in this chapter we have such another instance of the interposition given to the progress of their arms by sin. But it being only the sin of one person or family, and soon expiated, the consequences were not so mischievous as of those of Joshua's. But however it served to let them know that they were still upon their good behaviour. We have here, I. The sin of Achan in meddleling with the accursed thing: for Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took of the accursed thing: and the anger of the Lord was kindled against the children of Israel. 2. And Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai, which is beside Beth-aven, on the east side of Beth-el, and spake unto them, saying, Go up and view the country. And the men went up and viewed Ai. 3. And they returned to Joshua, and said unto him, Let not all the people go up; but let about two or three thousand men go up and smite Ai; and make not all the people to labour thither; for they are but few. 4. So there went up thither of the people about three thousand men: and they fled before the men of Ai. 5. And the men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men: for they chased them from before the gate even unto Shebarim, and smote them in the going down; wherefore the hearts of the people melted, and became as water.

The story of this chapter begins with a but. The Lord was with Joshua, and his fame was noised through all that country; so the foregoing chapter ends, and it left no room to doubt but that he would go on as he had begun, conquering and to conquer. He did right, and observed his orders in every thing. But the children of Israel committed a tres pass, and so set God against them; and then even Joshua's name was not mentioned, his instance or the thing could do them no service. If we lose our God, we lose our friends, who cannot help us unless God be for us. Now here is,

I. Achan sinning; v. 1. Here is only a general mention made of the sin, we shall afterward have a more particular account of it from his own mouth. The sin is here said to be taking of the accursed thing, in disobedience to the command, and in defiance of the threatening, ch. 6. 19. In the sucking of Jericho, orders were given, that they should neither spare any lives, nor take any treasure to themselves; we read not of the breach of the former prohibition, (there were none to whom they showed any mercy,) but of the latter. Compasion was put off, and yielded to the law, but covetousness was indulged. The love of the world is the root of bitterness, which of all others is most hardly rooted up. Yet the history of Achan is a plain intimation that he of all the thousands of Israel was the only delinquent in this matter. Had there been more in like manner guilty, no doubt we should have heard of it; and it is strange there were no more. The temptation was strong, it was easy to suggest what a pity it was that so many thousands of Israel had not died. But would it have been easy to keep their ground, now they were under guilt and wrath, than this small party, and to them the defeat would have been much more grievous and dishonourable. However, it was bad enough as it was, and served, (1.) To humble God's Israel, and to teach them always to rejoice with trembling. Let not him that girdeth on the harness boast as he that putteth it off. (2.) To harden the Canaanites, and to make them more secure, notwithstanding the terrors they had been struck with, that their ruin, when it came, might be the more dreadful. (3.) To be an evidence of God's displeasure against Israel, and a call to them to purge out the old leaven. And this was principally intended in their defeat.

2. The retreat of this party in disorder, put the whole camp of Israel into a fright; the hearts of the people were smitten, not so much for the loss as for the disappointment. Joshua had assured them that the living God would without fail drive out the Canaanites from before them, ch. 3. 10. How can this event he reconciled to that promise? To every thinking man among them it appeared an indication of God's displeasure, and an omen of something worse, and therefore no marvel it put them in such a consternation; if God turn to be their enemy and fight against them, what will become of them? True Israelites tremble when God is angry.

3. And Joshua rent his clothes, and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the Lord until the even-tide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads. 7. And Joshua said, Alas! O Lord God, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? Would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan! O Lord, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their back before their enemies! 9. For the Cannanites, and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us around, and cut off our name from the earth: and what will thou do unto thy great name?

We have here an account of the deep concern Joshua was in, upon this sad occasion. He, as a public person, interested himself more than any other in this public loss; and is therein an example to princes and great men, and teaches them to lay much to heart the calamities that befall their people: he is also a type of Christ, to whom the blood of his subjects is precious, Ps. 72. 14.

Observe, 1. How he grieved; he rent his clothes, v. 6. in token of great sorrow for this public disaster, and especially a dread of God's displeasure, which was certainly the cause of it. Had it been but the common chance of war, (as we are too apt to express it,) it had not become a General to droop thus under it: but when God was angry, it was his duty to honour and feel thus. One of the bravest soldiers that ever was, owned that his first trembled for fear of God, Ps. 119, 150. Now had not himself under the hand of God, he fell to the earth upon his face, not thinking it any disarrayment to him to lie thus low before the great God, to whom he directed this token of reverence, by keeping his eye toward the ark of the Lord. The elders of Israel, being interested in the cause, and influenced by his example, prostrated themselves with him, and, in token of deep humiliation, put dust upon their heads, not only as mourners, but to signify that he was not for some sin or other, that God did thus contend with them, (though they knew not what it was,) they humbled themselves before God, and thus deprecated the progress of his wrath. This they continued until even-tide, to show that it was not the result of a sudden feeling, but proceeded from a deep conviction of their misery and danger if God were any way provoked to depart from them. Joshua, in the full force of his powers for their misinformation concerning the strength of the enemy, nor upon the soldiers for their cowardice, though perhaps both were blame-worthy, but his eye was set upon God, for is there any evil in the camp, and he has not done it? His eye is upon God as displeased, and that troubles him.

11. How he prayed, or pleaded rather, humbly everywhere for the case with God; not sullen, as David when the Lord had made a breach upon Uzzah, but much affected; his spirit seemed to be somewhat ruffled and discomposed, yet not so as to be put out of frame for prayer; but by giving vent to his trouble in an humble address to God, he keeps his temper, and it ends well.

1. Now he wishes they had all taken up with the lot of the two tribes on the other side Jordan, v. 7. He thinks it had been better to have entered there and been cut short, than come hither to be cut off. This savours too much of discontent and distrust of God, and cannot be justified, though the surprise and disappointment to one deeply concerned for the public interest may in part excuse it. Those words, Wherefore hast thou brought us over Jordan to destroy us? are too like what the murmurers often said, Exod. 14. 11, 12. 16. 3.—17. 3. Numbr. 14. 2, 3. but he that seizes the heart, removes the fear, from another spirit, and therefore was not extreme to mark what he said amiss. Had Joshua considered that this disorder which their affairs were put into, no doubt, proceeded from something amiss, which yet might easily be redressed, and all set to rights again, (as often in his predecessor's time) he would have not spoken of it as a thing taken for granted, that they were delivered into the hands of the Amorites to be destroyed. God knows what he does, though we do not; but this we may be sure of, he never did, nor ever will, do us any wrong.

3. He pleads the danger Israel was now in of being ruined; he gives up all for gone. "The Canaanites shew us they are strong, and hardened to death, that now our defence is departed, and the scales turned in their favour, we shall be in their eyes as contemnible as ever we were formidable, and they shall cut off our name from the earth," v. 9. Thus even good men, when things go against them a little, are too apt to fear the worst, and make harder conclusions than there is reason for. But this comes in here as a plea; "Lord, let not Israel's name, which has been so dear to thee and so great in the world, be cut off."

4. He pleads the reproach that would be cast on God, and that if Israel were ruined, his glory would suffer by it. They will cut off our name, says he, yet as if he had corrected himself for insisting upon that, it is no great matter (thinks he) what comes of our little name, (the cutting off of that will be a small loss,) but what will thou do for thy great name? This he looks upon and laments as the great aggravation to the calamity, he feared it would reflect on God, his wisdom and power, his goodness and faithfulness; what would the Egyptians say? Note, Nothing is more grievous to a gracious soul than dishonour done to God's name. This also he insists upon as a plea for the preventing of his fears, and a return of God's favour; it is the only word in all his address, that has any encouragement in it, and he concludes with it, leaving it to this issue, Father, glorify thy name. The name of God is a great name, above every name; and whatever happens, we ought to believe that he will, and pray that he would, work for his own name, that that may not be polluted. This should be our concern more than any thing else, on this we must fix our eye as the end of all our desires, and from this we must fetch our encouragement as the foundation of all our hopes; we cannot urge a better plea than this, Lord, what wilt thou do for thy great name? Let God in all be glorified, and then welcome his whole will.

10. And the Lord said unto Joshua, Get thee up; wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face? 11. Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed my covenant which I commanded them: for they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff. 12. Therefore the children of Israel could not stand before their enemies, but turned their backs before their enemies, because they were accursed: neither will I be with you any more, except ye destroy the accursed from among you. 13. Up, sanctify the people, and say, Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow: for thus saith the Lord God of Israel, There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel: thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye take away the accursed thing from among you. 14. In the morning therefore ye shall be brought according to your tribes: and it shall be, that the tribe which the Lord
We have here God's answer to Joshua's address, which, we may suppose, came from the oracle over the ark, before which Joshua had prostrated himself. v. 6. Those that desire to know the will of God, must attend with their desires upon the lively oracles, and wait at wisdom's gates for wisdom's dictates, Prov. 8. 34. And let those that find themselves under the tokens of God's displeasure, never complain of him, but complain to him, and they shall receive an answer of peace. The answer came immediately, while he was yet speaking, Isa. 63. 18. v. 9. 20. 24.

I. God encourages Joshua against his present despondencies, and the black and melancholy apprehensions he had of the present posture of Israel's affairs, v. 10. "Get thee up, suffer not thy spirits to droop and sink thus, wherefore hast thou thus upon thy face?" No doubt, Joshua did well to humble himself before God, and mourn as he did, under the tokens of his displeasure; but now God tells him, it was enough, he would not have him continue any longer in that melancholy posture, for God delights not in the grief of penitents when they afflict their souls, further than as it qualifies them for pardon and peace; the days even of that mourning must be ended. Arise, shake thyself from the dust, Isa. 52. 2. Joshua continued his mourning till even-tide, v. 6. so late, that they could do nothing that night toward the discovery of the criminal, but were forced to put it off till next morning. Daniel (ch. 9. 21.) and Ezra (ch. 9. 5, 6.) continued their mourning only till the time of the evening sacrifice; that revived them both, but Joshua went past that time, and therefore is thus roused; "Get thee up, do not lie all night there." Yet we find that Moses fell down before the Lord forty days and forty nights, to make intercession for Israel, Deut. 9. 18. Joshua must get up because he has other work to do than lie there; the accused thing must be discovered and cast out, and the sooner the better; Joshua is the man that must do it, and therefore it is time for him to lay aside his mourning weeds, and put on his judge's robes, and clothe himself with zeal as a elect; weeping must not hinder sowing, nor one duty of religion justly cut another. Every thing is beautiful in its season. Shechaniah perhaps had an eye to this in what he said to Ezra upon a like occasion. See Ezra 10. 2-4.

II. He informs him of the true and only cause of this disaster, and shows him wherefore he contended with them, v. 11. Israel hath sinned. "Think not that God's mind is changed, his arm shortened, or his promise about to fail; no, it is sin, it is sin, that great mischief-maker, that has stopped the current of divine favours, and has made this breach upon you. A sound judgment should teach you, that all things are described; but it is spoken of as the act of Israel in general, till they have fastened it upon the particular person, and their godly sorrow have so wrought a clearing of themselves, as the r's did, 2 Cor. 7. 11. Observe how the sin is here made to appear exceeding sinful. 1. They have transgressed my covenant, an express precept with a penalty annexed to it. It was agreed, that God should have all the spoil of Jericho, and they should have the spoil of the rest of the cities of Canaan, but in robbing God of his part, they transgressed this covenant. 2. They have even taken of the devoted thing, in contempt of the curse which was so solemnly denounced against them, that should, if they had not transgressed God's property, as if that curse had nothing in it formidable. 3. They have also stolen; they did it clandestinely, as if they could conceal it from the divine omniscience, and they were ready to say, The Lord shall not see, or will not miss so small a matter out of so great a spoil. Thus thou thoughtest I was altogether such a one as thyself. 4. They have dissembled also. Probably, when the action was over again, and all were called and examined of them, whether they had faithfully disposed of the spoil according to the divine command, and charged them, if they knew of any transgression, they should discover it; but Achai joined with the rest in a general protestation of innocency, and kept his countenance, like the adulterous woman that eats and hides her mouth, and says, I have done no wickedness. Nay, 5. They have put the accused thing among the accursed thing, and hearkened to them, and made good a title to that as to any thing they have; never expecting to be called to an account, nor designing to make restitution. All this Joshua, though a wise and vigilant ruler, knew nothing of, till God told him, who knows all the secret wickedness that is in the world, which men know nothing of. God could at this time have told him who the person was that had done this thing, but does not. (1.) To exercise the zeal of Joshua and Israel, in searching out the criminal. (2.) To give the sinner himself space to repent and make confession. Joshua, no doubt, proclaimed immediately throughout the camp, that there was such a transgression committed, upon which, if Achai had surrendered himself, and penitently owned his guilt, and prevented the scrutiny, who knows but he might have had the benefit of that law which accepted of a trespass-offering, with restitution, from those that had sinned through ignorance in the holy things of the law? Lev. 5. 15. 16. But Achai never discovering himself till the lot discovered him, evinced the hardness of his heart, and therefore he found no mercy.

III. He awakens him to inquire further into it, by telling him, 1. That this was the only ground for the controversy God had with them, this, and nothing else; so that when this accused thing was put away, he needed not fear, all would be well, the ruin of their successees, when this one obstruction was removed, would run as strong as ever. 2. That if this accused thing were not destroyed, they could not expect the return of God's gracious presence; in plain terms, neither will I be with you any more as I have been, except ye destroy the accused, that is, the accused person, who is made so by the accused thing. That which is accused, will be destroyed; but he that is intrusted with the word, hear it in vain, if they make it not a terror to that wickedness which brings these judgments of God on a land. By personal repentance and reformation, we destroy the accused thing in our own hearts, and unless we do that, we must never expect the favour of the blessed God. Let all men know that it is nothing but sin that separates between them and God, and if that be not sincerely renounced, it will not be removed. IV. He directs him in what method to make this inquiry and prosecution. 1. He must sanctify the people, now over-night, that is, as it is explained, he must command them to sanctify themselves, v. 13. And what can either magistrates or ministers do more toward sanctification? They must put themselves into a suitable frame to appear before God, and submit to the divine scrutiny; must examine themselves, now that God was coming to examine them; must prepare to meet their God. They were called to sanctify themselves, when they were to receive the divine law, Exod. 19. and now also when they were to come under the divine judgment; in order to be attuned to the most impiety. There is an accrued thing in the midst of thee, and therefore sanctify yourselves, that is, "Let all that are innocent, be able to clear themselves, and be the more careful to cleanse themselves: the sins of others may be improved by us, as furtherances of our sanctification, as the scandal of the incestuous Corinthian occasioned a blessed reformation in that church, 2 Cor. 7. 11. 2. He must have them all, and must continue them, because the impiety of the lot is such a thing, and however casual it seems, is under the direction of infinite wisdom and justice; and to show, that when the sin of sinners finds them out, God is to be acknowledged in it; it is he that seizes them, and the arrests are in his name. God hath found out the impiety of thy servants, Gen. 44. 16. It is also intimated with what a certain and unerring judgment the righteous God does and will distinguish between the innocent and the guilty, so that though for a time they seem involved in the same condemnation, as the whole tribe did, when it was first taken by the lot, yet he who has his fan in his hand, will effectually provide for the taking out of the precious from the vile; so that though the righteous be of the same tribe, and family, and household, with the wicked, yet they shall never be treated as the wicked, Gen. 18. 25. 3. When the criminal was found out, he must be put to death without mercy, (Heb. 10. 28.) and with all the expressions of a holy detestation, v. 15. He and all that he has, must be burnt with fire, that there might be no remainder of the accursed thing among them; and the reason given for this severe sentence, is, because the criminal has, (1.) Given a great affront to God, he has transgressed the covenant of the Lord, who is jealous particularly for the honour of the holy covenant. (2.) He has done a great injury to the church of God, he has wronged folly in Israel, has shamed that nation which is looked upon by all its neighbours as a wise and an understanding people; has infected that nation which is sanctified to God, and troubled that nation of which He is the Protector. These being crimes so heinous in their nature, and of such pernicious consequence and example, the execution, which otherwise would have come under the imputation of cruelty, is to be applauded as a piece of necessary justice. It was sacrifice, it was invading God's rights, alienating his property, and converting to a private use that which was devoted to his glory, and appropriated to the service of his sanctuary—this was the crime to be thus severely punished, for warning to all people in all ages to take heed how they rob God.

16. So Joshua rose up early in the morning, and brought Israel by their tribes; and the tribe of Judah was taken: 17. And he brought the family of Judah: and he took the family of the Zarehites: and he brought the family of the Zarhites man by man; and Zabdi was taken: 18. And he brought his household man by man; and Achan, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken. 19. And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me. 20. And Achan answered Joshua and said, Indeed I have sinned against the Lord God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done: 21. When I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it. 22. So Joshua sent messengers, and they ran unto the tent; and, behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it. 23. And they took them out of the midst of the tent, and brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel, and hid them out before the Lord. 24. And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan, the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor. 25. And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? the Lord shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire after they had stoned them with stones. 26. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day. So the Lord turned from the fierceness of his anger. Wherefore the name of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day.

We have in these verses, I. The discovery of Achan by the lot, which proved a perfect lot, though it proceeded gradually. Though we may suppose that Joshua slept the better, and with more ease and satisfaction, when he knew the worst of the disease of that body, which, under God, he was the head of, and which was put into a certain method of cure, yet he rose up early in the morning, v. 16. so much was his heart upon it, to put away the accursed thing. We have found Joshua upon other occasions an early riser, here, it shows his zeal and vehement desire to see Israel restored to the divine favour. In the scrutiny observe, 1. That the guilty tribe was that of Judah, which was, and was to be, of all the tribes the most honourable and illustrious; this was an allay to their dignity, and might serve as a check to their pride, that the sons of the other tribes might be disposed to offer excuses, here was one that was its reproach. Let not the best families think it strange, if there be those found in them, and descending from them, that prove their grief and shame. Judah was to have the first and largest lot in Canaan, the more inexcusable is one of that tribe, if, not content to wait for his own share, he break in upon God's property.
The Jews' tradition is, that when the tribe of Judah was taken, the valiant men of that tribe drew their swords, and pretended they would not sheathe them again till they saw the criminal punished, and themselves cleared who knew their own innocence.
1. That the guilty person was put to death, according to the law, Gen. 34 v. 21. That a man's-helper, and the man, shall be put to death. Thus the man, v. 18.
It was strange that Achan, being conscientious to himself of guilt, when he saw the lot come nearer and nearer to him, had not either the wit to make an escape, or the grace to make a confession;
but his heart was hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, and it proved to be to his own destruction. We may well imagine how his countenance ingaged, when he was singled out as the delinquent, when the eyes of all Israel were fastened upon him, and every one was ready to say, Have we found thee, O our enemy? See here, (1.) The folly of those that promise themselves secrecy in sin; the righteous God has many ways of bringing to light the hidden works of darkness, and so bringing to tame and ruin those that continue their fellishness with secret complacency. Jesus, v. 19. (2.) When God pleases, shall carry the voice, Eccl. 10.
20. See Ps. 94. 7, Etc. (2.) How much it is our concern, when God is contending with us, to find out what the cause of action is, what the particular sin is, that, like Achan, troubles our camp. We must thus examine ourselves and carefully review the records of conscience, that we may dive out the accursed thing, and pray earnestly with the holy Job, Lord, show me wherefore thou contest with me. Discor er the traitor, and he shall no longer be harboured.
II. His arraignment and examination, v. 19.
Joshua sits judge, and through abundantly satisfied of his guilt by the determination of the lot, yet urges him to make a penitent confession, that his soul might be saved by it in the other world, though he could not give him any encouragement to hope that the sin, so far as he appeared, could be covered by it. How he accepts him, with the greatest mildness and tenderness that could be, like a true disciple of Moses. He might at first have called him "thief," and "rebel," "Raca," and "thou fool," but he calls him "son;" he might have adjured him to confess, as the High Priest did our blessed Saviour, or threatened him with the torture to extort a confession, make him an example, I pray thee, make con fession. This is an example to all, not to insult over those that are in misery, though they have brought themselves into it by their own wickedness, but to treat even offenders with the spirit of meekness, not knowing what we ourselves should have been and done, if God had put us into the hand of our own counsels. It is likewise an example to magistrates, in executing justice, to consider the tender age, the infirmities, the inpatient hand, and never suffer themselves to be transported by them into any indecencies of behaviour or language, no, not towards those that have given the greatest provocations. The wrath of man work-eth not the righteousness of God. Let them remember the judgment is God's, who is Lord of his anger. This is the likeliest method of bringing offenders to repentance. 2. What he wishes him to do is, to confess the fact, to confess it to God, the party offended by the crime; Joshua was to him in God's stead, so that in confessing to him, he confessed to God. Hereby he would satisfy Joshua and the congregation concerning which was laid to his charge; his confession would also be an evidence of his repentance, and a warning to others to take heed of sinning after the similitude of his transgression: but that which Joshua aims at herein, is, that God might be honoured by it as the Lord, the God of infinite knowledge and power, from whom no secrets are hid; and as the God of Israel, who as he does particularly resent affronts given to his Israel, so he does the affronts given him by Israel. Note, In confessing sin, as we take shame out of ourselves, so we give glory to God, as a righteous God, owning him that dispossesses us, and as a good God who will not improve our confessions as evidences against us, but is faithful and just to forgive, when we are brought to own that he would be faithful and just if he should punish. By sin we have injured God in his honour; Christ by his death has made satisfaction for the injury: but it is required, that we by repentance show our good-will to his honour, and, as far as in us lies, give glory to him.
Bishop Patrick quotes the Scripture chronicle, making Joshua to say here to Achan, Lift up thine eyes to the King of heaven and earth, and acknowledge that nothing can be hid from him who knoweth the greatest secrets.
III. His confession, which, now at last, when he saw it was to no purpose to conceal his crime, was free and ingenious enough, v. 20. Here is,
1. A confession of the crime, v. 20. Indeed I have sinned, what I am charged with is too true to be denied, and too bad to be excused. I own it, I lament it; the Lord is righteous in bringing it to light, for indeed I have sinned. This is the language of a penitent that is sick of his sin, and whose conscience is loaded with it. "I have nothing to accuse any one else of, but a great deal to say against myself; it is with me that the accursed thing is found, I am the man who have perverted that which was right, and it profited me not." And that where with he aggravates the sin, is, that it was committed against the Lord God of Israel. He was himself an Israelite, a sharer with the rest of that exalted nation in their privileges, so that, in offending the God of Israel, he offended his own God, which laid him under the guilt of the basest treachery and ingratitude imaginable.
2. A particular narrative of the fact, Thus and thus have I done. God had told Joshua in general, that a part of the devoted things was alienated, but leaves it to him to draw from Achan an account of the particulars; for, one way or other, God will make sinners' own tongues to fall upon themselves, (Pr 64. 8.) if he ever bring them to repentance, they will be their own accusers, and their awakenings and convictions will be instead of a thenud and witnesses. Note, It becomes penitents, in the confession of their sin to God, to be very particular, not only, "I have sinned," but, "In this and that instance I have sinned;" reflecting with regret upon all the steps that led to the sin, and all the circumstances that aggravated it and made it exceeding sinful; thus and thus have I done. He confesses, 1 To God he made it known, and to Jericho he found a goodly Babylonian garment; the word signifies a robe, such as princes wore when they appeared in state, probably it belonged to the king of Jericho; it was far-fetched, if fetched, as we translate it, from Babylon. A garment of divers colours, so some render it; whatever it was, in his eyes it made a glorious show; A thousand pitties" (think Achan). He puts it to him, it should be burnt, then will it do nobody any good, if I take it for my self, it will serve me many a year for my best garment. Under these pretences, he makes bold with this first, and thinks it no harm to save it from the fire; but his hand being thus in, he proceeds to take a bag of money, two hundred shekels, that is,
one hundred ounces of silver, and a wedge of gold which weighed fifty shekels, that is, twenty-five ounces. He could not plead that, in taking these, he saved them from the fire, (for the silver and gold laid up in the treasury,) but they that make a slight excuse to serve in daring to commit one sin, will have their hearts so hardened by that, that they will venture upon the next without such an excuse, for the way of sin is downhill. See what a poor prize it was for which Achan ran this desperate hazard, and what an unanswerable loser he was by the bargain. See Matt. 16. 26. (2.) He confesses the manner of taking them. [1.] They began in the eye. He says (like Eve) as Eve saw the forbidden fruit, and was strangely charmed with the sight. See what comes of suffering the heart to walk after the eyes, and what need we have to make this covenant with our eyes, that if they wander, they shall be sure to weep for it. Look not thou upon the vine that is red, upon the woman that is fair; close the right eye that thus offends thee, to prevent the necessity of flinching it out, and casting it from thee, Matt. 5. 29. [2.] It proceeded out of the heart. He owns, I coveted them. Thus lust conceived and brought forth this sin. They that would be kept from sinful actions, must mortify and check in themselves sinful desires, particularly the desire of worldly wealth, which we more particularly call covetousness. O what a world of evil is the love of money the root of! Had Achan looked upon these things with an eye of sense, he would not have coveted them, and would have dreaded them, but looking upon them with an eye of sense only, he saw them goodly things, and coveted them. It was not the looking, but the lusting, that ruined him. [3.] When he had committed it, he was very industrious to conceal it. Having taken of the forbidden treasures, fearing lest any search should be made for prohibited goods, he employed one that resolved to keep what he had gotten, and never to make restitution. Thus does Achan confess the whole matter, that God might be justified in the sentence passed upon him. See the deceitfulness of sin; that which is pleasing in the commission, is bitter in the reflection, at the last it bites like a serpent. Particularly, see what comes of ill-gotten goods, and how they will be chanted that rob God. He, in the next verse, is sentenced down rich, and he shall vomit them up again.

IV. His conviction. God had convicted him by the lot, he had convicted himself by his own confession; but that no room might be left for the most discontented Israelite to object against the process, Joshua has him further convicted by the searching of his tent, in which the goods were found which he confessed to. Particular notice is taken of the haste which the messengers made; they did not tarry to search, they ran to the tent, v. 22. Not only to show their readiness to obey Joshua’s orders, but to show how uneasy they were till the camp was cleared of the accursed thing, that they might regain the divine favour. They that feel themselves under wrath, find themselves concerned not to defer the putting away of sin. Delays are dangerous, and it is no time to trifle. When the stolen goods were brought to the altar laid up in the treasury, v. 23, that all Israel might see how plain the evidence was against Achan, and might adore the strictness of God’s judgments in punishing so severely the stealing of such small things, and yet the justice of his judgments in maintaining his right to devoted things, and might be afraid of ever offending in the like kind. In laying them out before the Lord, they acknowledged his title to them, and waited to receive his directions concerning them. Note, Those that think to put a cheat upon God, do but deceive themselves; what is taken from him, he will recover, Hos. 2. 9, and he will be a loser by no man at last.

V. His condemnation. Joshua passes sentence upon him, v. 25. Why hast thou troubled us? There is the ground of the sentence, O, how much hast thou troubled us? So some read it. He refers to what was said when the warning was given not to meddle with the accursed thing, ch. 6. 18, lest ye make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it. Note, Sin is a very troublesome thing, not only to a sinner himself, but to all about him. He that is greedy of gain, as Achan was, troubles his own house, Prov. 13. 27. So all the communities he belongs to. New (says Joshua) God shall trouble thee. See why Achan was so severely dealt with, not only because he had robbed God, but because he had troubled Israel; over his head he had (as it were) this accusation written, Achan, the troubleuer of Israel, as Ahab, 1 Kings 18. 18. This therefore is his doom, God shall trouble thee. Note, The righteous God will certainly recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people, 2 Thess. 1. 6. Those that are troublesome, shall be troubled. Some of the Jewish doctors, from that word, which determines the troubling of him to this day, infer, that therefore he should not be troubled in the world to come; the flesh was destroyed, that the spirit might be saved, and if so, the dispensation was really less severe than it seemed. In the description, both of his sin and of his punishment, by the word troublesome, that was in his time, and the application of his sentence to his name Achan, or, as he is called, 1 Chron. 2. 7, Achar, which signifies trouble. He did too much answer his name.

VI. His execution. No reprieve could be obtained, a gangrene member must be cut off immediately. When he is proved to be an anaehema, and the trouble of the camp, we may suppose all the people and the camp, would be so disturbed by the word, Achan, away with him! Stone him, stone him! Here is, 1. The place of execution: they brought him out of the camp, in token of their putting far from them that wicked person, 1 Cor. 5. 13. When our Lord Jesus was made a curse for us, that by his trouble we might have peace, he suffered as an accursed thing without the gate, bearing our reproach, Heb. 13. 12. 13. The execution was at a distance, that the camp was not defiled by Achan’s sin, might not be defiled by his death.

2. The persons employed in his execution; it was the act of all Israel, v. 24. 25. They were all spectatoors of it, that they might see and fear. Public executions are public examples. Nay, they were all consenting to his death, and as many as could, were active in it, in token of the universal detestation in which they held his sacrilegious attempt, and their dread of God’s displeasure against them.

3. The partakers with him in the punishment; for he perished not alone in his iniquity, ch. 22. 20. (1.) The stolen goods were destroyed with him, the garment burnt, as it should have been with the rest of the combustible things in Jericho, and the silver and gold defaced, melted, lost, and buried, in the ashes of the rest of his goods, under the heath of, so as need to be put to any other use. (2.) All his other goods, his vineyard, his sheep and oxen, were taken away, not only his tent, and the furniture of that, but his oxen, asses, and sheep; to show, that goods gotten unjustly, especially if they be gotten by sacrilege, will not only turn to no account, but will blast and waste the rest of the possessions to which they are added. The eagle in the fable, that stole flesh from the altar, brought a cake of fire with it, which burnt her nest, Hab. 2. 9, 10. Zach. 5. 3, 4. With them they lose their own, that grasp at more than their own. (3.) His sons and daughters were put to death with him. Some indeed think that they were brought out, (v. 24.) only to be the spectators of their father’s punishment, but most conclude that they died with him, and that the stock of which they were the progeny, v. 25. who had died, they burned them with fire after they had stoned them with stones. God had expressly provided that magistrates should not put the children to death for the father’s sins; but he did not intend to bind himself by that law, and in this case he had expressly ordered, v. 15. that the criminal and all that he had, should be burnt. Perhaps his sons and daughters were aiders and abettors in the villainy he had helped to carry off of the spoil of war, and it is very probable that they assisted in the concealment, and that he could not hide them in the midst of his tent, but they must know and keep his counsel, and so they became accessories ex post facto)—after the fact; and if they were ever so little partakers in the crime, it was so heinous, that they were justly sharers in the punishment. However, God was hereby glorified, and the judgment executed was thus made the more tremendous.

4. The punishment itself that was inflicted on him; he was stoned, some think, as a sabbath-breaker, supposing that the sacriilege was committed on the sabbath-day; and then his dead body was burnt as an accursed thing, of which there should be no remainder left. The concurrence of all the people in this execution, teaches us how much the perpetuation of sin, or the continuance of it in the body, should contribute what they can, in their places, to the suppression of vice and profaneness, and the reformation of manners; sin is a reproach to any people, and therefore every Israelite indeed will have a stone to throw at it.

5. The pacifying of God’s wrath hereby, v. 26. The Lord turned from the fierceness of his anger. The putting away, even by true repentance and reformation, as it is the only way, so it is the most effectual way, to recover the divine favour. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

VII. The record of his conviction and execution; care was taken to preserve the remembrance of it, for warning and instruction to posterity: 1. A heap of stones was raised on the place where Achan was executed, every one perhaps of the congregation that stood at the hinder part of his dejectation of the crime. 2. A new name was given to the place; it was called, the Valley of Achor, or Trouble. This was a perpetual brand of infamy upon Achan’s name, and a perpetual warning to all people not to invade God’s property. By this severity against Achan, the honour of Joshua’s government, now in the infancy of it, was maintained, and Israel, at their entrance upon the promised Canaan, were minded to observe, at their peril, the provisions and limitations of the grant by which they held it. The Valley of Achor is said to be given for a door of hope, because when we put away the accursed thing, then there begins to be hope in Israel, Hos. 2 15. Ezra 10. 2.

CHAP. VIII.

The embarrassment which Achan’s sin gave to the affairs of Israel being over, we have them here in a very good posture again, the affairs both of war and religion. Here is, 1. The glorious progress of their arms in the taking of Ai, v. 1-3. In which they had lately suffered disgrace, v. 4. 2. Joshua gives orders accordingly to the men of war, v. 3-8. The stratagem is managed as it was projected, and succeeds as it was desired, v. 9-22. 4. Joshua becomes master of this city, puts all to the sword, burns it, hangs the king, but gives the plunder to the soldiers, v. 23-24. II. The great solemnity of writing and reading the law before a general assembly of all Israel, drawn up for that purpose upon the two mountains of Gerizim and Ebal, according to an order which Moses had received from the Lord, and delivered to them, v. 30-35. Thus did they take their work before them, and make the business of their religion to keep pace with their secular business.

A N D the Lord said unto Joshua, Fear not, neither be thou dismayed: take all the people of war with thee, and arise, go up to Ai: see, I have given into thy hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land. 2. And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it.

Israel were very happy in having such a commander as Joshua, but Joshua was more happy in having such a director as God himself; when any difficulty occurred, he need not to call a council of war, who had God so nigh unto him, not only to answer, but even to prevent his inquiries. It should seem, Joshua was now at a stand, had scarcely recovered from the discomposure he was put into by the trouble Achan gave them, and could not think, without fear and trembling, of pushing forward, as they had done in the other cities; but if Joshua had thought it, then God spoke to him, either by vision, as before, ch. 5. as a man of war with his sword drawn, or by the breastplate of judgment. Note, When we have faithfully put away sin, that accursed thing, which separates between us and God, then, and not till then, we may expect to hear from God to our comfort, and God’s directing us how to go on in our work and warfare, and not to be surprised at the verdict of his being reconciled to us. Observe here,

I. The encouragement God gives to Joshua to proceed; Fear not, neither be thou dismayed, v. 1. This intimates that the sin of Achan, and the consequence of it, had been a very great discouragement to Joshua, and made his heart almost ready to fail. Corruptions within the church we ken the hands, and damp the spirits of her guides and helpers, more than do our aversions from without; treacherous Israelites are to be dreaded more than the malicious Canaanites. But God bids Joshua not to be dismayed; the same power that keeps Israel from being ruined by their enemies, shall keep them from ruining themselves. To animate him, 1. He assures him of success against Ai, tells him it is all his own; but he must take it as God’s gift, I have given it into thy hands, which secured him both the title and possession, and obliged him to give God the glory of both, Ps. 44. 3. 2. He allows the people to take the spoil to themselves. Here the spoil was not consecrated to God as that of Jericho, and therefore there was no danger of the people’s committing such a trespass as they had committed there. Observe, How Achan, who caught at forbidden spoil, lost that, and life, and all; but the city of Ai, who had with great difficulty retracted from the accursed thing, were quickly compensated for their obedience with the spoil of Ai; the way to have the comfort of what God allows us, is, to forbear what he forbids us. No man shall lose by his self-denial; let God have his ducats first, and then all will be clean to us and sure, 1 Kings 17. 13. God did not bring them to these goodly cities, and fill their houses with all good things, to tantalize them with the sight of that which they might have; but, having received the first-fruits from Jericho, the spoil of Ai, and of all the cities which from henceforward came into their hands, they might take for a prey to themselves.
II. The direction he gives him in attacking Ai. It must not be such a work of time as the taking of Jericho was, that would have prolonged the war too much; they that had patiently waited seven days for Jericho, shall have Ai given them in one day. Nor was it, as that, to be taken by miracle, and purely by the act of God, but now their own conduct and courage must be exercised; having seen God work for them, they must now bestir themselves. God directs him, I. To take all the people, that they might all be spectators of the action, and sharers in the spoil. Hereby God gave him a tacit rebuke for sending so small a detachment against Ai, in the former attempt upon it, ch. 7. 4. 2. To lay an ambush behind the city; this was a method which Joshua would not have thought of at this time, if God had not directed him to it; and though now we are not to expect direction, as here, by visions, voices, or oracles, yet whenever those who are instructed with public counsels, take prudent securities for the public good, it must be acknowledged that God puts it into their hearts; he that teaches the husbandman discretion, no doubt, teaches the statesman and general.

3. So Joshua arose, and all the people of war, to go up against Ai: and Joshua chose out thirty thousand mighty men of valour, and sent them away by night. 4. And he commanded them, saying, Behold, ye shall lie in wait against the city, even behind the city: go not very far from the city, but be ye all ready: 5. And I, and all the people that are with me, will approach unto the city: and it shall come to pass, when they come out against us, as at the first, that we will flee before them. 6. (For they will come out after us,) till we have drawn them from the city: for they will say, They flee before us, as at the first: therefore we will flee before them. 7. Then ye shall rise up from the ambush, and seize upon the city: for the Lord your God will deliver it into your hand. 8. And it shall be, when ye have taken the city, that ye shall set the city on fire: according to the commandment of the Lord shall ye do. See, I have commanded you. 9. Joshua therefore sent them forth: and they went to lie in ambush, and abode between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of Ai: but Joshua lodged that night among the people. 10. And Joshua rose up early in the morning, and numbered the people, and went up, he and the elders of Israel, before the people to Ai. 11. And all the people, even the people of war that were with him, went up, and drew nigh, and came before the city, and pitched on the north side of Ai: now there was a valley between them and Ai. 12. And he took about five thousand men, and set them to lie in ambush between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of the city. 13. And when they had set the people, even all the host that was on the north of the city, and their liers in wait on the west of the city, Joshua went that night into the midst of the valley. 14. And it came to pass, when the king of Ai saw it, that they hasted and rose up early, and the men of the city went out against Israel to battle, he and all his people, at a time appointed, before the plain; but he wist not that there were liers in ambush against him behind the city. 15. And Joshua and all Israel made as if they were beaten before them, and fled by the way of the wilderness. 16. And all the people that were in Ai were called together to pursue after them: and they pursued after Joshua, and were drawn away from the city. 17. And there was not a man left in Ai or Beth-el that went not out after Israel: and they left the city open, and pursued after Israel. 18. And the Lord said unto Joshua, Stretch out the spear that is in thy hand toward Ai; for I will give it into thine hand. And Joshua stretched out the spear that he had in his hand toward the city. 19. And the ambush arose quickly out of their place, and they ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand; and they entered into the city, and took it, and hasted, and set the city on fire. 20. And when the men of Ai looked behind them, they saw, and behold, the smoke of the city ascended up to heaven, and they had no power to flee this way or that way: and the people that fled to the wilderness turned back upon the pursuers. 21. And when Joshua and all Israel saw that the ambush had taken the city, and that the smoke of the city ascended, then they turned again, and slew the men of Ai. 22. And the other issued out of the city against them; so they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side, and some on that side: and they smote them, so that they let none of them remain or escape.

We have here an account of the taking of Ai by stratagem. The stratagem here used, we are sure, was lawful and good: God himself appointed it, and we have no reason to think, but that the like is lawful and good in other wars. Here was no league broken, no oath or promise violated, nor any thing like it; it was not by the pretense of a parley, or treaty of peace, that the advantage was gained, no, these are sacred things, and not to be jested with, nor used to serve a turn; truth, when once plighted, becomes a debt even to the enemy. But in this stratagem here was no untruth told; nothing was concealed but their own counsels, which no enemy ever pretended a right to be entrusted with; nothing was dissembled, nothing counterfeited but a retreat, which was no natural or necessary indication at all of their inability to maintain their onset, or of any design not to renew it; the enemy ought to have been upon their guard, and to have kept within the defence of their own walls; common prudence, had they been governed by it, would have directed them not to venture on the pursuit of an army which they saw was so far superior to them in numbers, and, leave their city unprovided for: but, "If ye will go with me, then ye shall see Jehovah's ark of the covenant go before me into the city." Now in the account here given of this matter,

I. There is some difficulty in adjusting the numbers that were employed to effect it. Mention is made, v. 3, of thirty thousand, that were chosen and sent away by night, to whom the charge was given to surprise the city as soon as ever they perceived it was evacuated, v. 4, 7, 8. And yet afterward, v. 12. It is said, Joshua took five thousand men, and set them to lie in ambush behind the city, and that ambush entered the city, and set it on fire, v. 19. Now, 1. Some think there were two parties sent out to lie in ambush, thirty thousand first, and afterward five thousand to guard the roads, and to intercept those of the city that might think to save themselves by flight, or to strengthen those that were first sent out; and that Joshua made his open attack upon the city, with all the thousands of Israel. So the learned Bishop Patrick, insisting upon God's command, v. 1, to take all the people of war with him. But, 2. Others think that all the people were taken only to encamp before the city, and that out of them Joshua chose out thirty thousand men to be employed in the action, out of which he sent five thousand to lie in ambush, which were as many as could be supposed to march incognito — without being discovered: (more would have been seen, and thus the design would have been broken;) and that then with the other twenty-five thousand he made the open attack, as Masius thinks, or with the thirty thousand, which, as Calvin thinks, he kept entire for that purpose, having, beside them, sent out five thousand for an ambuscade. And those five thousand (they think) must be meant by them, v. 3, which he sent away by night, with orders to lie in wait behind the city, though the particular number is not specified till v. 12. If we may admit such a seeming disturbance in the order of the passage, the things which our instances might be cited from the other scripture-histories,) it seems most probable that there was but one ambuscade, which consisted only of five thousand, enough for such a purpose.

II. Yet the principal parts of the story are plain enough, that a detachment being secretly marched behind the city, on the other side to that on which the main body of the army lay, (the situation of the city not being discernible to their concealment,) Joshua, and the forces with him, faced the city; the garrison made a vigorous sally out upon them, whereupon they withdrew, gave ground and retreated in some seeming disorder toward the wilderness; which being perceived by the men of Ai, they drew out all the force they had to pursue them. This gave a fair opportunity for them that lay in ambush to make them, even to the very gates of the city, and they had given notice, by a smoke to Joshua, he, with all his force, returned upon the pursuers, now, when it was too late, were aware of the snare they were drawn into, for their retreat being intercepted, they were every man of them cut off. The like artifice we find used, Judg. 20, 29, &c.

Now in this story we may observe,

1. What a brave commander Joshua was. See, (1.) His conduct and prudence. God gave him the hint, v. 2, that he should lay in ambush behind the city, but left him to himself to order the particulars, which he did admirably well. Doubtless, Wisdom strengthens the wise more than ten mighty men, Excl. 7. 19. (2.) His care and industry, v. 10. He rose up early in the morning, that he might lose no time, and so that he might show his mind was upon his business. Those that would maintain their spiritual conflicts, must not love their ease.

3. His courage and resolution; though an army of Israelites had been repulsed before Ai, yet he, in the name of God, with the forces in person in the second time, v. 5. Being himself also an elder, he took the elders of Israel with him to make this attack upon the city, v. 10. as if he were going rather to sit in judgment upon them as criminals, than to fight them as enemies. (4.) His caution and consideration, v. 13. He went that night into the midst of the valley, to make the necessary dispositions for an attack, and to see that every thing was in good order. It is the pious conjecture of the learned Bishop Patrick that he went into the valley alone to pray to God for a blessing upon his enterprise, and he did not seek in vain. (5.) His constancy and perseverance; when he had stretched out his spear toward the city, v. 18. (a spear almost as fatal and formidable to the enemies of Israel as the rod of Moses was) he never drew back his hand till the work was done. His hands in fighting, like Moses's in interceding, were stretched out against the whole host of the sun. Those that have stretched forth their hands against their spiritual enemies, must never draw them back. Lastly, What Joshua did in the stratagem is applicable to our Lord Jesus, of whom he was a type. Joshua conquered by yielding, as if he had himself been conquered; so our Lord Jesus, when he bowed his head and gave up the ghost, seemed as if death had triumphed over him; and as if he and all his interests had been rejected and ruined: but he rose again, and gave the powers of darkness a total defeat; he broke the serpent's head, by suffering him to bruise his heel. A glorious stratagem!

2. What an obedient people Israel was; what Joshua commanded them to do according to the command of the Lord, v. 8. they did it without murmuring or disputing. They that were sent to lie in ambush between Bethel and Ai, (two cities condemned by God's judgment,) did not neglect their business, and had they been discovered, might all have been cut off, and yet they ventured it; and when the body of the army retreated and fled, it was both disgraceful and perilous; and yet, in obedience to Joshua, they did it.

3. What an infuriated enemy the king of Ai was, (1.) That he did not by his scouts discover those that lay in ambush behind the city, v. 14. Some observe it as a remarkable instance of God in making men blind to their own interest, and the things that belong to their peace, that he waited not that there were lies in wait against him. They are most in danger, who are least aware that they are so. (2.) That when Israel seemed to fly, he drew out all his forces to pursue them, and left none to guard his city and to secure his retreat, v. 17. Thus the church's enemies often run themselves into destructions; they see not the cares and the extent of their rage against the Israel of God. Pharaoh plunged himself into the Red-sea by the eagerness with which he pursued Israel. (3.) That from the killing of thirty-six men out of three thousand, when Israel made the former attack upon his city, he should infer the total rout of so great an army as now he had to deal with, v. 6. They flee before us as at the first. See how the prosperity of fobs deeds and hardens them to their ruin. God had made use of the men of Ai as a scourge to chast-tise his people for meddling with the accused thing, and this had puffed them up with a conceit, that they must have the honour of delivering their country from these formidable invaders; but they were soon made to see their mistake, and that when the Israelites had reconciled themselves to their God, they could have no power against them. God had made use of them only for the rebuking of Israel, with a purpose, when the correction was over, to throw the rod itself into the fire; howbeit, they meant not so, but it was in their heart to destroy and cut off, Isa. 10. 5-7.

4. What a complete victory Israel obtained over them by the favour and blessing of God. Each did his part. The devil forthran off Israel, by signals agreed on, understood one another, and every thing proceeded according to the project; so that the men of Ai, then when they were most confident of victory, found themselves surrounded, so that they had neither spirit to resist nor room to fly, but were under a fatal necessity of yielding their lives to the destroyers. And now it is hard to say, whether the shouts of the men of Israel, or the shrieks of the men of Ai, were the louder, but easy to imagine what terror and confusion they were filled with, when their highest assurances sunk so suddenly into the heaviest despair. Note, The triumphing of the wicked is short, Job 20. 5. They are excited for a little while, that their fall and ruin may be the sorer, Job 24. 24. See how easily, how quickly, the scale turns against them that have not God on their side.

23. And the king of Ai they took alive, and brought him to Joshua. 24. And it came to pass, when Israel had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai in the field, in the wilderness wherein they chased them, and when they were all fallen on the edge of the sword, until they were consumed, that all the Israelites returned unto Ai, and smote it with the edge of the sword. 25. And so it was, that all that fell that day, both of men and women, were twelve thousand, even all the men of Ai. 26. For Joshua drew not his hand back, wherewith he stretched out the spear, until he had utterly destroyed all the inhabitants of Ai. 27. Only the cattle and the spoil of that city, Israel took for a prey unto themselves, according unto the word of the Lord, which he commanded Joshua. 28. And Joshua burnt Ai, and made it a heap for ever, even a desolation, unto this day. 29. And the king of Ai he hanged on a tree until even-tide: and as soon as the sun was down, Joshua commanded that they should take his carcase down from the tree, and cast it at the entering of the gate of the city, and raise thereon a great heap of stones, that remaineth unto this day.

We have here an account of the improvement which the Israelites made of their victory over Ai. 1. They put all to the sword, not only in the field, but in the city, man, woman, and child, none of them remained, v. 24. God, the righteous Judge, had passed this sentence upon them for their wickedness, so that the Israelites were only the ministers of his justice, and the executioners of his doom. Once in this story, and but once, mention is made of the men of Beth-el, as confederates with the men of Ai, v. 17. Though they had a king of their own, and were not subjects to the king of Ai, (for the king of Beth-el is reckoned among the thirty-one kings that Joshua destroyed, ch. 12. 16.) yet so; but whom a strong place, they threw themselves into that, for their own safety, and the strengthening of their neighbours' hands, and so (we may presume) were all cut off with them; thus, that by which they hoped to prevent their own ruin hastened it. The whole number of the slain, it seems, was but twelve thousand, an inconsiderable body to make head against all the thousands of Israel; but when God will destroy, he infatuates. Here it is said, v. 26, that Joshua drew not his hand back wherewith he stretched out the spear, v. 18. till the slaughter was completed. Some think the spear he stretched out, was not to slay the enemies, but to animate and encourage his own soldiers, some flag or ensign being hung out at the end of this spear; and, they observe it as an instance of self-denial, that though the fire of courage was kindled in all the Israelites, yet Joshua pushed him forward, sword in hand, into the hottest of the action, yet, in obedience to God, he kept the inferior post of a standard-bearer, and did not quit it till the work was done. By the spear stretched out, he directed the people to expect their help from God, and to him to give the praise. 2. They plundered the city, and took all the spoil to themselves, v. 27. Thus the wealth of the conquerer is laid up for the just; the spoil they brought out of Egypt, by borrowing of their neighbours, was much of it expended upon the tabernacle they had reared in the wilderness, for which they are now reimbursed with interest. The spoil here taken, it is probable, was all brought together, and distributed by Joshua in due proportions, as that of the Midianites was, Numb. 31. 26, 27. It was not cursed with irregularity or violence, for God is the God of order and equity, and not of confusion. 3. They laid the city in ashes, and left it to remain so, v. 28. Israel must yet dwell in tents, and therefore this city, as well as Jericho, must be burnt. And though there was no curse entailed upon him that should rebuild it, yet, it seems, it was not rebuilt, unless it be the same with Alja, which we read of, long after, Neh. 11. 31. Some think it was not rebuilt, because Israel had received a defeat before they reached this place, of which should be buried in the ruins of the city. 4. The king of Ai was taken prisoner and cut off, not by the sword of war, as a soldier, but by the sword of justice, as a malefactor. Joshua ordered him to be hanged, and his dead body thrown at the gate of his own city, under a heap of stones, v. 23, 29. Some particular reason, no doubt, there was for this; but it is probable it was, because it was likely he had been notoriously wicked and vile, and a blasphemer of the God of Israel, perhaps, upon occasion of the repulse he had given to the forces of Israel in their first onset. Some observe, that his dead body was thrown at the gate where he had been wont to sit in judgment, that so much the greater contempt might thereby be poured upon the dignity he had been proud of, and he might be ashamed for the ground he had made his throne, to be become the very place where he had made them. Thus the Lord is known by the judgments which he executes.

30. Then Joshua built an altar unto the LORD God of Israel in mount Ebal, 31. As Moses the servant of the Lord commanded the children of Israel, as it is written in the book of the law of Moses, An altar of whole stones, upon which no man hath lifted up any iron: and they offered thereon burnt-offerings unto the Lord, and sacrificed peace-offerings. 32. And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel. 33. And all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side the ark and on that side, before the priests the Levites, which brought the ark of the covenant of the Lord, as well the stranger as he that was born among them: half of them over against mount Gerizim; and half of them over against mount Ebal; as Moses the servant of the Lord had commanded before, that they should bless the people of Israel. 34. And afterward he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law. 35. There was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel, with the women, and the little ones, and the strangers that were conversant among them.

This religious solemnity which we have here an account of, comes in somewhat surprisingly in the midst of the history of the wars of Canaan. After the taking of Jericho and Ai, we should have expected that the next news should have been of their taking possession of the country, the pushing on of their victories in other cities, and the carrying of the war into the bowels of the nation, now that they had made themselves masters of these frontier towns. But here a scene opens of quite another nature; the camp of Israel is drawn out into the field, not to engage the enemy, but to offer sacrifice, to hear the law read, and to say Amen to the blessings and the curses.

Some think this was not done till after some of the following victories were obtained, which we read of, ch. 10. and 11. But it should seem by the maps, that Shechem, (near to which these two mountains, Gerizim and Ebal, were) was not so far off from Ai, but that when they had taken that, they might penetrate into that country, with ease, as far as those two mountains, and therefore I would not willingly admit a transposition of the story; and the rather, because as it comes in here, it is a remarkable instance, 1. Of the zeal of Israel for the service of God and for his honour. Though never was war more honourable, more pleasant, or more gainful, nor ever was war more sure of victory, or more necessary to a settlement, (for they had not had a conquest of their own, till they had won them by the sword, no, not Joshua himself,) yet all the business of the war shall stand still, while they make a long march to the place appointed, and there attend this solemnity. God appointed them to do this when they were over Jordan, and they did it as soon as possibly they could, though they might have had a colourable pretence to have put it off. Note, It is not to be feared of our covenanting with God till we are settled in the world, nor must any business put us by from minding and pursuing the one thing needful. The way to prosper, is to begin with God, Matt. 6. 33. 2. It is an instance of the care of God concerning his faithful servants and worshippers. Though they were in an enemy's country, as yet unconquered, yet in the service of God they were safe, as Jacob, when in this very country he was going to Beth-el to pay his vows, the terror of God was upon the cities round about, Gen. 35. 5. Note, When we are in the way of duty, God takes us under his special protection.

Twice 34. And gave express orders for this solemnity; once Deut. 11. 29. 30. where it seems he had pointed to the very place where it was to be performed; and again, Deut. 27. 2. &c. It was a federal transaction: the covenant was now renewed between God and Israel upon their taking possession of the land of promise, that they might be encouraged in the conquest of it, and might know upon what terms they held it, and come under fresh obligations to obedience. In token of the covenant, There was an altar erected and offered sacrifice to God, v. 30. 31. in token of their dedication of themselves to God, as living sacrifices to his honour, in and by a mediator, who is the altar that sanctifies this gift. This altar was erected on mount Ebal, the mount on which the curse was put, Deut. 11. 29. to signify that there, where by the law we had reason to expect a curse, by Christ's sacrifice of himself for us, and his mediation, we have peace with God. It was this redemption, that could make the law by being made a curse for us, Gal. 3. 13. Even then where it was said, by the curse, Ye are not my people; there it is said, through Christ the Altar, Ye are the children of the living God, Hos. 1. 10. The curses pronounced on mount Ebal would immediately have been executed, if atonement had not been made by sacrifice.

By the sacrifice offered on this altar they did likewise give God the glory of the victories they had already obtained, as Exod. 17. 15. Now that they had had the comfort of them in the spoils of Ai, it was fit that God should have the praise of them; and they also implored his favour for their future success; for supplications as well as thanksgivings were intended in their peace-offerings. The way to prosper in all that we put our hand to, is, to take God along with us, and in all our ways to acknowledge him by prayer, praise, and dependence.

The altar they built, was of rough unhewn stone, according to the law, Exod. 20. 25. for which that is most plain and natural, and least artful and affected in the worship of God, he is best pleased with. Man's device can add no beauty to God's institutions.

II. They received the law from God; and this they must do, that would find favour with him, and expect to have their offerings accepted. They must turn away our ear from hearing the law, our prayers will be an abomination. When God took Israel into covenant, he gave them his law, and they, in token of their consent to the covenant, subjected themselves to the law. Now here,

1. The law of the ten commandments was written upon stones in the presence of all Israel, as an abridgment of the whole, v. 32. This copy was the transcript of the original, which was written in the ark, that was to be done only by the finger of God; it is his prerogative to write the law in the heart, but the stones were plastered, and it was written upon the plaster, Deut. 27. 4. 8. It was written, that all might see what it was that they consented to, and that it might be a standing remaining testimony to posterity, of God's goodness in giving them such good laws, and in claiming their consent to them, if they were disobedient to them. It is a great mercy to any people to have the law of God in writing, and it is fit that the written law should be exposed to common view in a known tongue, that it may be seen and read of all men.

2. The blessings and the curses, the sanctions of the law, were publicly read, and the people, (we may suppose,) according to Moses's appointment, said Amen to them, v. 33. 34. The auditory was
AND it came to pass, when all the kings which were on this side Jordan, in the hills, and in the valleys, and in all the coasts of the great sea over against Lebanon, the Hittite, and the Amorite, the Canaanite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite, heard thereof, 2. That they gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua and with Israel, with one accord.

Hitherto the Canaanites had acted defensively, the Israelites were the aggressors upon Jericho and Ai; but here the kings of Canaan are in consultation to attack Israel, and concert matters for a vigorus effort of their united forces, to check the progress of their victorious armies. Now, 1. It was strange they did not do this sooner. They had noticed long since of their approach: Israel's design upon Canaan was no secret; one would have expected that a prudent concern for their common safety should have put them upon taking some measures to oppose their coming over Jordan, and maintain that pass against them, or to have given them a warm reception as soon as they were over. It was strange they did not attempt to raise the siege of Jericho, or at least fall in with the men of Ai, when they had given them a defeat. But they were either, through pre-sumption or despair, wonderfully infatuated, and at their wit's end; many knew not the things that belonged to their peace till they are hid from their eyes. 2. It was more strange that they did it now. Now that the conquest of Jericho had given such a pregnant proof of God's power, and that of Ai of Israel's policy, one would have thought the end of their consultation should have been, to make peace with Israel, but to make peace with them, and to gain the best terms they could for themselves. This had been their wisdom, Luke 14. 32. but their minds were blinded, and their hearts hardened to their destruction.

Observe, (1.) What induced them now at last to enter upon this consultation. When they heard thereof, v. 1. not only of the conquest of Jericho and Ai, but of the convention of the states of mount Ebdl, which we have an account of immediately before; when they heard that Joshua, as if he thought himself already complete master of the country, had had all his people together, and had read the laws to them, by which they must be governed, and taken their promises to submit to those laws, then they perceived the Israelites were in good earnest, and thought it was high time for them to bestir themselves. The pious devotions of God's people sometimes provokes and exasperates their enemies more than any thing else. (2.) How unanimous they were in their resolves. Though they were many kings of different nations, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, &c. doubtless of different interests, and that had often been at variance one with another, yet they determined, nemine contradicente—unanimously, to unite against Israel. O that Israel would learn this of Canaanites, to sacrifice private interests to the public welfare, and lay aside all animosities among themselves, that they may cordially unite against the common enemies of God's kingdom among men!

3. And when the inhabitants of Gibeon heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai, 4. They did work wildly, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors; and took old sacks upon their asses, and wine-bottles, old, and rent, and bound... up; 5. And old shoes and clouted upon their feet, and old garments upon them; and all the bread of their provision was dry and mouldy. 6. And they went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal, and said unto him, and to the men of Israel, We be come from a far country: now therefore make ye a league with us. 7. And the men of Israel said unto the Hivites, Peradventure ye dwell among us; and how shall we make a league with you? 8. And they said unto Joshua, We are thy servants. And Joshua said unto them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye? 9. And they said unto him, From a very far country thy servants are come, because of the name of the Lord thy God: for we have heard the fame of him, and all that he did in Egypt, 10. And all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites that were beyond Jordan, to Sihon king of Heshbon, and to Og king of Bashan, which was at Ashtaroth. 11. Wherefore our elders and all the inhabitants of our country spake to us, saying, Take victuals with you for the journey, and go to meet them, and say unto them, We are your servants: therefore now make ye a league with us. 12. This our bread we took hot for our provision out of our houses on the day we came forth to go unto you; but now, behold, it is dry, and it is mouldy: 13. And these bottles of wine, which we filled, were new; and, behold, they be rent: and these our garments and our shoes are become old by reason of the very long journey. 14. And the men took of their victuals, and asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord.

Here,

I. The Gibeonites desire to make peace with Israel, being alarmed by the tidings they heard of the destruction of Jericho, v. 3. Other people heard those tidings, and were irritated thereby to make war upon Israel; but the Gibeonites heard them, and were induced to make peace with them. Thus the discovery of the glory and the grace of God in the gospel, is to some a savour of life unto life; but to others, a savour of death unto death, 2 Cor. 2. 16. The same sun soteth wax and hardens clay. I do not remember that we read any where of a king of Gibeon. Had their government been at this time in a single person, perhaps his heart would have been too high to yield to Israel, and he would have joined with the rest of the kings against Israel. But these four united cities, mentioned v. 17. seem to have been governed by elders or senators, v. 11. who consulted the common safety more than their own personal dignity. The inhabitants of Gibeon did well for themselves. We have,

II. The method they took to compass it. They knew that all the inhabitants of the land of Canaan were to be cut off, perhaps they had some spies in the congregation at Ebal, when the law was read, who observed and brought them notice of the command given to Israel, Deut. 7. 1-3. that they should show no mercy to the Canaanites, give them no quarter in battle, which made them afraid of fighting them, and that they should make no covenant with them, which made them despair of gaining any advantage by treating with them: and therefore there was no way of saving their lives from the sword of Israel, unless they could, by disguising themselves, make Joshua believe that they came from a very far country, which the Israelites were not commanded to be afraid of, and forbidden to make peace with, but were particularly appointed to offer peace to, Deut. 20. 10, 15. Unless they could be admitted under this notion, they saw there was but one way with them, they must submit to the fate of Jericho and Ai. Though the neighbouring princes knew that all the men thereof were mighty, (ch. 10. 2.) and they knew it themselves, yet they dared not contend with Israel, who had an Almighty God on their side. Thus therefore is the only game they have to play, and they play it very artfully and successfully; never was any such thing more craftily managed.

1. They came under the character of ambassadors from a foreign state, which they thought would please the princes of Israel, and make them proud of the honour of being courted by distant countries: we find Hezekiah fond of those that came to him from a far country, Isa. 39. 3. they had not used to be thus courted.

2. They pretended to have undergone the fatigues of a very long journey, and produced what passed for an ocular demonstration of it. It should seem it was then usual for those that undertook long journeys, to take with them, as we do now for long voyages, all manner of provision in kind, the country not being furnished as our is now with houses on the way, for the accommodation of strangers. When we have occasion to make use of them, we have reason to be very thankful. Now, they here pretended that their provision, when they brought it from home, was fresh and new, but now it appeared to be old and dry, whereas it might well be presumed they had not loitered, but made the best of their way; so that from hence it must be inferred that they came, as they said they did, from a very far country, or from nations so remote, as when we have occasion to make use of them, we have reason to be very thankful. Now, they here pretended that their provision, when they brought it from home, was fresh and new, but now it appeared to be old and dry, whereas it might well be presumed they had not loitered, but made the best of their way; so that from hence it must be inferred that they came, as they said they did, from a very far country, or from nations so remote, as

3. When they were suspected, and more strictly examined from whence they came, they did industriously declined telling the name of their country, and of their settled; (1.) The men of Israel suspected a fraud, v. 7. "Peradventure ye dwell among us, and then we may not, we must not, have war with you;" this might have discouraged the Gibeonites from urging the matter any further, concluding that if the peace were made, the Israelites would not think themselves obliged to keep it, having thus solemnly protested against it, in case they should dwell between them; but they had some hope at all if they stood it out, they bravely ventured a submission; "Who knows but the people of Israel may save us alive, though thus inveigled into a promise, and if we tell them at last, we shall but die." (2.) Joshua put the questions to them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye? He finds himself concerned to stand upon his guard against secret fraud, as well as against open force; we in our spiritual warfare must stand against the serpent, who, like a subterfuge, is a subtle serpent as well as a roaring lion. In all leagues of relation and friendship we must first try, and then trust, lest we repent at leisure agreements made in haste. (3.) They would not tell whence they came; but still repeat the same thing, We are come from a very far country, v. 9. They will have it thought, that it is a country Israel knows nothing of, nor ever heard of, and therefore would be never the surer, they should tell him the name of it.

4. They profess a respect for the God of Israel, the more to ingratiate themselves with Joshua, and we charitably believe they were sincere in this procession, We are come because of the name of the Lord thy God, v. 9. because of what we have heard of that name, which has convinced us that it is above every name, and because we have a desire toward that name, and the remembrance of it, and would gladly come under its protection.

5. They fetch their inducements from what had been done some time before in Moses's reign, the tidings whereof might easily be supposed ere this to have reached distant regions, the plagues of Egypt and the destruction of Sihon and Og, v. 9, 10. but prudently say nothing of the destruction of Jericho and Ai, (though that was the true inducement, v.
3.) because they will have it supposed that they came from some long before theose conquests were made. We need not be long to seek for reasons why we should submit to the God of Israel; we may be furnished either with new or old, which we will.

6. They make a good submission, We are your servants, and humbly sue for a general agreement, make a league with us, v. 11. They insist not upon terms, but will be glad of peace upon any terms; nor will the case admit of delays, lest the fraud be discovered; for they would have the bargain struck up immediately; if Joshua will but make a league with them, they have all they come for, and they hope their ragged clothes and clouted shoes will be no exception against them; God and Israel reject none for their poverty.

Now, (1.) Their falsehood cannot be justified, nor ought it to be drawn into a precedent. We must not do evil, that good may come. Had they owned their counter but renounced that name, it would have seduced the people of it to Israel, and themselves to the God of Israel, we have reason to think Joshua would have been directed by the oracle of God to spare their lives, and they needed not to have made these pretensions. It is observable, when they had once said, We are come from a far country, v. 6.
they found themselves necessitated to say it again,
v. 9. and to say what was utterly false concerning their bread, their bottles, their clothes, v. 12, 13. for when they came they made no league, the third, and so on. The way of that sin is down-hill.

But (2.) Their faith and prudence are to be greatly commended; our Lord commended even the unjust steward, because he had done wisely and well for himself, Luke 16. 8. In submitting to Israel, they submitted to the God of Israel, which implied a renunciation of the God they had served, a resignation to the laws of the true religion. They had heard enough to convince them of the excellency of the God of Israel, and from thence might infer his other perfections of wisdom and goodness; and how can we do better for ourselves, than surrender at discretion to infinite wisdom, and cast ourselves upon the mercy of a God of infinite goodness? The submission of these Gibeonites was the more laudable, because it was, [1.] Singular; their neighbours took another course, and expected they should join with them. [2.] Speedy; they did not stay till Israel had besieged their cities; then it had been too late to capitulate; but when they were at some distance, they desired conditions of peace. The way to avoid a judgment is to meet it by repentance.

Let us imitate these Gibeonites, and make our peace with God in the rags of humiliation, godly sorrow, and mortification, so our iniquity shall not be our ruin. Let us be servants to Jesus, our blessed Joshua, and make a league with him and the Israel of God, and we shall live.

15. And Joshua made peace with them, and made a league with them, to let them live: and the princes of the congregation sware unto them. 16. And it came to pass, at the end of three days, after they had made a league with them, that they heard that they were their neighbours, and that they dwelt among them. 17. And the children of Israel journeyed, and came unto their cities on the third day. Now their cities were Gibeon, and Chephirah, and Be-roth, and Kirjah-jearim. 18. And the children of Israel smote them not, because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel. And all the congregation murmured against the princes. 19. But all the princes said unto all the congregation, We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel: now, therefore we may not touch them. 20. This we will do to them; we will even let them live; lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we sware unto them. 21. And the princes sware unto them. Let them live; but let them be hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation; as the princes had promised them

Here is,

1. The treaty soon concluded with the Gibe-oneites, v. 14, 15. The thing was not done with much formality, but in short. They agreed to let them live, and more the Gibeonites did not ask. In a common war this had been but a small matter to be granted; but in the wars of Canaan, which were to make a general destruction, it was a great favour to a Canaanite to have his life given him for a prey, Jer. 45. 5. 2. This agreement was made not by Joshua only, but by the princes of the congregation, in conjunction with him. Though Joshua had an extraordinary influence over the government, and extraordinary qualifications for it, yet he would not act in an affair of this nature, without the counsel and concurrence of the princes, who were neither kept in the dark nor kept under foot, but were treated by him as sharers in the government. 3. It was ratified by an oath, they sware unto them, not by any of the gods of Canaan, but by the God of Israel only, v. 19. They that mean honestly, do not startle at assurances, but satisfy those with whom they treat, and glorify God, by calling him to wit-tness to the sincerity of their intentions. 4. Nothing appears to have been culpable in all this, but that it was done rashly; they took of their victuals, by which they satisfied themselves that it was indeed old and dry, but did not consider that that was no proof of their bringing it fresh from home; so that, making use of their senses only, but not their reason, they received the men (s the margin reads it) because of their vicissuits, perceiving perhaps, upon the view and taste of their bread, not only that now it was old, but that it had been fine and very good at first. This inferred that they were persons of some quality; and therefore the friendship of their country was not to be despised. But they asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord. They had the Urim and Thummim with them, which they might have advised with in this difficult case, and that would have told them no lie, would have led them into no error; but they relied so much on their own politics, that they thought it needless to bring their counsel by the oracle. Joshua himself was not altogether without blame herein. Note, We then make more haste than good speed in any business, when we stay not to take God along with us, and by the word and prayer to consult him. Many a time we see cause to reflect upon it with regret, that such and such an affair miscarried, because we asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord; would we acknowledge him in all our ways, we should find them more safe, easy, and successful.

II. The fraud soon discovered by which this league was procured. A lying tongue is but for a moment, and truth will be the daughter of time. Within three days they found, to their great surprise, that the cities which these ambassadors had treated for, were very near them, but one night's foot-march from the camp at Gilgal, ch. 10. 9. Either their own scouts, or the parties that sailed out to acquaint themselves with the country, or perhaps some deserters that came over to them from the enemy, informed them of the truth of this matter. They that suffer themselves to be deceived by the wiles of Satan, will soon be undeceived to their confusion, and will find that near, even at the door, which they imagined was very far off.

III. The disgust of the congregation at this. They did indeed submit to the restrains which this league put upon them, and smoothed the mind of the Gibeonites, neither slew the persons, nor seized the prey; but it vexed them to have their hands thus tied, and they murmured against the princes, (v. 18.) it is to be feared, more from a jealousy for their own profit, than from a zeal for the fulfilling of God's command, though some of them perhaps had a regard to that. Many are forward to arrange and censure the actions of princes while they are ignorant of the springs of those actions, and are creatures of the reasons of state that govern them. While therefore we are satisfied in general that those who are over us aim at nothing but the public good, and sincerely seek the welfare of their people, we ought to make the best of what they do, and not exercise ourselves in things above us.

IV. The prudent endeavours of the princes to pacify the discontented congregation, and to accommodate the matter; herein all the princes concurred and were unanimous, which doubtless disposed the people to acquiesce.

1. They resolved to spare the lives of the Gibeonites, for so they had expressly sworn to do, v. 15. to let them live.

(1.) The oath was lawful, else it had not bound them any more than Herod's oath bound him to cut off John's head; it was given them to decide the point, to determine, and if they had not then appointed them to destroy all the Canaanites, but that law must be construed in favorem vitie— with some tender allowance, to mean those only that stood it out, and would not surrender their country to them, and not to bind them so far to put off the sense of honour and humanity, as to slay those who had never lifted up a hand against them, nor ever would, but before they were reduced to any extremity, or ever attempted any act of hostility, with one consent humbled themselves; the kings of Is-

have been made with all possible honesty and fairness? If the fraud of others will not justify or excuse our falsehood, certainly the honesty of others in dealing with us, will aggravate and con duct in a similar case, be decisive with them.

2. Though they spared their lives, yet they seized their liberties, and sentenced them to be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, to the congrega tion, v. 21. By this proposal the discontented congregation was pacified; for (1.) They who were angry that the Gibeonites lived, might be content when they saw them condemned to that which, in the general apprehension, is worse than death, perpetual servitude. (2.) They who were angry that they were not spoiled, might be content when their service of the congregation would be more to the public advantage, than their best effects could be; and, in short, the Israelites would be no losers either in honour or profit by this peace with the Gibeonites; convince them of this, and they will be satisfied.

22. And Joshua called for them, and he spake unto them, saying, Wherefore have ye beguiled us, saying, We are very far from you; when ye dwell among us? 23. Now therefore ye are cursed; and there shall none of you be freed from being bond men, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God. 24. And they answered Joshua, and said, Because it was certainly told thy servants, how that the LORD thy God commanded his servant Moses to give you all the land, and to de stroy all the inhabitants of the land from be to you, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing. 25. And now, behold, we are in thine hand: as it seemeth good and right unto thee do unto us, do. 26. And so did he unto them, and delivered them out of the hand of the children of Israel, that they slew them not. 27. And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water, for the congregation and for the altar of the LORD, even unto this day, in the place which he should choose.

The matter is here settled between Joshua and the Gibeonites, and an explanation of the league agreed upon; we may suppose that now, not the messengers were first sent, but the elders of Gibeon, and of the cities that were dependent upon it, were themselves present, and treated with, that the matter might be fully compromised.

I. Joshua reproves them for their fraud, v. 22. And they excuse it as well as they can, v. 24. 1. Joshua gives the reproof very mildly; Wherefore have ye beguiled us? He does not load them with any ill names, does not give them any harsh pro voking language, does not call them base base bars, but only asks them, Why have ye beguiled us? Under the greatest pro vocations, it is our wisdom and duty to keep our temper, and to bridle our passion; a just cause needs not anger to defend it, and a bad one is made never the better by it. 2. They make the best ex cuse for themselves that the thing would bear, v. 24. They found by the word of God, that sentence of death was passed upon them, (the command was to destroy all the inhabitants of the land, without exception,) and they found by the works of God already wrought, that there was no opposing the execution of this sentence; they considered that God's sovereignty is incontestable, his justice in flexible, his power irresistible, and therefore re solved to try what his mercy was, and found it was not in vain to cast themselves upon it. They do not go about to justify their lie, but in effect beg pardon for it, pleading it was purely to save their lives that they did it, which every man that finds in himself the force of the law of self-pre servation, will therefor make great allowances for. As for their argument, excepting that fear was not merely of the power of man, (if that were all, one might flee from that to the divine protection,) but of the power of God himself, which they saw engaged against them.

II. Joshua condemns them to servitude, as a pun ishment of their fraud, v. 25. And they submit to the sentence, v. 25. and for aught that appears, both sides are pleased.

2. Joshua pronounces them perpetual bondmen. They had purchased their lives with a lie, but that being no good consideration, he obliges them to hold their lives under the rent and reservation of their continual labours, in hewing wood and drawing wa ter, the meanest and most toilsome employments. Thus their lie was punished; had they dealt fairly and plainly with Israel, perhaps they had had more honourable conditions granted them, but now, since they gain their lives with ragged clothes and clout ed shoes, they are condemned for ever to wear such, so must their doom be. And thus the ransom of their lives is paid; do minion is acquired by the preservation of a life that lies at mercy (Servus dicitur a servando—A serv ant is so called from the act of saving,) they owe their service to them to whom they owe their lives. Observe how the judgment is given against them. (1.) Their servitude is made a curse to them. (2.) They who were cursed of Canaan," from whom these Hivites descended, a servant of servants shall thou be, Gen. 9. 25. What shall be done to the false tongue but this? Cursed shall it be. (2.) Yet this curse is turned into a blessing; they must be servants, but it shall be for the house of my God. The princes would have them slaves unto all the congregation, v. 21. at least, they chose to express themselves so, for the pacification of the people that were prejudgment: Da vid himself could have wished to be a door-keeper there. Even servile work becomes honourable when it is done for the house of my God, and the offices thereof.

[1.] They were hereby excluded from the liberties and privileges of true-born Israelites, and a re mainder mark of distinction put upon their posterity throughout all their generations. [2.] They were hereby excluded from such service as would require personal attendance upon the altar of God, in the place which he should choose, v. 27. which would bring them to the knowledge of the law of God, keep them tight to that holy religion to which they were proselyted, and prevent their revolt to the idolatries of their fathers. [3.] This would be a great advantage to the priests and Levites to have so many, and those mighty men, constant attend ants upon them, and engaged by office to do all the drudgery of the tabernacle. A great deal of wood must be hewed for God's house, not only to keep the fire burning continually upon the altar, but to boil the flesh of the peace-offerings, &c. And a great deal of water must be drawn for the divers washings which the law required to be done in the court, and other such servile works, such as washing the vessels, carrying out ashes, sweeping the courts, &c. which otherwise the Levites must have done themselves, these Gibeonites were appointed to do. [4.] They were herein servants to the congregation too; for whatever promotes and helps forward the worship of God, is real service to the commonwealth. It is the interest of every Israelite, that the altar of God be well attended. Hereby also the congregation was excused from much of this servile work, which perhaps would otherwise have been expected from some of them. God had made a law that the Israelites should never make any of their brethren bondmen; if they had slaves, they must be of the heathen that were round about them, Lev. 25. 44. Now, in honour of this law, and of Israel that was honoured by it, God would not have the drudgery, no, not the drudgery of the Gentiles, but by Gibeonites, who were afterward called Nethinim, men given to the Levites as they were to the priests, (Numb. 3. 9.) to minister to them in the service of God. [5.] This may be looked upon as typifying the admission of the Gentiles into the Gospel-Church. Now they were taken in upon their submission to be under-officers, but afterward God promises that he will take of them for priests and Levites, Isa. 66. 22. 2. They sinned in this condition, v. 25. Conscious of a fault in framing a lie whereby to deceive the Israelites, and sensible also how narrowly they escaped with their lives, and what a kindness it was to have them spared, they acquiesce in the proposal, Do as it seemeth right unto thee. Better live in servitude, especially such servitude, than not live at all. Those of the very meanest and most despicable condition, are described to be heroes of wood, and dwell in tents, (Deut. 29. 19.) Ye shall give, and they shall not give thee a skin, liberty and labour, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life, and no ill bargain. Accordingly the matter was determined, (1.) Joshua delivered them out of the hands of the Israelites that they should not be slain, v. 26. It seems there were those who would have fallen upon them with the sword, if Joshua had not interposed with his authority; but wise generals know when to lock up the sword, as well as when to draw it. (2.) He then delivered them again into the hands of the Israelites to be enslaved, v. 27. They were not to keep possession of their cities, for we find afterward that three of them fell to the lot of Benjamin, and one to that of Judah; nor were they themselves to be at their own disposal, but, as Bishop Patrick thinks, were dispersed into the cities of the priests and Levites, and came up with them in their courses to serve under some of the profits of which, it is probable, they were maintained. And thus Israel's bondmen became the Lord's freemen, for his service in the meanest office is liberty, and his work is its own wages. And this they got by their early submission. Let us, in like manner, submit to our Lord Jesus, and refer ourselves to him, saying, "We are thy hand, do unto us as seemeth good and right unto thee; only save our souls, and we shall be content;" and it is certain, if we be patient, cross, and draw in his yoke, and serve at his altar, that shall be afterward neither shame nor grief to us, while the meanest office in God's service will entitle us to a dwelling in the house of the Lord all the days of our life.

CHAP. X.

We have in this chapter an account of the conquest of the kings and kingdoms of the southern part of the land of Canaan, as, in the next chapter, of the reduction of the northern parts, which together completed the glorious successes of the wars of Canaan. In this chapter we have an account, I. Of the routing of their forces in the field. In which observe, 1. Their con- federacy against the Gibeonites, v. 1...5. 2. The Gibeonites' request to Joshua to assist them, v. 6. 3. Josh- ua's speedy march under divine encouragement for their relief, v. 7...9. 4. The defeat of the armies of these confederate kings, v. 10, 11. 5. The miraculous prolonging of the day by the standing still of the sun in favour of the conquerors, v. 12...14. II. Of the execu- tion of the kings that escaped out of the battle, v. 15...27. III. Of the taking of the particular cities and the total destruction of all that were found in them. Mak- kedah, v. 28. Libnah, v. 29, 30. Lachish, v. 31, 32, and the king of Gezer that attempted its rescue, v. 33. Eg- libeth, v. 34. Hebron, v. 36, 37. Debir, v. 38, 39. And the bringing of all that country into the hands of Israel, v. 40...42. And lastly, the return of the army to their head-quarters.

1. NOW it came to pass, when Adoni- zedek king of Jerusalem had heard how Joshua had taken Ai, and had utterly destroyed it; as he had done to Jericho and her king, so he had done to Ai and her king; and how the inhabitants of Gibe- on had made peace with Israel, and were among them; 2. That they feared greatly, because Gibeon was a great city, as one of the royal cities, and because it was greater than Ai, and all the men thereof were mighty. 3. Wherefore Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem sent unto Hoham king of Heb- ron, and unto Piram king of Jarmuth, and unto Japhia king of Lachish, and unto De- bir king of Lachish, saying, 4. Come up unto me, and help me, that we may smite Gibeon: for it hath made peace with Joshua and with the children of Is- rael. 5. Therefore the five kings of the Amorites, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, the king of Eglon, gathered them- selves together, and went up, they and all their hosts, and encamped before Gibeon, and made war against it. 6. And the men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua to the camp at Gilgal, saying, Slack not thy hand from thy servants; come up to us quickly, and save us, and help us: for all the kings of the Am- orites that dwell in the mountains are gather- ed together against us.

Joshua and the hosts of Israel had now been a good while in the land of Canaan, and no great matters were effected; they were made masters of Jericho by miracle, of Ai by stratagem, and of Gib- con by surrender, and that was all; hitherto the progress of their victories has not seemed propor- tionable to the magnitude of their enterprise and the glory of their beginnings. Those among them that were impatient of delays, it is probable, complai- ned of Joshua's slowness, and asked why they did not immediately penetrate into the heart of the country, before the enemy could rally their forces to make head against them; why they stood trifling, while they were so confident both of their title and of their success. Thus Joshua's prudence, perhaps, was censured as slothfulness, cowardice, and want of spirit. But, 1. Canaan was not to be conquered in a day. God had said, that by little and little he would drive out the Canaanites, Exod. 23. 30. He that believeth, will not make haste, or conclude that the promise will never be performed, because it is not performed so soon as we expected. 2. Joshua waited for the Canaanites to be the aggressors; let them first make an onset upon Israel, on the allies of Israel, and then their destruction will be, or at least will appear to be, the more just and the more justifiable. Joshua had warrant sufficient to set upon them, yet he stays till they strike the first stroke, that he might provide for honest things, in the sight, not only of God, but of men; and they would be the more excusable in their resistance, now that they had seen what favour the Gibeonites found with Israel. 3. It was for the advantage of Israel to sit still a while, that the forces of these little kings might unite in one body, and so might the easier be cut off at one blow. This God had in his eye when he put it into their hearts to combine against Israel; though they designed thereby to strengthen one another, that which he intended, was, to gather them as sheaves into the floor, to fall together, Mic. 4. 12. Thus oftentimes that seeming paradox proves wholesome counsel, Stay a while, and we shall have done the sooner.

After Israel had waited a while for an occasion to make war upon the Canaanites, a fair one offers itself.

I. Five kings combine against the Gibeonites. Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem was the first mover and planning chief of this confederacy. He had a good name, it signifies Lord of righteousness; a descendant perhaps from Melchizedek, King of righteousness; but notwithstanding the goodness of his name and family, it seems he was a bad man, and an impiacable enemy to the posterity of that Abraham, whom his predecessor, Melchizedek, was such a faithful friend to. He called upon his neighbours to join against Israel, either because he was the most honorable prince, or had the precedence in time. These kings, (perhaps they had some dependence upon him, at least they paid a deference to him, as the most public, powerful, and active man they had among them,) or, because he was first or most apprehensive of the danger his country was in, not only by the conquest of Jericho and Ai, but the surrender of Gibeon, which, it seems, was the chief thing that alarmed him, it being one of the most considerable frontier-towns they had. Against Gibeon therefore all the force he could raise, must be levelled; Come, says he, and help me, that we may smite Gibeon. This he resolves to do, either, 1. In policy; that he might retake the city, because it was a strong city, and of great consequence to his country, in whose hands it was; or, 2. In passion, that he might chastise the citizens for making peace with Joshua, pretending that they had perfidy betrayed their country and race, and brethren the common enemy, whereas they had really done the greatest kindness imaginable to their country by setting them a good example, if they would have followed it. Thus Satan and his instruments make war upon those that make peace with God: marvel not if the world hate you, and treat those as deserters, who are converts to Christ.

II. The Gibeonites send notice to Joshua of the distress and danger they were in, v. 6. Now they expect benefit from the league they had made with Israel, because though it was obtained by deceit, it was afterward confirmed when the truth came out. They think Joshua obliged to help them, 1. In conscience, because they were his servants, not in compliment, as they had said in their first address, ch. 9. 8, We are thy servants, but in reality made servants to the congregation; and it is the duty of masters to take care of the poorest and meanest of their servants, and not to see them wronged when it is in the power of their hand to right them. They that pay allegiance may reasonably expect protection. Thus David pleads with God, Ps. 119. 94, I am thine; save me; and so may we, if indeed we be his. 2. In honour, because the ground of their enemies' quarrel with them, was, the respect they had shown to Israel, and the confidence they had in a covenant with them. Joshua cannot refuse to help them, when it is for their affection to him, and to the name of his God, that they are attacked. David thinks it a good plea with God, Ps. 69. 7, For thy sake I have borne reproach. When our spiritual enemies set themselves in array against us, and threaten to swallow us up, let us, by faith and prayer, apply ourselves to Christ, our Joshua, for strength and succour, as St. Paul did, and we shall receive the same answer of peace, My grace is sufficient for thee, 2 Cor. 12. 8. 9.

7. So Joshua ascended from Gilgal, he and all the people of war with him, and all the mighty men of valour. 8. And the Lord said unto Joshua, Fear them not; for I have delivered them into thine hand: there shall not a man of them stand before thee. 9. Joshua therefore came unto them suddenly, and went up from Gilgal all night. 10. And the Lord discomfited them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them along the way that goeth up to Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah. 11. And it came to pass, as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died: they were more which died with hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword. 12. Then spake Joshua to the Lord in the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel, and he said in the sight of Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gilboa; and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon. 13. And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day. 14. And there was no day like that before it or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man: for the Lord fought for Israel.

I. Joshua resolves to assist the Gibeonites, and God encourages him in that resolve. 1. He ascended from Gilgal, v. 7. that is, he designed, determined, and prepared for, this expedition to relieve Gideon, for it is probable it was before he stirred a gaze that God spake to him to encourage him. It was given the prophet in Joshua to help his new alligiis through perhaps the king of Jerusalem, when he attacked them, little thought that Joshua would have been so ready to help them, but expected he would abandon them as Canaanites, the rather because they had obtained their league with him by fraud; therefore he speaks with assurance, v. 4. of smiling Gideon. But Joshua knew that his promise to let them live, obliged him, not only not to render his hand to them, but to stand by them in their smiting, when it was in the power of his hand to prevent it, Prov. 24. 11, 12. He knew that when they embraced the faith and worship of the God of Israel, they came to trust under the shadow of his wings, (Ruth 2. 12.) and therefore, as his servants, he was bound to protect them. 2. God uni-amated him for his undertaking, v. 8. Fear not, that is, (1.) Joshua need not dread the power of the enemy; though so many enemies are confederate against thee, and are resolved to make their utmost efforts for the reduction of Gideon, and, it may be, will fight desperately in a desperate cause; yet let not that discourage thee, I have delivered thee from the hand of thy enemies; and neither resist, nor escape, whom God has marked for destruction.
II. Joshua applies himself to execute this resolve, and God assists him in the execution. Here we have,
1. The great industry of Joshua, and the power of God working with that for the defeat of the enemy. In this action,
1. Joshua showed his good-will in the haste he made to possess the land of Gideon, v. 9. He came unto them suddenly; for the extremity was such as would not admit of delay. If one of the tribes of Israel had been in danger, he could not have showed more care or zeal for its relief than here for Gideon, remembering in this, as in other cases, there must be one law for the stranger that was proselyted, and for him that was born in the land. Scarcely had the confederate princes got their forces together, and sat down to their dinner, when Joshua came upon them, the surprise of which would put them into the greatest confusion. Now that the enemy were actually drawn up into a body, which had all as it were but one neck, despatch was as serviceable to his cause, as before delay was, while he waited for this general rendezvous; and now that things were ripe for execution, no man more expeditious than Joshua could have gone slower. Now you may ever be said, He left that to do to-morrow which he could do to-day. When Joshua found he could not reach Gideon in a day, lest he should lose any real advantages against the enemy, or so much as seem to come short, or to neglect his new allies, he marched all night, resolving not to give sleep to his eyes, nor slumber to his eye-lids, till he had accomplished this enterprise. It was well the forces he took with him were most valiant men of valor, not only able-bodied men, but men of spirit and resolution, and hearty in the cause, else they neither could nor would have borne this fatigue, but would have murmured at their leader, and would have asked, 'Is this the rest we were promised in Ca-nan?' But they well considered that the present toll was in order to a happy settlement, and therefore were reconciled to it. Let the good soldiers of Jesus Christ learn from hence to endure hardness, in following the Lamb whithersoever he goes, and not think themselves undue, if their religion lose them now and then a night's sleep; it will be enough to rest, when we come to heaven.
But why needed Joshua to put himself and his men so much to this stretch? Had not God promised him, that without fail he would deliver the enemies into his hand? It is true he had; but God's promises are intended, not to slacken and supersede, but to quicken and encourage our endeavours.
He that believeth, doth not make haste to anticiplate providence, but doth make haste to attend it, with a diligent, not a distrustful speed.
2. God showed his great power in defeating the enemies which Joshua so rigorously attacked, v.
10, 11. Joshua had a very numerous and powerful army with him, hands enough to despatch a dis-pired enemy, so that the enemy might have been scattered by the ordinary fate of war; but God himself would appear in this great and decisive battle, and draw up the artillery of heaven against the Canaanites, to demonstrate to his people, that they got not this land in possession by their own sword, but either did the hand to fall into his hands; for there is no right hand and his arm, Ps. 44. 3. The Lord discomfited them before Israel; Israel did what they could, and yet God did all. [1.] It must needs be a very great terror and confusion to the enemy, to perceive that heaven itself fought against them; for who can contest with, flee from, or fence against the powers of heaven? They had affronted the true God, and robbed him of his honour, by worshiping the heathen gods, and attacking the creature which is due to the Creator only; and now the host of heaven fights against them, and even that part of the creation which they had idolized, is at war with them, and even triumphs in their ruin, Jer. 8. 2. There is no way of making any creature propitious to us, no not by sacrifice or offering, but only by making our peace with God, and keeping ourselves in his love. This had been enough to make them an easy prey to God's victorious Israelites, yet this was not all. [2.] Beside the terror struck upon them, there was a great slaughter made of them by hail-stones, which were so large, and came down with such a force, that more were killed by the hail-stones than by the sword of the Israelites, though no doubt, they were busy.
God himself speaks to Job of treasures, or magasins, of the hail-stones, that with them he would exterminate the day of battle and war, Job 38. 22, 23. and here they are made use of to destroy the Canaanites.
Here was hail shot from God's great ordinance, that, against whosoever it was directed, was sure to hit, (and never glanced upon the Israelites mixed with them,) and whenever it hit was sure to kill.
See here how miserable they are, that have God for their enemy, and how sure to perish; it is clear it is a fearful and terrible revenge that was brought against them, and it is not by way of fleeing out of them. Some observe, that Bethhoron lay north of Gideon, Azекah and Makkedah lay south, so that they fled each way; by which way soever they fled, the hail-stones pursued them, and met them at every turn.
2. The great faith of Joshua, and the power of God crowning that with the miraculous arrest of the sun, that the day of Israel's victories might be prolonged, and so the enemy totally defeated.
The hail-stones had their rise no higher than the clouds, but, to show that Israel's help came from above the clouds, the sun itself, who by his constant motion serves the whole earth, by halting when there was occasion, served the Israelites, and did them a kindness; the sun and moon stood still in their habitations, at the sight of thine arrows which gave the signal, Hab. 3. 11.
(1.) Here is the prayer of Joshua that the sun might stand still. I call it his prayer, because it is said, v. 12, he spake to the Lord; as Elijah, though we read, 1 Kings 17. 1. only by his prophesying of the drought, yet is said, James 3. 17, to pray for it.
Observe, [1.] An instance of Joshua's unwearied activity in the service of God and Israel, that though he had marched all night and fought all day, and, one might expect, would be inclined to repose himself and get a little sleep, and give his army some time to rest, that, like the hireling, he would earnestly have desired the shadow, and bid the night welcome, when he had done such a good day's work, yet, instead of that, he stood for nothing so much as the prolonging of the day. Note, Those that wait on the Lord, and work for him, shall renew their strength, shall run and not be weary, shall walk and not faint, Isa. 40. 31. [2.] An instance of his great faith in the almighty power of God, as above the power of nature, and able to control and alter the usual course of it. No doubt, Joshua had an extraordinary impulse or impression upon his spirit, which he knew to be of divine original, prompting him to desire that this miracle might be wrought upon this occasion, else it had been presumption in him to desire or expect it, the prayer had not been granted by the divine power, if it had not been dictated by the divine grace; God wrought this faith in him, and then said, "According to thy faith, and thy prayer of faith, be it unto thee." It cannot be imagined however that such a thing as this should have entered into his mind at the same time, that he would have had a thousand projects in his head for the completing of the victory, before he would have thought of desiring the sun to stand still; but even in the Old Testament saints, the Spirit made intercession according to the will of God; what God will give, he inclines the hearts of his praying people to ask; and for what he will do, he will be inquired of, Ezek. 36. 37.

21. But, It looked great for Joshua to say, Sun, stand thou still. His ancestor Joseph had indeed dreamed that the sun and moon did obeisance to him; but who would have thought that, after it had been fulfilled in the figure, it should again be fulfilled in the letter to one of his posterity. The prayer is thus expressed with authority, because it was not an ordinary prayer, such as is directed and supported only by God's common providence or power. It is, as it were, a conquest made, not of an enemy, but of the sun's power; the prayer is divinely inspired for this purpose; and yet it intimates to us the prevalency of prayer in general, so far as it is regulated by the word of God, and may remind us of that honour put upon prayer, Isa. 45. 11, Concerning the work of my hands, command ye me. He bids the sun stand still upon Gibeon, the place of action and the seat of the war, intimating that what he designed in this request, was, the advantage of Israel against their enemies; it is probable that the sun was now declining, and that he did not call for the lengthening out of the day, until he observed it hastening toward its period. He does likewise, in the name of the King of kings, arrest the moon, perhaps because it was requisite for the preserving of the harmony and good order of the spheres, that the course of the rest of the heavenly bodies should be stayed likewise, otherwise, while the sun shone, he needed not the moon; and here he mentions the valley of Ajalon, which was near to Gibeon, because there he was at that time.

Secondly, It was bold indeed to say so before Israel, and argues a very strong assurance of faith. If the event had not answered the demand, nothing could have been a greater slur upon him; the Israelites would have concluded he was certain in going method, he had never talked sooth. But he knew well God would own him, as an answer to a petition which he himself directed to be drawn up and presented, and therefore was not afraid to say before all Israel, calling them to observe this work of wonder Sun, stand thou still, for he was convinced in him whom he had trusted. He believed the almighty power of God; else he could not have expected that the sun, going on in its strength, driving in a full career, and rejoicing as a strong man to run a race, should be stopped in an instant. He believed the sovereignty of God in the kingdom of nature; else he could not have expected that the established law and course of nature should be changed and altered for nothing so much as the prolonging of the day. Note, That they that walk and do not fear, but believe on God, Ps. 31. 9.

Observe, [1.] That he was the first that ever asked the sun to stand still, or gave any reason why it should stand still; God had his time and season for all things, and it was not the invention of a man to stay it, though ever so great change of it should have been fit, it must be done by God. [2.] That this was the first miracle that was wrought in the sight of Israel, because they saw what he had done before. Note, When God has wrought one miracle for our profit and improvement, it is our duty to expect other miracles. [3.] That they could not have this miracle of Joshua's, nor their former miracles, but by the special permission of God. Note, We cannot have a miracle of God but by the special permission of God, for he cannot be commanded to do his will.
And all the people returned to the camp to Joshua at Makkedah in peace: none moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel. 22. Then said Joshua, Open the mouth of the cave, and bring out those five kings unto me out of the cave. 23. And they did so, and brought forth those five kings unto him out of the cave, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, and the king of Eglon. 24. And it came to pass, when they brought out those kings unto Joshua, that Joshua called for all the men of Israel, and said unto the captains of the men of war which went with him, Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings. And they came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them. 25. And Joshua said unto them, Fear not, nor be dismayed, be strong and of good courage: for thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies against whom ye fight. 26. And afterward Joshua smote them, and slew them, and hanged them on five trees: and they were hanged upon the trees until the evening. 27. And it came to pass at the time of the going down of the sun, that Joshua commanded, and they took them down off the trees, and cast them into the cave wherein they had been hid, and laid great stones in the cave's mouth, which remain until this very day.

It was a brave appearance, no doubt, which the five kings made when they took the field, for the reducing of Gibeon, and a brave army they had following them; but they were all routed, put into disorder first, and then brought to destruction, by the hail-stones. And now Joshua thought, his work being done, he might go with his army into quarters of refreshment: accordingly it was resolved, perhaps in a council of war, that they should presently return to the camp to Gilgal, v. 15. till they should receive orders from God to take possession of the country they had now conquered: but he soon finds he has more work cut out for him, the victory must be pursued, that the spoils might be divided. Accordingly he applies himself to it with renewed vigour.

I. The force that had dispersed themselves, must be followed and smitten. When tidings are brought to Joshua where the kings were, he ordered a guard to be set upon them for the present, v. 18. reserving them for another day of destruction, and to be brought forth to a day of wrath, Job 21. 30. He directs his men to pursue the common soldiers, as much as might be, to prevent their escaping to the towns, for these would strengthen them, and make the reduction of them the more difficult, v. 19. Like a prudent general, he does that first, which is most needful, and defers his triumphs till he has completed his conquests; nor was he in such haste to insult over the captive kings, but that he would first prevent the rallying again of their scattered forces. The success of this vigorous pursuit, was, 1. That a very great slaughter was made of the enemies of God and Israel. And, 2. The field was cleared of them, so that none remained but such as got into fenced cities, where they would not long be safe themselves, nor were they capable of doing any service to the cities that sheltered them, unless the cities were by him only fenced, as Joshua, v. 21.
None moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel, v. 21. This expression intimates, (1.) their perfect safety and tranquillity: some think it should be read, from Exod. 11. 7, Against any of the children of Israel did not a dog move his tongue; no, not against any one man of them. They were not threatened by any danger at all after their victory, no, not so much as the barking of a dog. Not one single Israelite (for the original makes it so particular) was brought into any distress, either in the battle, or in the pursuit. (2.) Their honour and reputation; no man had any reproach to cast upon them, or an ill word to give them. God not tied the hands, but stopped the mouths of their enraged enemies, and put lying lips to silence. (3.)
The Chaldee paraphrase makes it an expression of their unalloyed joy for this victory, reading it, there was no hurt or loss to the children of Israel, for which any man should afflict his soul. When the army came to be reviewed after the battle, there was none slain, none wounded, none missing, not one Israelite had occasion to lament either the loss of a friend, or the loss of a limb. So easy, so easy, so glorious, was this victory.
II. The kings that had hidden themselves, must now be called to an account, as rebels against the Israel of God, to whom, by the divine promise and grant, this land did right belong, and should have been surrendered upon demand.
See here, 1. How they were secured. The cave which they fled to, and trusted in for a refuge, became their prison, in which they were clapped up, till Joshua sat in judgment on them, v. 18. It seems,
they all escaped both the hail-stones and the sword, God so ordering it, not in kindness to them, but that they might deliver up their prisoners to the execrible execution; as, for this cause, Pharaoh survived the plagues of Egypt, and was made to stand, that God might in him show his power, Exod. 9. 16.
They all fled, and met at the same place, Providence directing them; and now they who were lately consulting against Israel, were put upon new counsels to preserve themselves, and agreed to take shelter in the same cave. The information brought to them, v. 18, seems to intimate, that there were those of the country, who knew the holes and fastnesses of it, that were in his interests. And the care Joshua took to keep them there when they were there, as it is an instance of his policy and presence of mind, even in the heat of action; so, in the success of their project, it shows how they not only deceive themselves, but destroy themselves, who think to hide themselves from God. Their refuge of lies, and their trust in their confidence, was thus found to be a trap.
2. How they were triumphed over. Joshua ordered them to be brought forth out of the cave, set before him at the bar, and their names called over,
v. 22, 23. And when they either were bound and cast upon the ground, unable to help themselves, or throw themselves upon the ground, humbly to beg for their lives, he called for the general officers and great men of Israel, and committed them to trample upon these kings, and liver their feet upon their necks; not in sport, and to make themselves and the company merry, but with the gravity and decorum that became the ministers of the divine justice, who were not herein to gratify any pride or passion of their own, but to give glory to the God of Israel as higher than the highest, who treadeth upon princes as his footstool, (Isa. 41. 25.) and is terrible to the kings of the earth, Ps. 76. 12. The thing does indeed look barbarous, thus to insult over men in misery, that were suddenly fallen from the highest pitch of honour into this disgrace; it was hard for crowned heads to be thus trodden upon, not by Joshua himself, (that might better have been borne,) at least not by any of his men; the majesty and power of God certainly ought not to be drawn into a precedent, for the case was extraordinary, and we have reason to think it was by divine direction and impulse that Joshua did this. (1.) God would hereby punish the abominable wickedness of these kings, the measure of whose iniquity was now full. And by this public act of justice done upon these ringleaders of the Canaanites in sin, he would possess his people with the greater dread and detestation of those sins of the nations that God cast out from before them, which they would be tempted to imitate. (2.) He would hereby have the promise by Moses made good, (Deut. 33. 29.) Thou shalt tread upon their high places, that is, their great men, which should the rather be speedily fulfilled in the letter, because they are the very last words of Moses that we find upon record. (3.) He would hereby encourage the faith and hope of his people Israel, in reference to the wars that were yet before them. Therefore Joshua said, v. 25, Fear not, nor be dismayed. [1] “Fear not these kings, or any of their’s, as if there were any danger of having this afront now put upon them, in after-time revenged upon yourselves; a consideration which keeps many from being insolent toward those they have at their mercy, because they know not how soon the uncertain fate of war may turn the same wheel upon themselves; but you need not fear that any should rise up ever to revenge this quarrel.” [2] “Fear not any other kings, who may at any time be in confederacy against you, for you see these brought down, whom you thought formidable. This shall the Lord do to all your enemies; now that they begin to fall, to fall so low, that you may set your feet on their necks, you may be confident they shall not prevail; they shall zumi, or be hurled to destruction. He would hereby give a type and figure of Christ’s victories over the powers of darkness, and believers’ victories through him. All the enemies of the Redeemer shall be made his footstool, Ps. 110. 1.
(And, see Ps. 18. 40.) The kings of the earth set themselves against him, Ps. 2. 2. but sooner or later we shall see all things put under him, Heb. 2.
8. and principalities and powers made a show of,
Col. 2. 15. And as these conquerors, may tread upon the Lion and adder, Ps. 91. 13. may ride on the high places of the earth, Isa. 58. 14. and may be confident that the God of peace shall tread Satan under our feet, shall do it shortly, and do it effectually, Rom. 16. 20. See Ps. 149. 8, 9.
3. How they were put to death. Perhaps when they had undergone that terrible mortification of being trodden upon, that they often are ready to say, as Agag, Surely the bitterness of death is past, and that sufficient unto them was this punishment which was inflicted by many; but their honours cannot excuse their lives, their fer-feited, devoted lives. Joshua smote them with the sword, and then hanged up their bodies till evening, when they were taken down, and thrown into the cave in which they had hid themselves, v. 26, 27.
And this it seems, that which had been shelter;
was made their prison first, and then their grate; so shall we be disappointed in that which we flee to from God, yet to good people the grave is still a hiding-place, Job. 14. 15. If these five kings had humbled themselves in time, and had begged peace instead of waging war, they might have saved their lives; but now the decree was gone forth, and they found no place for repentance, or the reversal of the judgment, it was too late to expect it, though, perhaps, they sought it carefully with tears.

Vol. II.—H
28. And that day Joshua took Makkedah, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof he utterly destroyed, them, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain: and he did he to the king of Makkedah as he did unto the king of Jericho. 29. Then Joshua passed from Makkedah, and all Israel with him, unto Libnah, and fought against Libnah: 30 And the Lord delivered it also, and the king thereof, into the hand of Israel; and he smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain in it; but did unto the king thereof as he did unto the king of Jericho. 31. And Joshua passed from Libnah, and all Israel with him, unto Lachish, and encamped against it, and fought against it: 32. And the Lord delivered Lachish into the hand of Israel, which took it on the second day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein, according to all that he had done to Libnah. 33. Then Horam king of Gezer came up to help Lachish; and Joshua smote him and his people, until he had left him none remaining. 34. And from Lachish Joshua passed unto Eglon, and all Israel with him; and they encamped against it, and fought against it: 35. And they took it on that day, and smote it with the edge of the sword; and all the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed that day, according to all that he had done to Lachish. 36. And Joshua went up from Eglon, and all Israel with him, unto Hebron; and they fought against it: 37. And they took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof, and all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining, according to all that he had done to Eglon; but destroyed it utterly, and all the souls that were therein. 38. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir, and fought against it: 39. And he took it, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof; and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroyed all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining: as he had done to Hebron, so he did to Debir, and to the king thereof; as he had done also to Libnah, and to her king. 40. So Joshua snote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings: he left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel commanded. 41. And Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea even unto Gaza, and all the country of Gos ben even unto Gibeon. 42. And all these kings and their land did Joshua take at one time, because the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel. 43. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp at Gilgal.

We have here Joshua's improvement of the late glorious victory he had obtained, and the advantages he had gained by it, and to do this well is a general's praise.

Here is a particular account of the several cities which he immediately made himself master of. 1. The cities of three of the kings whom he had conquered in the field, he went and took possession of, Lachish, v. 31, 32. Eglon, v. 34, 35. and Hebron, v. 36, 37. The other two, Jerusalem and Jarmuth, were not taken at this time; perhaps his forces were either so much fatigued with what they had done, or so well content with what they had got, that they had no mind to attack those places, and so they slipped the fairest opportunity they could ever expect of reducing them with ease, which afterward was not done without difficulty, Judg. 1. 1. 2 Sam. 5. 6. 2. Three other cities, and royal cities too, he took; Makkedah, into the neighbourhood of which the five kings were fled, which brought Joshua and his forces thither in pursuit of them, and so hastened its ruin, v. 28. Libnah, v. 29, 30. and Debir, v. 38, 39. 3. One king that brought in his forces for the relief of Lachish, that had lost its king, proved to meddle to its own hurt; it was Horam king of Gezer, who, either in friendship to his neighbours, or for his own security, offered to stop the progress of Joshua's arms, and was cut off with all his forces, v. 33. Thus wicked men are often snared in their counsels, and, by opposing God in the way of his judgments, bring them the sooner on their own heads.

A general account of the country which was hereby reduced and brought into Israel's hands, v. 40, 42. The part of the land of Canaan which they first got possession of lay south of Jerusalem, and afterward fell, for the most part, to the lot of the tribe of Judah.

Observe in this narrative, 1. The great speed Joshua made in taking these cities, which, some think, is intimated in the manner of relating it, which is quick and concise. He flew like lightning from place to place; and though they all stuck it out to the last extremity, and none of these cities opened their gates to him, yet in a little time he got them all into his hands, summoned them, and seized them, the same day, v. 28. or in two days, v. 32. Now that they were struck with fear by the defeat of their armies, and the death of their kings, Joshua prudently followed his blow. See what a great deal of work may be done in a little time, if we will but be busy, and improve our opportunities.

2. The great severity Joshua used toward those he conquered. He gave no quarter to man, woman, or child, put to the sword all the souls, v. 28, 30, 32, 35, c. utterly destroyed all that breathed; v. 40, and left none remaining. Nothing could justify this military execution, but that here in they did as the Lord God of Israel commanded, v. 40. which is sufficient answer to all inquiries: only to say, it saved them from the imputation of cruelty, but to sanctify what they did, and make it an acceptable piece of service to his justice. God would hereby, (1.) Manifest his hatred of the idolatries, and other abominations, which the Canaanites had been guilty of, and leave us to judge how great the provocation was, which they had given him, by the greatness of the destruction which was brought upon them when the measure of their iniquity was full. (2.) He would hereby magnify his love to his people Israel, in giving so many men for them, and people for their life, Is. 43. 4. when the heathen are to be cast out to make room for this vine; (Ps. 80. 8.) Divine justice appears more prodigal than ever of human blood, that the Israelites might find themselves for ever obliged to speak of lives to the glory of that God, who had sacrificed so many of the lives of his creatures to their interest. (3.) Hereby was typified the final and eternal destruction of all the impotent implacable enemies of the Lord Jesus, who having slighted the riches of his grace, must for ever feel the weight of his wrath; and shall have judgment without mercy. Nations that be @ r y . God shall be turned against them, 5. held, as against all to God's infinite goodness.

3. The great success of this expedition. The spoil of these cities was now divided among the men of war that plundered them; and the cities themselves, with the land about them, were shortly to be divided among the tribes, for the Lord fought for Israel, v. 42. They could not have gotten the victory, if God had not undertaken the battle; then we conquer when God fights for us; and if he be for us, who can be against us?

CHAP. XI.

This chapter continues and concludes the history of the conquest of Canaan; of the reduction of the southern parts we had an account in the foregoing chapter; after which we may suppose Joshua allowed his forces some breathing-time; now here we have the story of the war in the north, and the happy success of that war. I. The confederacy of the northern kingdoms against Israel, v. 4. 5. II. The encouragement which God gave to Joshua to engage them, v. 6. III. His victory over them, v. 7. 8. IV. The taking of their cities, v. 10. 15. V. The destruction of the Amakims, v. 21, 22. VI. The general conclusion of the story of this war, v. 16. 20, 23.

1. AND it came to pass, when Jabin king of Hazor had heard those things, that he sent to Jobab king of Madon, and to the king of Shimron, and to the king of Achshaph, 2. and to the kings that were on the north of the mountains, and of the plains south of Chinneroth, and in the valley, and in the borders of Dor on the west, 3. and to the Canaanite on the east and on the west, and to the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountains, and to the Hivite under Hermon, in the land of Mizpeh. 4. And they went out, they and all their hosts with them, much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea-shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many. 5. And when all these kings were met together, they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel. 6. And the Lord said unto Joshua, Be not afraid because of them: for to-morrow about this time will I deliver them up all slain before Israel: thou shalt hough their horses, and burn their chariots with fire. 7. So Joshua came, and all the people of war with him, against them by the waters of Merom suddenly; and they fell upon them. 8. And the Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel, who smote them, and chased them unto great Zidon, and unto Misrephoth-maim, and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward; and they smote them, until they left them none remaining. 9. And Joshua did unto them as the Lord bade him: he houghed their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire.

We are here entering upon the story of another campaign that Joshua made, and it was a glorious one, no less illustrious than the former in the success of it, though in respect of miracles, it was inferior to it in that respect. The wars, which they wrought for them, were to initiate and encourage them to act vigorously themselves. Thus the war carried on by the preaching of the Gospel against Satan's kingdom, was at first forwarded by miracles; but the war being by them sufficiently proved to be of God, the managers of it are now left to the ordinary assistance of divine grace in the use of the sword of the Spirit, and must not expect hailstones, or the standing still of the sun.

In this story we have,

I. The Canaanites taking the field against Israel. They were the aggressors, God hardening their hearts to begin the war, that Israel might be justified beyond exception in destroying them. Joshua and all Israel were returned to the camp at Gilgal, and perhaps these kings knew no other than that they intended to sit down content with the conquest they had already made, and yet they prepare war against them. Note, Sinners bring ruin upon their own heads, so that God will be justified when he speaks, and they alone shall bare the blame for ever. Judah was now crouched as a lion gone up from the烽火; if the northern kings raise him up, it is at their peril, Gen. 49. 9. Now,

I. Several nations joined in this confederacy, some in the mountains, and some in the plains, v. 2. Canaanites from east and west, Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, &c. v. 3. of different constitutions, and divided interests among themselves, and yet they here unite against Israel, as against a common enemy. Thus are the children of this world more unanimous, and therein wiser, than the children of light. The enmity of the church's enemies should shame the church's friends out of their discord and divisions, and engage them to be one. The head of this confederacy was Jabin king of Hazor, v. 1. As Adoni-zedek was of the former; it is said, v. 10. Hazor had been the head of all those kingdoms, which could not have revolted, without occasioning ill-will; but that was forgotten and laid aside upon this occasion, by consent of parties, (Luke 23. 12.) When they had all drawn up their forces together, every kingdom bringing in its quota, they were a very great army, much greater than the former, as the sand on the sea-shore in multitude; and, upon this account, much stronger and more formidable, that they had horses and chariots very many, which we do not find the southern kings had; whereby they had a great advantage against Israel, for their army consisted only of foot, and they never brought horses or chariots into the field. Josephus tells us, that the army of the Canaanites consisted of three hundred thousand foot, two hundred thousand horse, and twenty thousand chariots. Many there be that have it up against God's Israel; doubtless their number made them very confident of success, but it proved that so much the greater slaughter was made of them.

II. The encouragement God gave to Joshua to give them the meeting, even upon the ground of their own choosing, v. 6. Be not afraid because of them. Joshua was remarkable for his courage, it was his master-grace, and yet it seems, he had need to be again and again cautioned not to be afraid. Fresh dangers and difficulties make it necessary to fetch in fresh supports and comforts from the word of God, which we have always nigh unto us, to be made the more necessary in every case. Those who have God on their side, need not be disturbed at the number and power of their enemies; more are they that are with us, than they that are against us; they have the hosts of the Lord, that have the Lord of hosts engaged for them.

For his encouragement, 1. God assures him of success, and fixes the hour; To-morrow about this time, when an engagement (though possibly) was expected and designed on both sides, I will deliver them up slain. Though they were to be slain by the sword of Israel, yet it is spoken of as God's work, that he would deliver them up. 2. He appoints him to hough their horses, hamstring them, lame them, and burn their chariots, not only that Israel might not use them hereafter, but that they might not fear them now, their God designing this contempt to be put upon them. Let Israel look upon their chariots but as rotten wood designed for the fire, and their horses of war as disabled things, scarcely good enough for the cart.

This encouragement which God here gave to Joshua, no doubt, he communicated to the people, who perhaps were under some apprehensions of danger from this vast army, notwithstanding the experiences they had had of God's power engaged for them. And the wisdom and goodness of God is to be observed, (1.) In instructing the counsels of the enemy, that all the kings of Canaan, who were not dispersed at such a distance from each other, but that they might have got altogether in a body, did not at first confederate against Israel, but were divided into the southern and northern combination, and so became less formidable. And, (2.) In preparing his people to encounter the greater force, by but little breaking them. They first engage with five kings together, and now with many more. God proportions our trials to our strength, and our strength to our trials.

III. Joshua's march against these confederate forces, v. 7, He came upon them suddenly, and surprised them in their quarters. He made this haste, 1. That he might put them into the greater confusion, by giving them an alarm, when they were raw and unprepared. 2. That he might be sure not to come short of the honour God had fixed, to give him the meeting at the enemy's camp, to-morrow about this time. It is fit we should keep time with God.

IV. His success, v. 8. He obtained the honour and advantage of a complete victory; he smote them and chased them, in the several ways they took in their flight; some fled toward Zidon, which lay to the north, and others toward Mizpeh, eastward, both the parties Joshua sent out, pursued them each way. So the Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel; they would not deliver themselves into the hands of Israel to be made proselytes and tributaries, and so offered up to God's grace, Rom. 15. 16. and therefore God delivered them into their hands to be made sacrifices to his justice; for the Israelites were honoured by us or upon us.

V. His obedience to the orders given him, in destroying the horses and chariots, v. 9, which was an instance, 1. Of his subjection to the divine will, as one under authority, that must do as he is bidden. 2. Of his self-denial, and crossing his own genius and inclination in compliance with God's command. 3. Of his confidence in the power of God engaged for Israel, which enabled them to destroy the chariots and horses which others trusted in, Ps. 20. 7.—33. 17. 4. Of his care to keep up in the people the like confidence in God, by taking that from them, which they would be tempted to trust too much to. This was cutting off a right hand.

10. And Joshua at that time turned back, and took Hazor, and smote the king there of with the sword; for Hazor beforetime was the head of all those kingdoms. 11. And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them: there was not any left to breathe: and he burnt Hazor with fire. 12. And all the cities of those kings, and all the kings of them, did Joshua take, and smote them with the edge of the sword; and he utterly destroyed them, as Moses the servant of the Lord commanded. 13. But as for the cities that stood still in their strength, Israel burned none of them, save Hazor only; that did Joshua burn. 14. And all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves; but every man they smote with the edge of the sword, until they had destroyed them, neither left they any to breathe.

We have here the same improvement made of this victory, that was of that in the foregoing chapter. 1. The destruction of Hazor is particularly recorded, because in it, and by the king thereof, this daring design against Israel was laid, v. 10, 11. The king of Hazor, it seems, escaped with his life out of the battle, and thought himself safe when he was got back into his own city, and Joshua was gone in pursuit of the scattered troops another way; but it proved that that which he thought would have been for his welfare, was his trap, in it he was taken as in an evil net, there he was slain, and his city, for his sake, burnt. Yet we find that the remains of it being very well looked after by Israel, the Canaanites rebuilt it, and settled there under another king of the same name, Judg. 4. 2. 2. The rest of the cities of that part of the country are spoken of only in general; that Joshua got them all into his hands, but did not burn them as he did Hazor, for Israel was to dwell in great and goodly cities which they builded not, Deut. 6. 10. and in these among the rest. And here we find Israel rolling in blood and treasure. (1.) In the blood of their enemies; they smote all the souls, v. 11. neither left they any to breathe, v. 14. that there might be none to infect them with the abominations of Canaan, and none to disturb them in the possession of it. The children were cut off, lest they should afterward lay claim to any part of this land in the right of their parents. (2.) In the wealth of their enemies; the spoil, and the cattle, they took for a prey to themselves, v. 14. As they were enriched with the spoil of their oppressors when they came out of Egypt, wherewith to defray the charges of their apprenticeship in the wilderness; so they were now enriched with the spoil of their enemies, for a stock wherewith to set up in the land of Canaan. Thus is the wealth of the sinner laid up for the just.
and so did Joshua; he left nothing undone of all the LORD commanded Moses. 16. So Joshua took all that land, the hills, and all the south country, and all the land of Goshen, and the valley, and the plain, and the mountain of Israel, and the valley of the same; 17. Even from the mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir, unto Baal-gad, in the valley of Lebanon, unto mount Hermon: and all their kings he took, and smote them, and slew them. 18. Joshua made war a long time with all those kings.

22. There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites, the inhabitants of Gibeon: all other they took in battle. 20. For it was of the LORD to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but that he might destroy them, as the LORD commanded Moses. 21. And at that time came Joshua, and cut off the Anakims from the mountains, from Hebron, from Debir, from Anab, and from all the mountains of Judah, and from all the mountains of Israel: Joshua destroyed them utterly with their cities.

22. There was none of the Anakims left in the land of the children of Israel: only in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, there remained. 23. So Joshua took the whole land, according to all that the LORD said unto Moses; and Joshua gave it for an inheritance unto Israel, according to their divisions by their tribes. And the land rested from war.

We have here the conclusion of this whole matter.

A short account is here given of what was done in four things.

1. The occupancy of the Canaanites in their opposition to the Israelites. It was strange, that though it appeared so manifestly that God fought for Israel, and in every engagement the Canaanites had the worst of it, yet they stood it out to the last; not one city made peace with Israel, but the Gibeonites only, who understood the things that belonged to their peace better than their neighbours, v. 9.

2. It is intimated that other cities might have made as good terms for themselves, withoutragged clothes and clouted shoes, if they would have humbled themselves, but they never so much as desired conditions of peace. We are told whence this unaccountable inactivity came, It was of the LORD to harden their hearts, v. 20. As Pharaoh's heart was hardened by his own pride and wilfulness first, and afterward by the righteous judgment of God, to his destruction, so were the hearts of these Canaanites. To punish them for all their other follies, God left them to this, to make those their enemies, whom they might have made their friends.

This was it that ruined them, they came against Israel in battle, and gave the first blow, and therefore might have no favour showed them. Those knew not what they do, who give the provocation to divine justice, or the authorised instruments of it.
ed when he was in his grave. Yes, they were, so did Joshua, who was, in his place, as faithful, as Moses in his. He left nothing undone (Heb. he removed nothing) of all that the Lord commanded Moses. They that leave their duty undone, do what they can to remove or make void the command of God, by which they are obliged to it; but Joshua, by performing the precept, confirmed it, as the expression is, Deut. 27. 26. Joshua was himself a great commander, and yet nothing was more to his praise than his obedience. They that rule both at their will, must themselves be ruled by the divine will, then their power is indeed their honour, and not otherwise. The pious obedience for which Joshua is here commended, respects especially the command to destroy the Canaanites, and to break down their altars, and burn their images, Deut. 7. 2. — 5. Exod. 23. 24. — 34. 13. Joshua, in his zeal for the Lord of hosts, spared neither the idols nor the idolaters. Sory, v. 1. 6. II. Their partial obedience, to the command of God, for the utter destruction of the Amalekites, cost him his kingdom. It should seem, Joshua himself gives this account of his most careful and punctual observance of his orders in the execution of his commission, that in all respects he had done as Moses commanded him; and then it intimates that he had more pleasure and satisfaction in reflecting upon his obedience to the command of God in all this war, and valued himself more upon that, than upon all the gains and triumphs with which he was enriched and advanced.

2. That all the promises God had given to Moses, relating to this conquest, were accomplished on his part, v. 23. Joshua took the whole land, conquered it, and took possession of it, according to all that the Lord said unto Moses. God had promised to his people a land flowing with milk and honey, Exod. 33. 14. and to bring them down, Deut. 9. 3. And now it was done. There failed not one word of the promise. Our successes and enjoyments are then doubly sweet and comfortable to us, when we see them flowing to us from the precept; this is according to what the Lord said: as our obedience is then acceptable to God, when it has an eye to the precept. And if we make conscience of our duty, we need not question the performance of the promise.

CHAP. XII.

This chapter is a summary of Israel's conquests, 1. Their conquests under Moses, on the other side Jordan, (for we now suppose ourselves in Canaan,) eastward, which we have the history of, Numb. 21. 24, &c. And here are the abridgment of that history: their conquests under Joshua, on this side Jordan, westward. 1. The country they subdued, v. 7, 8. 2. The kings they subdued, thirty-one in all, v. 9. 24. And this comes in here, not only, as a conclusion of the history of the wars of Canaan, (that we might at one view see what they had got) but as a preface to the history of the dividing of Canaan, that all that might be put together, which they were now to make a distribution of.

1. Now these are the kings of the land, which the children of Israel smote, and possessed their land on the other side Jordan, toward the rising of the sun; from the river Arnon unto Mount Hermon, and all the plain on the east: 2. Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt in Heshbon, and ruled from Aror, which is upon the bank of the river Armon, and from the middle of the river, and from half Gilead, unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon; 3. And from the plain to the sea of Chinneroth on the east, and unto the sea of the plain, even the salt sea on the east, the way to Beth-jeshimoth; and from the south, under Ashdoth-pisgah:

4. And the coast of Og king of Bashan, which was of the remnant of the giants, that dwelt at Ashtaroth and at Edrei. And reigned in mount Hermon, and in Sealeah, and in all Bashan, unto the border of the Geshurites, and the Maachathites, and half Gilead, the border of Sihon king of Heshbon. 6. Them did Moses the servant of the Lord and the children of Israel smite: and Moses the servant of the Lord gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, and Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh.

Joshua, or whoever else is the historian, before he comes to sum up the new conquests Israel had made, in these verses recites their former conquests in Moses's time, under whom they became masters of the great and potent kingdoms of Sihon and Og. Note. Fresh mercies must not drown the remembrance of former mercies, nor must the glory of the present instruments of good to the church, be suffered to eclipse and diminish the just honour of those who have gone before them, and who were the blessings and ornaments of their day. Joshua's services and achievements are confessedly great, but let not those under Moses be overlooked and forgotten, since God was the same who wrought both, and both put together, proclaim him the alpha and omega of Israel's great salvation. Here is,

1. A description of this conquered country, the measure and bounds of it in general, v. 1. From the river Arnon, in the south, to mount Hermon in the north. In particular, here is a description of the kingdom of Sihon, v. 2. 3. and that of Og, v. 4. 5. Moses had described this country very particularly, Deut. 2. 36. — 3. 4. &c. and this description here agrees with his. King Og is said to dwell at Ashtaroth and Edrei, v. 4. probably, because they were both his royal cities, he had palaces in both, and resided sometimes in one, and sometimes in the other; one perhaps was his summer-seat, and the other his winter-seat, but Israel took both from him, and made one grave to serve him, that could not be content with one palace.

2. The distribution of this country; Moses assigned it to the two tribes and a half, at their request, and divided it among them, v. 6. of which we request the story at large, Numb. 32. The dividing of it when it was conquered by Moses, is here mentioned as an example to Joshua, which he must observe. Joshua had conquered the country on this side Jordan. Moses, in his time, gave to one part of Israel a very rich and fruitful country, but it was on the outside of Jordan; Joshua gave to all Israel the holy land, the mountain of God's sanctuary, within Jordan; so the law conferred upon some few of God's spiritual Israel, external temporal blessings, which were earnest of good things to come. But the Lord Jesus, who conquered this country, has provided for all the children of promise spiritual blessings, the privileges of the sanctuary, and the heavenly Canaan. The triumphs and grants of the Law were glorious, but those of the Gospel far exceed in glory.

7. And these are the kings of the country which Joshua and the children of Israel smote on this side Jordan on the west, from Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon even unto the mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir; which Joshua gave unto the tribes of Israel for a possession, according to their divisions: 8. In the mountains, and in the valleys, and in the plains, and in the springs, and in the wilderness, and in the south country; the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites: 9. The king of Jericho, one; the king of Ai, which is beside Bethel, one; 10. The king of Jerusalem, one; the king of Hebron, one; 11. The king of Jarmuth, one; the king of Lachish, one; 12. The king of Eglon, one; the king of Gezer, one; 13. The king of Hormah, one; the king of Arad, one; 14. The king of Libnah, one; the king of Adullam, one; 16. The king of Makkedah, one; the king of Beth-el, one; 17. The king of Tappuah, one; the king of Hepher, one; 18. The king of Aphek, one; the king of Lasharon, one; 19. The king of Madon, one; the king of Hazor, one; 20. The king of Shimron-meron, one; the king of Achshaph, one; 21. The king of Taanach, one; the king of Megiddo, one; 22. The king of Kedesh, one; the king of Jokneam of Carmel, one; 23. The king of Dor in the coast of Dor, one; the king of the nations of Gilgal, one; 24. The king of Tirzah, one: All the kings thirty and one.

We have here a breviate of Joshua's conquests.

I. The limits of the country he conquered; it lay between Jordan on the east, and the Mediterranean sea on the west, and extended from Baal-gad near Lebanon in the north, to Halak, which lay upon the country of Edom in the south, v. 7. The boundaries are more largely described, Num. 34, 2, &c. this only is enough to show that God had been as good as his word, and had given them possession of all he had promised them by Moses, if they would but have kept it.

II. The various kinds of land that were found in this country, which contributed both to its pleasantness and to its fruitfulness, v. 8. There were mountains, not craggy and rocky and barren, which are frightful to the traveller, and useless to the inhabitants, but fruitful hills, such as put forth flowers, that were entertaining and instructive to the spectator's eye, and filled the owner's hand. And valleys, not mossy and boggy, but covered with corn, Ps. 65, 13. There were plains, and springs to water them; and even in that rich land there were wildernesses too, or forests, which were not so thickly inhabited as other parts, yet had towns and houses in them, but served as foils to set off the more pleasant and fruitful countries.

III. The several nations that had been in possession of this country, Hittites, Amorites, Canaanites, &c. all of them descended from Canaan the accursed son of Ham, Gen. 10, 15-18. Seven nations they are called, Deut. 7, 1. and so many are there reckoned up, but here six only are mentioned, the Gergashites being here either lost or left out, though we find them, Gen. 10, 16. and 15, 21. Either they were incorporated with the other nations, or, as the tradition of the Jews is, upon the approach of Israel under Joshua, they all withdrew and went into Africa, leaving their country to be possessed by Israel, with whom they saw it was to no purpose to contend, and therefore they are not named among the nations that Joshua subdued.

IV. A list of the kings that were conquered and subdued by the sword of Israel, some in the field, others in the towns. Thirty in all, all very particularly named and counted, it should seem, in the order in which they were conquered; for the catalogue begins with the kings of Jericho and Ai, then takes in the king of Jerusalem, and the princes of the south that were in confederacy with him, and then proceeds to those of the northern association. Now, 1. This shows what a very fruitful country Canaan then was, which could support so many kingdoms, and in which so many kings chose to throng together, rather than disperse themselves into other countries, which we may suppose not yet inhabited, but where, though they might find more room, they could not expect such plenty and pleasure: this was the land God spied out for Israel; and yet at this day it is one of the most barren, despicable, and unpromising countries in the world; but the effect of the curse it lies under, since its possessors rejected Christ and his Gospel, as was foretold by Moses, Deut. 29, 23.

2. It shows what narrow limits men's ambition was then confined to. These kings contented themselves with the government, each of them, of one city, and the towns and villages that pertained to it; and no one of them, for aught that appears, aimed to make himself master of the world; but, when there was occasion, united for the common safety. Yet it should seem that what was wanting in the extent of their territories, was made up in the absoluteness of their power, their subjects being all their tenants and vassals, and entirely at their command.

3. It shows how good God was to Israel, in giving them victory over all these kings, and possession of all these kingdoms, and what obligations he hereby laid upon them to observe his statutes, and to keep his laws, Ps. 105, 44, 45. Here were thirty-one kingdoms, or signories, to be divided among nine tribes and a half of Israel. Of these there fell to the lot of Judah, the kingdoms of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, Eglon, Debir, Arad, Libnah, and Adullam, eight in all, beside part of the kingdom of Jerusalem, and part of Geder. Benjamin had the kingdoms of Jericho, Ai, Jerusalem, Makkedah, Beth-el, and the nations of Gilgal, s x in all Simeon had the kingdom of Hormah, and part of Geder. Ephraim had the kingdoms of Gezer and Tirzah. Manasseh (that half-tribe) had the kingdoms of Tappuah and Hepher, Taanach and Megiddo. Asher had the kingdoms of Aphek and Achshaph. Zebulan had the kingdoms of Japhlet, Shimron-meron and Jokzach. Naphtali had the kingdoms of Madon, Hazor, and Kedesh. And Issachar had that of Dor. These were some of the great and famous kings that God smote, for his mercy endureth for ever; and gave their land for a heritage, even a heritage unto Israel his servant, for his mercy endureth for ever, Ps. 136, 17, &c.

CHAP. XIII.

At this chapter begins the account of the dividing of the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel by lot; a narrative not so entertaining and instructive as that of the conquest of it, and yet it is thought fit to be inserted in the sacred history, to illustrate the performance of the promised to do the Fathers, that this land should be given to his children, Jacob, and him, and not to any other. The preserving of this distribution would be of great use to the Jewish nation, who were obliged by the law to keep up this first distribution, and not to transfer inheritances from tribe to tribe, and therefore, we are not without some use for the expounding of other scriptures:
the learned know how much light the geographical description of a country gives to the history of it. And therefore we are not to skip over these chapters of hard matters, as meditations not to be remedied, where God has a mouth to speak, and a hand to write, we should find an ear to hear, and an eye to read; and God give us a heart to profit! In this chapter, I. God informs Joshua what parts of the country that were intended in the grant of land to Israel, yet remained unconquered, and not in possession, v. 1, 6. II. He appoints him, notwithstanding, to make a distribution of what was conquered, v. 7. III.
He commands him to prepare a census of the tribes, v. 1.
It is a repetition of the distribution Moses had made of the land on the other side Jordan; in general, v. 8, 14. In particular, the lot of Reuben, v. 15, 29. Of Gad, v. 24, 28. Of the half-tribe of Manasseh, v. 29, 33.

1. N ow Joshua was old and stricken in years; and the Lord said unto him, Thou art old and stricken in years, and there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed. 2. This is the land that remaineth: all the borders of the Philistines, and all Geshuri. 3. From Sihor, which is before Egypt, even unto the borders of Ekron northward, which is counted to the Canaanite: five lords of the Philistines; the Gazathites, and the Ashdodites, the Eshkalonites, the Gittites, and the Ekronites; also the Avites: 4. From the south, all the land of the Canaanites, and Mearah that is beside the Sidonians, unto Aphek, to the borders of the Amorites: 5. And the land of the Giblites, and all Lebanon, toward the sun-rising, from Baal-gad under mount Hermon unto the entering into Hamath: 6. All the inhabitants of the hill country, from Lebaon unto Misrephoth-maim, and all the Sidonians, them will I drive out from before the children of Israel: only divide thou it by lot unto the Israelites for an inheritance as I have commanded thee.

Here,

I. God puts Joshua in mind of his old age, v. 1.
It is said that Joshua was old and stricken in years, and he and Caleb were at this time the only old men among the thousands of Israel; none (except them) of all those who were numbered at mount Sinai being now alive. He had been a man of war from his youth, Exod. 17. 10. but now he yielded to the infirmities of age, with which it is in vain for the stoutest man to think of contesting. It should seem Joshua had not the same strength and vigour in his old age, that Moses had; all that come to old age, do not find it alike good; generally, the days of old age are evil days, and such as there is no pleasure in them, nor expectation of service from them. 2. God takes notice of it to him, God said to him, Thou art old. Note, It is good for those who are old and stricken in years, to be in remembrance of their being so. Some have gray hair because they have lived long, and therefore do not divide it not, Hos. 7, 9. they do not care to think of it, and therefore need to be told of it, that they may be quickced to do the work of life, and make preparation for death which is coming toward them apace.

But God mentions Joshua's age and growing infirmities, (1.) As a reason why he should now lay by the thoughts of pursuing the war; he cannot expect to see any thing done, it quickly worn out his much land, more perhaps than he thought, to be possessed, in several parts remote from each other:
and it was not fit that at this age he should be put upon the fatigue of renewing the war, and carrying it to such distant places; no, it was enough for him that he had reduced the body of the country, let him be gathered to rest, with honour and the thanks of his people, for the good services he had done them, and let the conquering of the skies of the land be left for those that shall come after. As he had entered into the labours of Moses, so let others enter into his, and bring forth the top-stone;
the doing of which was reserved for David long after. Observe, God considers the frame of his people, and would not have them bethought with work above their strength. It cannot be expected that old people should do as they have done for God and their country. (2.) As a reason why he should speedily apply himself to the dividing of that which he had conquered. That work must be done, and done quickly; it was necessary that he should preside in the doing of it, and therefore, he being old and stricken in years, and not likely to continue long, let him make that his concluding piece of ser-vise to God and Israel. All people, but especially old people, should set themselves to do that which must be done before they die, lest death prevent them, Excl. 9, 10.

II. He gives him a particular account of the land that yet remained unconquered, which was intended for Israel, and which, in due time, they should be masters of, if they did not put a bar in their own door. Divers places are here mentioned, some in the south, as the country of the Philistines, governed by five lords, and the land that lay toward the south, as some v. 4. Some wasteland, as toward the Sidonians, v. 4. Some eastward, as all Lebanon, v. 5. Joshua is told this, and he made the people acquainted with it, 1. That they might be the more affected with God's goodness to them in giving to them this good land, and might thereby be engaged to love and serve him; for if this which they had was too little, God would moreover give them such and such things, 2 Sam. 12. 8. 2. That they might avoid the temptation of supposing they could contract any dangerous familiarity with these their neighbours, so as to learn their way, but might rather be jealous of them, as people that kept them from their right, and that they had just cause of quarrel with. 3. That they might keep them-seives in a posture for war, and not think of putting off the harness, as long as there remained any land to be possessed. Nor must we lay aside our spiritual armour, nor be as if our labours were all, our victory be complete in the kingdom of glory.

III. He promises that he would make the Israelites masters of all those countries that were yet unsubdued, though Joshua was old, and not able to do it, old and not likely to live to see it done.
Whatever becomes of us, and however we may be laid aside as despised broken vessels, God will do his work, and perform it in his own way, and not in our, and bring it out. The original is emphatical, "It is that will do it, I that can do it, when thou art dead and gone, and will do it, if Israel be not wanting to themselves." "I will do it by my Word," so the Chaldee here, as in many other places, "by the eternal Word, the Captain of the hosts of the Lord." This promise that he would drive them out from before the children of Israel, plainly supposes it as the condition of the promise, that the children of Israel must themselves attempt and endeavor their extirpation, must go up against them, else they could not be said to be driven out before them; if afterwards, Israel, through sloth, or cowardice, or affection to these idolaters, set still and let them alone, they must blame themselves, and not God, if they be not driven out. We must work out our salvation, and then God will work in us, and work with us; we must resist our spiritual enemies, and then God will tread them under our feet; we must go forth to our Christian work and warfare, and then God will go forth before us.

7. Now therefore divide this land for an inheritance unto the nine tribes and the half tribe of Manasseh. 8. With whom the Reubenites and the Gadites have received their inheritance, which Moses gave them, beyond Jordan eastward, even as Moses the servant of the Lord gave them; 9. From Aroer, that is upon the bank of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river, and all the plain of Medeba unto Dibon; 10. And all the cities of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Heshbon, unto the border of the children of Ammon; 11. And Gilead, and the border of the Geshurites and Maachathites, and all mount Hermon, and all Bashan unto Salcah; 12. All the kingdom of Og in Bashan, which reigned in Ashtaroth and in Edrei, who remained of the remnant of the giants: for these did Moses smite, and cast them out. 13. Nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites; but the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites until this day. 14. Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave none inheritance; the sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them. 15. And Moses gave unto the tribe of the children of Reuben inheritance according to their families: 16. And their coast was from Aroer, that is on the bank of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river, and all the plain by Medeba; 17. Heshbon, and all her cities that are in the plain; Dibon, and Bamoth-baal, and Bethbaal-meon, 18. And Jahaza, and Kedemoth, and Mephaath, 19. And Kirjathaim, and Sibmah, and Zareth-shahar in the mount of the valley, 20. And Beth-peor, and Ashdoth-pisgah, and Beth-jeshimoth, 21. And all the cities of the plain, and all the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Heshbon, whom Moses smote with the princes of Midian, Evi, and Rekem, and Zir, and Hur, and Reba, which were dukes of Sihon, dwelling in the country. 22. Baalath also the son of Beor, the soothsayer, did the children of Israel slay with the sword among them that were slain by them. 23. And the border of the children of Reuben was Jordan, and the border thereof. This was the inheritance of the children of Reuben after their families, the cities and villages thereof. 24. And Moses gave inheritance unto the tribe of Gad, even unto the children of Gad, according to their families: 25. And their coast was Jazer, and all the cities of Gilgal, and half the land of the children of Ammon, unto Aroer that is before Rabbah; 26. And from Heshbon unto Ramath-mizpeh, and Betonim; and from Mahanaim unto the border of Debar; 27. And in the valley, Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, and Zaphon, the rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon, Jordan and his border, even unto the edge of the sea of Chinneroth, on the other side Jordan eastward. 28. This is the inheritance of the children of Gad after their families, the cities, and their villages. 29. And Moses gave inheritance unto the half tribe of Manasseh: and this was the possession of the half tribe of the children of Manasseh by their families. 30. And their coast was from Mahanaim, all Bashan, all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, and all the towns of Jair, which are in Bashan, three-score cities; 31. And half Gilead, and Ashtaroth, and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan, were pertaining unto the children of Machir the son of Manasseh, even to the one half of the children of Machir by their families. 32. These are the countries which Moses did distribute for inheritance in the plains of Moab, on the other side Jordan, by Jericho, eastward. 33. But unto the tribe of Levi, Moses gave not any inheritance: the Lord God of Israel was their inheritance, as he said unto them.

Here we have,

1. Orders given to Joshua to assign to each tribe its portion of this land, including that which was yet unsubdued, which must be brought into the lot, in a believing confidence that it should be conquered when Israel was multiplied, so as to have occasion for it, v. 7. New divide this land. Joshua thought all must be conquered, before any must be divided. “No,” said God, “there is as much conquered as will serve your turn for the present, divide that, and make your best of it, and wait for the remainder hereafter.” Note, We must take the comfort of what we have, though we cannot compass all we would have.

1. The land must be divided among the several tribes, and they must always live in common, as now they did. Which way soever a just property is acquired, it is the will of that God who has given the earth to the children of men, that there should be such a thing, and that every man should know his own, and not invade that which is another's. The world must be governed, not by force, but right, by the law of equity, not of arms.

2. That it must be divided for an inheritance, though they got it by conquest. (1.) The promise of it came to them as an inheritance from their fathers; the land of promise pertained to the children of promise, who were thus assured for their fathers' sakes, and for their own. The possession of it was to be transmitted by them, as an inheritance to their children. Frequently, what is got by force, is soon lost again; but Israel, having an incontestable title to this land by the divine grant, might see it thereby secured as an inheritance to their seed after them, and that God kept his mercy for thousands.

3. That Joshua must divide it, not by his own will, though he was a wise, good man, it must not be left to him to give what pleased him to each tribe; but he must do it by lot, which referred the matter wholly to God, and to his determination, for he it is that appoints the bounds of our habitation, and every man's judgment must proceed from him. But Joshua must preside in this affair, must manage this solemn appeal to Providence, and see that the lot was drawn fairly and without fraud, and that every tribe did acquiesce in it. The lot indeed causeth contention to cease, Prov. 18. 18. But if upon this lot any controversy should arise, Joshua by his wisdom and authority must determine it, and prevent any ill consequences of it. Joshua must have the honour of dividing the land, (1.) Because he had undergone the fatigue of conquering it; and when, through his hand, each tribe received its allotment, they would thereby be made the more solicitous of obedience to him. And what a pleasure must it needs be to a man of such a public spirit as Joshua was, to see the peep e that were so dear to him, eating the labour of his hands! (2.) That he might be herein a type of Christ, who has not only conquered for us the gates of hell, but has opened to us the gates of heaven, and having purchased the eternal inheritance for all believers, will in due time put them all in possession of it.

4. An account is here given of the distribution of the land on the other side Jordan, among the Reubenites, and Gadites, and half of the tribe of Manasseh, which comes in. 1. As the reason why this land within Jordan must be divided only to the nine tribes and a half, because the other two and a half were already provided for. 2. As a pattern to Joshua in the work he had now to do. He had seen Moses divide the land, and Joshua himself was called to do the same in distributing this, and from thence he might take his measures; only this was to be done by lot, but it should seem, Moses did that himself, according to the wisdom given unto him. 3. As an inducement to Joshua to hasten the dividing of this land, that the nine tribes and a half might not be kept any longer than was necessary out of their possession, since their brethren of the two tribes and a half were so well settled in their's; and that they might not be differed from God, their common Father, would not have such a difference made between his children.

(1.) Here is a general description of the country that was given to the two tribes and a half, which Moses gave them, even as Moses gave them, v. 8. The repetition implies a ratification of the grant by Joshua, Moses settled that matter, and as Moses settled it, so shall it rest; Joshua vindicated, under any pretense about to alter it, the justice of the ratification. This reason is intimated why he would not, because Moses was the servant of the Lord, and acted in this matter by secret direction from him, and was faithful as a servant. Here we have, [1.] The fixing of the boundaries of this country, by which they were divided from the neighbouring nations, v. 9, &c. Israel must know their own, and keep to it, and may not under pretence of their being God's peculiar people, encroach upon their neighbours, and invade their rights and properties, to which they had a good and firm title by providence, though not, as Israel, a title by promise. [2.] An exception of one part of this country from Israel's possession, though it was in their grant, n. m. lely, the Geshurites, and the Maachathites, v. 13. They had not leisure to reduce all the remote and obscure corners of the country in Moses's time, and afterward they had no mind to it, being easy with what they had. Thus those who are not straitened in God's promises, are yet straitened in their own faith, and prayers, and endurances.

(2.) A particular account of the inheritance of these two tribes and a half; how they were separated from each other, and what cities, with the towns, villages, and fields, commonly known and reputed to be appurtenances to them, belonged to each tribe. This is very fully and exactly set down, [1.] That posteriorly might, in reading this history, be the more affected with the goodness of God to their ancestors, when they found what a large and fruitful country, and what abundance of great and famous cities, he put them in possession of. God's grunts look best, when we descend to the particulars. [2.] That the limits of each tribe being punctually set down in this authentic record, disputes might be prevented, and such contests between the tribes, as commonly happen where boundaries have not been adjusted, nor this matter brought to a certainty. And we have reason to think the intermediate register has been still preserved, and the description of the lot of each tribe, was of great use to Israel in after-ages, was often appealed to, and always acquiesced in, for the determining of meum and tuum—mine and thine.

First, We have here the lot of the tribe of Reuben, Jacob's first-born; who, though he had lost the dignity and power which pertained to the birth-right, yet, it seems had the advantage of being first settled. For we find these tribes had no division to them, just in desiring to be seated on that side Jordan, that, since they could not expect the benefit of the best lot, they might have the credit of the first. In the account of the lot of this tribe, mention is made of the slaughter, 1. Of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who reigned in this country, and might have kept it and his life, if he would have been neighbourly, and have suffered Israel to pass through his territories, but he thought it would be to his own good to fight, and did thus ruin upon himself, Numb. 21. 21, &c. 2. Of the princes of Midian, who were slain afterward in another war, Numb. 31. 8. and yet are here called dukes of Sihon, and are said to be smitten with him, because they were either tributaries to him, or, in his opinion to Israel, confederates with him, and hearty in his interests, and his full made way for their's not long after. 3. Of Balah, particularly, that would, if he could, have ruined Israel, and was soon after recompensed according to the wickedness of his endeavour, Ps. 28. 4. For he fell with those that set him on. This was recorded before, Numb. 31. 8. and is here repeated, because the defeating of Balah's purpose to curse Israel, was the turning of that curse into a blessing, and was such an instance of the power and goodness of God, as was fit to be set up in everlasting remembrance, See Micah 6. 5.

Within the lot of this tribe was that mount Pisgah, from the top of which Moses took his view of the earthly Canaan, and his flight to the heavenly. And not far off thence Elijah was, when he was fetched up to heaven in a chariot of fire. The separation of this tribe from the rest by the river Jordan, was that which Deborah lamented; and the preference they gave to their private interest above the public, was what she censured, Judg. 5. 15, 16. In this tribe lay Heshbon and Sihim, famed for their fruitful fields and vineyards. See Isa. 16. 8, 9. Jer. 48. 32. This tribe, with that of Gad, was sorely shaken by Hazael king of Syria, 2 Kings 10. 33. and afterward dishonored and carried into captivity, twenty years before the general captivity of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria, 1 Chron. 5. 26.

Secondly, The lot of the tribe of Gad, v. 24.-28. This lay north of Reuben's lot; the country of Gilead lay in this tribe, so famous for its balm, that it is thought strange indeed if there be no balm in Gilead, 2 Kings 4. But in the tribe of Gad, I Jabez, Gilead, and Re-moth-Gilead, which we often read of in scripture. Succoth and Peniel, which we read of in the story of Gideon, were in this tribe; and that forest which is called the wood of Ephraim, (from the slaughter Jephthah made there of the Ephraimites,) in which Absalom's rebellious army was beaten, while his father David lay at Mahanaim, one of the frontiers of this tribe, v. 26. Sharon was in this tribe, famous for Roses. And within the limits of this tribe lived those Gadarenes, that loved their swine better than their Saviour, fitter to be called Gargashites than Israelites.

Thirdly, The lot of the half-tribe of Manasseh, v. 29.-31. Bashan, the kingdom of Og, was in this allotment, famous for the best timber, witness the oaks of Bashan, and the best breed of cattle, witness the bulls and rams of Bashan. This tribe lay north of Gad, reached to Mount Hermon, and had in it part of Gilead. Mizpeh was in this half-tribe, and Jephthah was one of its ornaments; so was Elijah, for in this tribe was Thisebe, whence he is called the Tishbite, and Jair was another. In the edge of the tribe stood Chorazin, honoured with Christ's wondrous works, but ruined by his righteous woe for not improving them.

Lastly, Twice in this chapter it is taken notice of that the tribe of Levi Moses gave no inheritance, v. 14. 33. for so God had appointed, Numb. 18. 20. If they had been appointed to a lot entire by themselves, Moses would have served them first, not because it was his own tribe, but because it was God's, but they must be provided for in another manner; their habitation must be scattered in all the tribes, and their maintenance brought out of all the tribes, and God himself was the portion both of their inheritance and of their cup, Deut. 10. 9.—18. 2.

CHAP. XIV.

Here is, I. The general method that was taken in dividing the land, v. 1. 1. 2. The demand Caleb made of Hebron, as his by promise, and therefore not to be put into the lot with the rest, v. 6. 12. III. And Joshua's grant of that demand, v. 13. 15. This was done at Gilgal, which was as yet their head-quarters.

1. AND these are the countries which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan, which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, distributed for inheritance to them. 2. By lot was their inheritance, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses, for the nine tribes, and for the half tribe. 3. For Moses had given the inheritance of two tribes and a half tribe on the other side Jordan: but unto the Levites he gave none inheritance among them. 4. For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim: therefore they gave no part unto the Levites in the land, save cities to dwell in, with their suburbs for their cattle and for their substance. 5. As the Lord commanded Moses, so the children of Israel did, and they divided the land.

The historian, having in the foregoing chapter given an account of the disposal of the countries on the other side Jordan, now comes to tell us what they did with the countries in the land of Canaan. They were not conquered to be left desert, a habitation for dragons, and a court for owls, Isa. 34. 13. No. The Israelites that had hitherto been closely encompassed in a body, and the greatest part of them such as knew any other way of living, must now disperse themselves to replenish these new conquests. It is said of the earth, God created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited, Isa. 45. 18. Canaan would have been subdued in vain, if it had not been inhabited. Yet every man might not go and settle where he pleased, but there seems to have been in the days of Peleg an orderly and regular division of the habitable earth among the sons of Noah, Gen. 10. 25. 32. so there was now such a division of the land of Canaan among the sons of Jacob. God had given Moses directions how this distribution should be made, and those directions are here punctually observed. See Numb. 33. 53. &c.

I. The managers of this great affair, were Joshua the chief magistrate, Eleazar the chief priest, and ten princes, one of each of the tribes that were now to have their inheritance, whom God himself had nominated (Numb. 34. 17. &c.) some years before, and it should seem, they were all now in being, and attended this service, that every tribe having a representative of its own, might be satisfied that there was fair dealing, and might the more contentedly sit down by its lot.

II. The tribes among whom this dividend was to be made, were nine and a half. 1. Not the two half tribes that were already seated, v. 1. 2. Though perhaps now that they saw what a good land Canaan was, and how effectually it was subdued, they might some of them repent their choice, and wish they had now been to have their lot with their brethren, upon which condition they would gladly have given up what they had on the other side Jordan; but it would not be admitted, they had made their election without power of revocation, and so must remain in their lot, v. 12. They might, however, if they had not been appointed to a lot by themselves, and it should seem, they were all now in being, and attended this service, that every tribe having a representative of its own, might be satisfied that there was fair dealing, and might the more contentedly sit down by its lot.

III. The rule by which they went, was the lot, v. 13. The disposal of that is of the Lord, Prov. 16. 33. It was to be an affair of wholeheartedness which could not otherwise be accommodated to universal satisfaction, and it was used in a solemn religious manner as an appeal to God, by consent of parties. In dividing by lot, 1. They referred themselves to God, and to his wisdom and sovereignty, believing him fitter to determine for them, than for they themselves, Ps. 47. 4. He shall choose our inheritance for us. 2. They preferred a willingness to abide by the determination of it; for every man must take what is his lot, and make the best of it.
In allusion to this, we are said to obtain an inheritance in Christ, Eph. 1. 11. 12. "Now we have obtained it by lot. So the word signifies; for it is obtained by a divine designation. Christ, our Joshua, gives eternal life to as many as were given him, John 17. 2.

6. Then the children of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him, Thou knowest the thing that the Lord said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnear. 7. Forty years old was I when Moses the servant of the Lord sent me from Kadesh-barna to espy out the land; and I brought him word again as it was in mine heart. 8. Nevertheless my brethren that went up with me made the heart of the people melt: but I wholly followed the Lord my God. 9. And Moses sware on that day, saying, Surely the land wherein thy feet have trodden shall be thine inheritance, and thy children's for ever, because thou hast wholly followed the Lord my God. 10. And now, behold, the Lord hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years, even since the Lord spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness: and now, lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old. 11. As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out and to come in. 12. Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou hearest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fenced: if so be the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the Lord said. 13. And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, Hebron for an inheritance. 14. Hebron therefore became the inheritance of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite unto this day, because that he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel. 15. And the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba; which Arba was a great man among the Anakims. And the land had rest from war.

Before the lot was cast into the lap for the determining of the portions of the respective tribes, the particular portion of Caleb is assigned him, who was now, except Joshua, not only the eldest man in all Israel, but was twenty years older than any of them, for all that were above twenty years old when he was forty, were dead in the wilderness; it was fit therefore that this phcenix of his age should have some particular marks of honour put upon him in the dividing of the land. Now, I. Caleb here presents his petition, or rather, makes his demand, to have Hebron given him for a possession, ('this mountain, he calls it, v. 12.') and not to have that put into the lot with the other parts of the country. To justify his demand, he shows that God had long since, by Moses, promised him that very mountain; so that God's mind being already made known in this matter, it would be a vain and needless thing to consult it any further by casting lots, which we are to appeal to God in those cases only which, cannot otherwise be decided, not in those which like this here, are already determined. Caleb is here called the Kenezite, some think, from some remarkable victory obtained by him over the Kenezites, as the Romans gave their great generals titles from the countries they conquered, as Africanus, Germanicus, &c. 2. He enforced his petition, not only by the children of Judah, that is, the heads and great men of that tribe, along with him, to present it, who were willing thus to pay their respects to that ornament of their tribe, and to testify their consent that he should be provided for by himself, and that they would not take it as any reflection upon the rest of his tribe. Caleb was the person whom God had chosen out of that tribe to be employed in dividing the land, Numb. 34. 19. And therefore, he was entitled to the land he was to receive being commissioner for his own private advantage and satisfaction, he brings his brethren along with him, and waving his own power, seems rather to rely upon their interest. 2. He appeals to Joshua himself concerning the truth of the allegations, upon which he grounded his petition. Thou knowest the things, v. 6. 3. He makes a very honourable mention of Moses, which he knew would not be at all unpleasing to Joshua, Moses the man of God, v. 6, and the servant of the Lord, v. 7. What Moses said, he took as from God himself, because Moses was his mouth, and his agent, and therefore he had reason both to desire and expect it should be made good. What can be more earnestly desired than the tokens of God's favour? And what more confidently expected than the grants of his promise? Caleb, in his petition, sets forth,

1. The testimony of his conscience concerning his integrity in the management of that great affair, on which it proved the fate of Israel turned, the spying out of the land. Caleb was one of the twelve that were sent out on that errand, v. 7, and he now reflected upon it with comfort, and mentioned it, not in pride, but as that which, being the consideration of the grant, was necessary to be inserted in the plea. [1.] That he made his report as it was in his heart, that is, he spake as he thought, and he spake so honourably of the land of Canaan, so confidently of the power of God to put them in possession of it, and so contemptibly of the opposition that the Canaanites, even the Anakims themselves, could make against them, as we find he did, Numb. 13. 30.—14. 7—9. He did not do it merely to please Moses, or to keep the people quiet, much less from a spirit of contradiction to his fellows, but from a full conviction of the truth of what he said, and a firm belief of the divine promise. [2.] That herein he wholly followed the Lord his God, that is, he kept close to his duty, and sincerely aimed at the glory of God in it. He conformed himself to the divine will with an eye to the divine favour. He had obtained this testimony from God himself, Numb. 14. 24. and therefore it was vain-glory in him to speak of it, any more than it is in them who have God's written spirit within them, with their spirits, they are the children of God, humble and thankfully to tell others for their encouragement what God has done for their souls. Note, They that follow God fully when they are young, shall have both the credit and comfort of it when they are old, and the reward of it for ever in the heavenly Canaan. [3.] That he did this when all his brethren and companions in that service, except Joshua, did otherwise. They made the heart of the people glad, in that they showed to how pernicious the consequences of it were, was very well known. It adds much to the praise of following God, if we adhere to him when others desert and decline from him. Caleb needed not to mention particularly Joshua's conduct in this matter, it was sufficiently known, and he would not seem to flatter him; it was enough to say, v. 6, Thou knowest what the Lord spake concerning me and thee.

Now, he expected, he had had of God's goodness to him ever since to this day. Though he had wandered with the rest in the wilderness, and had been kept thirty-eight years out of Canaan, as they were, for that sin, which he was so far from having a hand in, that he had done his utmost to prevent; yet, instead of complaining of that, he mentions, to the glory of God, his mercy to him in two things, [1.] That he was kept alive in the wilderness not only notwithstanding the common perils and fatigues of that tedious march, but though all the generation of Israelites, except himself and Joshua, were one way or other cut off by death: with what a grateful sense of God's goodness to him does he speak it! v. 10. Now, behold, (believe and wonder,) the Lord hath kept me alive these forty and five years—thirty-eight years in the wilderness, through the plagues of the desert, and seven years in Canaan, and he is already eighty-five years old. While we live, it is God that keeps us alive; by his power he protects us from death, and by his bounty supplies us continually with the supports and comforts of life. He holdeth our soul in life. Secondly, The longer we live, the more sensible we should be of God's goodness to us in keeping us alive, his care in prolonging our frail lives, his patience in prolonging our forfeited lives. Has he kept me alive these forty-five years? Is it about that time of life with us? Or is it more? Or is it less? We have reason to say, It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. How much are we indebted to the favour of God, and what shall we render? Let the life thus kept by the providence of God, be devoted to his praise. Thirdly, The death of many others round about us, should make us the more thankful to God for sparing us and keeping us alive. Thousands falling on our right hand and our left, then and now; and yet others who are now living, and have enjoyed by his power and distinguishing favours imposed on us strong obligations to singular obedience. [2.] That he was fit for business, now that he was in Canaan. Though eighty-five years old, yet as hearty and lively as when he was forty, v. 11. As my strength was then, so it is now. This was the fruit of the promise, and out-did what was said; for God not only gives what he promises, but he gives more: life by promise, shall be life, and health, and strength, and all that will make the promised life a blessing and a comfort. Moses had said in his prayer, Ps. 90. 10. that at eighty years old even their strength is labour and sorrow, and so it is most commonly, but Caleb was an exception to the rule; his strength at eighty-five was ease and joy, this he got by following the Lord fully. Caleb takes notice of this here to the glory of God, and as an excuse for his asking a portion of the land when he enters it, that his brother and companion had before him, to show that he was not Joshua tell him he knew not what he asked; could he get the possession of that which he begged for a title to? "Yes," says he, "why not? I am as fit for war now as ever I was." (3.) The promise Moses had made him in God's name, that he should have this mountain, v. 9. This promise is his chief plea, and that on which he relies. As we find it, Numb. 14. 24. it is general, "him will I bring into the land whither he went, and his seed shall possess it:" but it seems it was more particular, and Joshua knew it; both sides understood this mountain for which Caleb was now a suitor, to be intended. This was the place from which, more than any other, the spies took their report, for here they met with the sons of Anak, Numb. 13. 22. the sight of whom made such an impression upon them, v. 33. We may suppose that Caleb, observing what stress they laid upon the difficulty of conquering Hebron, a city garrisoned by the giants, and how from thence they inferred that the conquest of it was utterly impracticable, in opposition to their suggestions, and to convince the people that he spake as he thought, bravely desired to have that city which they called invincible, assigned to himself for his own portion; "I will undertake to deal with that, and if I cannot get it for my inheritance, I will be without." "Well," said Moses, "it shall be thine own then, win it and wear it." Such a noble heroic spirit Caleb shewed as he was the first to his brethren with it, that he chose this place, only because it was the most difficult to be conquered. And to show that his soul did not decay any more than his body, now forty five years after he adheres to his choice, and is still of the same mind. (4.) The hopes he had of being master of it, though the sons of Anak were in possession of it, v. 12. If the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out. Though of Hebron, ch. 10. 37. "the mountain which belonged to it, and which was inhabited by the sons of Anak, was yet unconquered, for though the cutting off the Anakims from Hebron was mentioned, ch. 11. 21. because the historian would relate all the military actions together, yet it seems it was not conquered till after they had begun to divide the land. Observe, He builds his hopes of driving out the sons of Anak upon the presence of God with him. He does not say, "Because I am now as strong for war as I was at forty, therefore I shall drive them out," depending upon his personal valour; nor does he depend upon his interest in the warlike tribe of Judah, who attended him now in making this address, and no doubt would assist him. Nor does he court Joshua's aid, or put it upon that, If thou wilt be with me I shall gain my point." But if the Lord will be with me. Here, [1.] He seems to speak doubly of God's being with him, not from any boast of his own goodness or faithfulness. He had spoken without the least hesitation of God's presence with Israel in general, Numb. 14. 9. The Lord is with us; but for himself, from a humble sense of his own unworthiness of such a favour, he chooses to express himself thus, If the Lord will be with me. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, If the Word of the Lord be my kether, that Word which is God, and in the fullness of time was made flesh, and is the Captain of our salvation. [2.] But he speaks without the least doubt, he is assured that if God were with him, he should be able to dispossess the sons of Anak. "If God be with us, if God be for us, who can be against us, so as to prevail?" It is also intimated that if God were not with him, though all the forces of Israel should come in to his assistance, he should not be able to gain his point. Whatever we undertake, God's being with us, is our security of success; that therefore we must earnestly pray for, and carefully make sure of, by keeping ourselves in the love of God; and on that we must depend, and from that take our encouragement against the greatest difficulties. Upon the whole matter, Caleb's request is, v. 12. Give me this mountain. First, Because it was formerly in God's promise, and he would be sure, Israel knew how much he valued the promise, insisting upon this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day, as most desirable, through perhaps as good a portion might have fallen to him by lot in common with his brethren. This last live by faith, whose life which is given by promise far above that which is given by providence only. Secondly, Because it was now in the Anakims possession, and he would let Israel know how little he feared the enemy, and would by his example animate them to push on their conquests. Herein Caleb answered his name, which signifies all heart.

11. Joshua grants his petition, v. 10. Joshua blessed him, commended his bravery, applauded his request, and gave him what he asked. He also prayed for him, and for his good success in his intended undertaking against the sons of Anak. Joshua was both a prince and a prophet, and upon both accounts it was proper for him to give Caleb his blessing, for the less is blessed of the better. Hebron was settled on Caleb and his heirs, v. 14, because he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel. And happily we, if we follow him. Note, Singular piety shall be crowned with singular favours. Now, 1. We are here told what Hebron had been; the city of Arba, a great man among the Anakims, v. 15. We find it called Kirjath-arba, Gen. 23. 2, as the place where Sarah died. Hereabouts Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, lived most of their time in Canaan, and near to it was the cave of Machpelah where they were buried, which perhaps had led Caleb hither, when he went to spy out the land, and had fixed upon this rather than any other part for his inheritance.

2. We are afterward told what Hebron was. (1.) It was one of the cities belonging to the priests. Josh. 21. 13, and a city of refuge, Josh. 20. 7, when Caleb had it, he contented himself with the country about it, and cheerfully gave the city to the priests and Lord's ministers: thinking it could not be better bestowed, no not upon his own children, nor that it was less than he expected on taking that city, for it was the most desirable, according to his own thoughts. (2.) It was a royal city, and in the beginning of David's reign the metropolis of the kingdom of Judah; thither the people resorted to him, and there he reigned seven years. Thus highly was Caleb's city honoured; pitty there should have been such a bless ishment upon his family long after, as Nabal was, who was of the house of Caleb, 1 Sam. 25. 3. But the best men cannot entail their virtues.

CHAP. XV.

The land, though not completely conquered, yet being (as was said in the close of the foregoing chapter) at rest from war, for the present, their armies all drawn out of the field to a general rendezvous at Gilgal, there they began to divide the land, though the work was afterward perfected at Shiloh, ch. 18. 1, &c. In this chapter, we have the lot of the land of Judah, which in this, as in other things, had the precedence: I. The borders or bounds of the inheritance of Judah, v. 1. 12. II. The particular assignment of Hebron and the country thereunto about Caleb and his family, v. 13. 19. III. The number of the several cities that fell within Judah's lot, v. 21. 63.

1. THIS then was the lot of the tribe of the children of Judah by their families, even to the border of Edom; the wilderness of Zin southward was the utmost part of the south coast. 2. And their south border was from the shore of the salt sea, from the bay that looked southward: 3. And it went out to the south side to Maaleah-acrabbim, and passed along to Zin, and ascended up on the south side unto Kadesh-barnah; and passed along to Hezron, and went up to Adar, and fetched a compass to Karkaa: 4. From thence it passed toward Azmon, and went out unto the river of Egypt; and the goings out of that coast were at the sea: This shall be your south coast. 5. And the east border was the salt sea even unto the end of Jordan. And their border in the north quarter was from the bay of the sea at the uttermost part of Jordan: 6. And the border went up to Beth-hoglah, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah; and the border went up to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben: 7. And the border went up toward Debir from the valley of Achor, and so northward, looking toward Gilgal, that is before the going up to Adummim, which is on the south side of the river: and the border passed toward the waters of En-she-mesh, and the goings out thereof were at En-rogel: 8. And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite; the same is Jerusalem: and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants northward: 9. And the border was drawn from the top of the hill unto the fountain of the water of Noph-toah, and went out to the cities of mount Ephron; and the border was drawn to Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim: 10. And the border compassed from Baalah westward unto mount Seir, and passed along unto the side of mount Jearim, which is Chesalon, on the north side, and went down to Beth-shemesh, and passed on to Timnah: 11. And the border went out unto the side of Ekron northward: and the border was drawn to Shicron, and passed along to mount Baalah, and went out unto Jabneel; and the goings out of the border were at the sea: 12. And the west border was to the great sea, and the coast thereof. This is the coast of the children of Judah round about, according to their families.

Judah and Joseph were the two sons of Jacob, on whom Reuben's forfeited birthright devolved. Judah had the dominion entailed on him, and Joseph the double portion, and therefore these two tribes were first settled; Judah in the southern part of the land of Canaan, and Joseph in the northern part, and on them the other seven did attend, and had their respective lots as appurtenances to these two; the lots of Benjamin, Ephraim, and Dan, were appendant to Judah, and those of Issachar and Zebulon, Naphtali and Asher, to Joseph. These two were first set up to be provided for, it should seem, before there was such an exact survey of the land as we find afterward, ch. 18. 9. It is probable that the most considerable parts of the northern and southern countries, and those that lay nearest to Gilgal, and which the people were best acquainted with, were first part into two portions, and the lot was cast upon them between these two principal tribes, of the one of which Joshua was, and of the other Caleb, who was the first commissioner in this writ of partition; and by the decision of that lot, the southern country fell to Judah, and which we have an account of in this chapter, and the northern to Joseph, of which we have an account in the two following chapters. And when this was done, there was a more equal dividend (either in quantity or quality) of the remainder among the seven tribes. And this, probably, was the general method of which is given concerning this partition, Numb. 33. 54, to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less, and every man's inheritance shall be where his lot fell, that is, 'Ye shall appoint two greater portions which shall be determined by lot to those more numerous tribes of Judah and Joseph, and then the rest shall be lesser portions to be allotted to the less numerous tribes.' The former was done in Gilgal, the latter in Shiloh. In these verses we have the borders of the lot of Judah, which as the rest, is said to be by their families, that is, with an eye to the number of their families. And it intimates that Joshua and Eleazar, and the rest of the commissioners, when they had by lot given each tribe its portion, did afterward (it is probable by lot likewise) subdivide those larger portions, and assign to each family its inheritance, and thus, which bears the better to be done by this supreme authority, and be apt to give less disgust, than if it had been left to the inferior magistrates of each tribe to make that distribution. The borders of this tribe are here largely fixed, yet not unalterably, for a good deal of that which lies within these bounds was afterward assigned to the lots of Simeon and Dan. 1. The eastern border was all, and only, the salt sea. 4. Every sea is salt, but this was of an extraordinary and more than natural saltness, the effects of that fire and brimstone with which Sodom and Gomorrha were destroyed in Abraham's time, whose ruins lie buried in the bottom of this dead water, which never either was moved itself, or had any living thing in it. 2. The southern border was that of the land of Canaan in general as will appear by comparing v. 1-4, with Numb. 34. 3-5. So that this powerful and warlike tribe of Judah guarded the frontiers of the whole land, on that side which lay toward their old sworn enemies, (though their two fathers were twin-brothers,) the Edomites. Our Lord therefore, who sprang out of Judah, and whose kingdom is, shall judge the mount of Esau, Obad. 21. 3. The northern border divided it from the lot of Benjamin. In this, mention is made of the stone of Bohan a Reubenite, v. 6. who, probably, was a great commander of those forces of Reuben that came over Jordan, and died in the camp at Gilgal, and was buried not far off under this stone. The valley of Achor likewise lies under this border, v. 7, to remind the men of Judah of the trouble which Achan, one of their tribe, gave to the congregation of Israel, that they might not be too much lifted up with their services. This northern line touched close upon Jerusalem, v. 8, so close as to include in the lot of this tribe, mount Zion and mount Moriah, though the greater part of the city lay in the lot of Benjamin. 4. The west border went near to the great sea at first, v. 12, but afterward the lot of the tribe of Dan took off a good part of Judah's lot on that side; for the lot was only to determine between Judah and Joseph, which should have the north, and which the south, and not immovably to fix the border of either. Judah's inheritance had its boundaries determined; though it was a powerful warlike tribe, and had a great interest in the other tribes, yet they must not therefore be left to their own choice, to enlarge their possessions at pleasure, but must live so as that their neighbours might live by them. Those that are placed high, yet must not think to be placed alone in the midst of the earth. 13. And unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord to Joshua, even the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron. 14. And Caleb drove thence the three sons of Anak, Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmai, the children of Anak. 15. And he went up thence to the inhabitants of Debir: and the name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher. 16. And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife. 17. And Othniel the son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took it; and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife. 18. And it came to pass, as she came unto him, that she moved him to ask of her father a field: and she lighted off her ass; and Caleb said unto her, What wouldest thou? 19. Who answered, Give me a blessing; for thou hast given me a south land; give me also springs of water. And he gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs. The historian seems pleased with every occasion to make mention of Caleb, and to do him honour, because he had honoured God in following him fully. The grant Joshua made him of the mountain of Hebron for his inheritance is here repeated, v. 13. And it is said to be given him, 1. According to the command of the Lord to Joshua. Though Caleb, in his petition, did make out a very good title to it by promise, yet because God had ordered Joshua to divide the land by lot, he would not in this one single instance, no not to gratify his old friend Caleb, do otherwise, without orders from God, whose oracle, it is probable, he consulted upon this occasion. In every doubtful case it is very desirable to know the mind of God, and to see the way of our duty plain. 2. It is said to be a part among the children of Judah; though it was assigned him before the lot of the tribe came up, yet it proved, God so directing the lot, to be in the heart of that tribe, which was graciously ordered in kindness to him, that he might not be as one separated from his brethren, and surrounded by those of other tribes. Now Caleb having obtained this grant, we are told, How he signalized his own valour in the conquest of Hebron, v. 14. He drove thence the three sons of Anak; he and those that he engaged to assist him in this service. This is mentioned here, to show that the confidence he had expressed of success in this affair through the presence of God with him, ch. 14. 12. did not deceive him, but the event answered his expectation. It is not said that he slew those giants, but he drove them thence, which intimates that they retired upon his approach, and fled before him; the strength and stature of their bodies could not keep up the courage of their minds, but, with the countenances of lions, they had the hearts of trembling hares. Thus does God often cut off the spirit of princes, Ps. 76. 12. take away the heart of the chief of the people, Job 12, 4. and so shame the confidence of the proud; and thus if we resist the devil, that roaring lion, though he fall not, yet he will flee.

II. How he encouraged the value of those about him in the conquest of Debir, v. 15, &c. It seems, though Joshua had once made himself master of Debir, ch. 10. 39, yet the Canaanites had regained the possession in the absence of the army, so that the work was to be done a second time; and when Caleb had completed the reduction of Hebron, which was for himself and his own family, to show his zeal for the public good, as much as for his own private interest, he pressed on his conquest to Debir, and will not lay down his arms till he sees that city also effectually reduced, which lay but ten miles southward from Hebron, though he had not any particular concern in it, but the reducing of it would be to the general advantage of his tribe. Let us learn hence, not to seek and mind our own things only, but to concern and engage ourselves for the welfare of the community we are members of; we are not born for ourselves, nor must we live to ourselves.

1. Notice is taken of the name of this city. It had been called Kirjath-sepher, the city of a book, and Kirjath-sannah, v. 40, which some translate the city of learning; so the LXX. πας γραμματων, whence some conjecture that it had been an universal academy among the Canaanites, like Athens in Greece, in which they were most cultivated; or perhaps the books of their chronicles or records on the antiquities of the nation, were laid up there; and, it may be, this was it that made Caleb so desirous to see Israel master of this city, that they might get acquainted with the ancient learning of the Canaanites.

2. The proffer that Caleb made of his daughter, and a great provision to her, though one that would undeceive the city, and its Canaanite forces that should be employed in that service, v. 15. Thus Saul promised a daughter to him that would go to Goliath, 1 Sam. 17. 25. neither of them intending to force their daughter to marry such as they could not love, but both of them presuming upon their daughter's obedience, and submission to their father's will though it might perhaps be contrary to their own humour or inclination. Caleb's family was not in any way polluted or corrupted, but religious; he that himself followed the Lord fully, no doubt, taught his children to do so, and therefore it could not but be a desirable match to any young gentleman. Caleb, in making the proposal, aims, (1.) To do service to his country by the reducing of that important place: And, (2.) To marry a daughter well, to a man of learning, that would have a particular affection for the city of books, and a man of war, that would be likely to serve his country and do worthy in his generation. Could he but marry his child to a man of such a character, he would think her well bestowed, whether the share in the lot of his tribe were more or less.

3. The place was bravely taken by Othniel, a nephew of Caleb's, whom, probably, Caleb had thoughts of when he made the proffer, v. 17. This Othniel was himself when he was young, long after, in his advanced years, was led by the Spirit to be both a deliverer and a judge in Israel, the first single person that presided in their affairs after Joshua's death; it is good for those who are setting out in the world, to begin betimes with that which is great and good; that, excelling in service when they are young, they may excel in honour when they grow old.

4. Here (as parties being agreed) Othniel married his cousin-german, Achsah, Caleb's daughter. It is probable that he had a kindness for her, before which put him upon this bold undertaking to obtain her. Love to his country, an ambition of honour, and desire to find favour with the princes of his people, might not have engaged him in this great action, but his affection for Achsah did, that made it intolerable to him to think that any one else should do more to win her favour than he would, and so inspired him with this generous fire. Thus is love strong as death, and jealousy cruel as the grave.

5. Because the historian is now upon the dividing of the land, he gives us an account of Achsah's portion, which was in land, as more valuable, because enjoyed by virtue of the divine promise, though we may suppose the conquerors of Canaan, who had had the spoil of so many rich cities, were full of money too. (1.) Some land she obtained by Caleb's free grant, which was allowed while she married within her own tribe and family, as Zelophehad's daughter did. He gave her a south land, v. 19. Land indeed, but a south land, dry, and hot, to be parched. (2.) She obtained more upon her request; she would have had her husband to ask for a field, probably, some particular field, or champaign ground, which belonged to Caleb's lot, and joined to that south land which he had settled upon his daughter at marriage. She thought her husband had the best interest in her father, who, no doubt, was extremely pleased with his late glorious achievement, but he thought it was more for the interest of her to ask, and she would be more likely to prevail; accordingly she did, submitting to her husband's judgment, though contrary to her own; and she managed the undertaking with great address. [1.] She took the opportunity when her father brought her home to the house of her husband, when the satisfaction of having disposed of his daughter so well, would make him think nothing too much to do for her. [2.] She lighted off her gross, in token of her submission to her husband, err, whom she would honour still, as much as before her marriage. She cried over sighted, from off her ass, so the LXX. and the vulgar Latin read it, she expressed some grief and concern, that she might give her father occasion to ask her what she wanted. [3.] She calls it a blessing, because it would add much to the comfort of her settlement; and she was sure, that since she married, not only with her father's consent, but that of the congregation, it was a blessing; for if she married, and the command, he would not deny her his blessing. [4.] She asks only for the water, without which the ground she had would be of little use, either for tillage or pasture, but she means the field in which the springs of water were; the modesty and reasonableness of her request gave it a great advantage. Earth without water would be like a tree without sap, or the body of an animal without blood; therefore when God gathered the waters into one place, he wisely and graciously left some in every place, that the earth might be enriched for the service of man. See Ps. 104. 10, &c. Well, Achsah gained her point, her father gave her what she asked, and perhaps more, for he gave her the upper springs and the nether springs. Two fields, so called from the springs that were in them; as we commonly distinguish between the higher field and the lower field. Those who understand it but of one field, watered both with the rain of heaven and the springs that issued out of the bowels of the earth, gave countenance to the allusion we commonly make to this, when we pray for spiritual and heavenly blessings which relate to our souls, as blessings of the upper springs, and those which relate to the body and the life that now is, as blessings of the nether springs.

From this story, we learn, First, That it is no breach of the tenth commandment, moderately to desire those comforts and conveniences of this life, which we see attainable in a fair and regular way.
Secondly, That husbands and wives should mutually advise, and jointly agree about that which is for the common good of their family; and much more should they concur in asking of their heavenly Father the best blessings, those of the upper springs. Thirdly, That parents must never think that lost, which is bestowed upon their children for their real advantage, but must be free in giving them portions as well as maintenance, especially when they are dutiful. Caleb had sons, 1 Chron. 4. 15. and yet gave thus liberally to his daughter. Those parents forget themselves and their relations, who grudge their children what is convenient for them, when they can conveniently part with it.

20. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Judah according to their families. 21. And the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah, toward the coast of Edom southward, were Kabzeel, and Eder, and Jagur, 22. And Kinah, and Dimonah, and Adadah, 23. And Kittim, and Hazor, and Ibmaun, 24. Ziph, and Telem, and Bealoth, 25. And Hazor, Hadattah, and Kerioth, and Hazron, which is Hazor, 26. Amam, and Shema, and Moladah, 27. And Hazar-gaddah, and Heshmon, and Beth-palet, 28. And Hazarsual, and Beer-sheba, and Bizjothjah, 29. Baalah, and Iim, and Azem, 30. And Eltolad, and Chesil, and Hormah, 31. And Ziklag, and Madmannah, and Sansannah, 32. And Lebaoth, and Shihim, and Ain, and Rimmon; all the cities are twenty and nine, with their villages: 33. And in the valley, Eshtoal, and Zoreah, and Ashnah, 34. And Zanoah, and Engannim, Tappuah, and Enam, 35. Jarmuth, and Adullam, Socoh, and Azekah, 36. And Sharaim, and Adithaim, and Gerar, and Gederothaim; fourteen cities with their villages: 37. Zenan, and Hadashah, and Migdal-gad, 38. And Dilean, and Mizpah, and Joktheel, 39. Lachish, and Bozkath, and Eglon, 40. And Cabbon, and Lahmam, and Kithlish, 41. And Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Naamah, and Makkedah; sixteen cities with their villages: 42. Libnah, and Ether, and Ashan, 43. And Japhthah, and Ashnah, and NZib. 44. And Keilah, and Achzib, and Mareshah; nine cities with their villages. 45. Ekron with her towns and their villages: 46. From Ekron even unto the sea, all that lay near Ashdod, with their villages: 47. Ashdod with her towns and her villages, Gaza with her towns and her villages, unto the river of Egypt, and the great sea, and the border thereof: 48. And in the mountains, Shamir, and Jattir, and Socoh, 49. And Dannah, and Kirjath-sannah, which is Debir, 50. And Anab, and Eshtemoah, and Anini. 51. And Goshen, and Holon, and Giloh; eleven cities with their villages: 52. Arab, and Dumah, and Eshean, 53. And Janum, and Beth-tappuah, and Aphek, 54. And Humah, and Kirjath-arba (which is Hebron,) and Zior; nine cities with their villages: 55. Maon, Carmel, and Ziph, and Juttah, 56. And Jezreel, and Jokdeam, and Zanoah, 57. Cain, Gibeon, and Timnah; ten cities with their villages: 58. Halhul, Beth-zur, and Gedor, 59. And Maarath, and Beth-anoth, and Eltekon; six cities with their villages: 60. Kirjath-baal (which is Kirjath-jearim) and Rabbah; two cities with their villages: 61. In the wilderness, Beth-arabah, Middin, and Secacah, 62. And Nibshan, and the city of Salt, and En-gedi; six cities with their villages. 63. As for the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out: but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day.

We have here a list of the several cities that fell within the lot of the tribe of Judah, which are mentioned by name, that they might know their own, and both keep it, and keep to it, and might, neither through cowardice nor sloth, lose the possession of what was their own, nor through covetousness, seek the possession of what was not their own. The cities are here named, and numbered in several classes, which they then could account for the reason of, better than we can now. Here are, 1. Some that are said to be the uttermost cities toward the coast of Edom, v. 21-32. Here are thirty-eight named, and yet said to be twenty-nine, v. 32, because nine of these were afterward transferred to the lot of Simeon, and are reckoned as belonging to that, as appears by comparing ch. 19. 2, &c. therefore those only are counted, (though the rest are named,) which remained to Judah. 2. Others that are said to be in the valley, v. 33. are counted to be fourteen, yet fifteen are named; but it is probable, that Gederoth, and Gederothaim were either two towns, or names, or two parts, of one and the same city. 3. Then sixteen are named without any head of distinction, v. 37. and nine more, 42. 44. 4. Then the three Philistine cities, Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza, v. 45. 47. 5. Cities in the mountains, eleven in all, v. 48. 51. nine more, v. 52-54. ten more, v. 55-57. six more, v. 58, 59. then two, v. 60 and six in the wilderness, a part of the country not so thick of inhabitants as other parts were. Now here, (1.) We do not find Bethlehem, which was afterward the city of David, and was enabled by the birth of our Lord Jesus in it. But that city, which at the best was but little among the thousands of Judah, Mic. 5. 2. except that it was thus dignified, was now so little as not to be accounted one of the cities, but perhaps was one of the villages not named. Christ came to give honour to the places he was related to, not to receive honour from them. (2.) Jerusalem is said to continue in the hands of the Jebusites, v. 63, for the children of Judah could not drive them out, through their sluggishness, stupidity and unbelief: had they attempted it with vigour and resolution, we have reason to think God would not have been wanting to them, to give them success; but they could not do it, because they would not. Jerusalem was afterward to be the holy city, the royal city, the city of the great King, the brightest ornament of all the land of Israel, God had designed it should be so. It may therefore be justly looked upon as a punishment of their neglect to conquer other cities which God had given them, that they were so long kept out of this. Among the cities of Judah (in all one hundred and fourteen) we meet with Libnah, which in Jor-man’s days revolted, and probably set up for a free independent state, 2 Kings 8. 22. and Lachish, where king Amaziah was slain, 2 Kings 14. 19. it led the dance in idolatry, Mic. 1. 13. it was the beginning of sin to the daughter of Sion. Giloh, Ahitophel’s town, is here mentioned, and Tekoa, of which the prophet Amos was, and near which Jehoshaphat obtained that glorious victory, 2 Chron. 20. 20. &c. and Mareshah, where Asa was a conqueror. Many of the cities of this tribe occur in the history of David’s troubles. Adullam, Ziph, Kehelah, Maon, En-geedi, Ziklag, were places here reckoned in this tribe, near which David had most of his haunts; for though sometimes Saul drove him out from the inheritance of the Lord, yet he kept as close to it as he could. The wilderness of Judah he frequented much, and in it John Baptist preached, and there the kingdom of heaven commenced, Matt. 3. 1. The riches of this country, not distrusted by Jacob’s blessing this branch of his seed, that he should wash his garments in wine, Gen. 49. 11. And in general, Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren should praise, not envy.

CHAP. XVI.

It is a pity that this and the following chapter should be separated, for both of them give us the lot of the children of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, who, next to Judah, were to have the post of honour, and there-fore had the first and best portion in the northern part of Canaan, as Judah now had in the southern part.

In this chapter, we have, 1. A general account of the lot of these two tribes together, v. 1. 4. II. The borders of the lot of Ephraim in particular, v. 5. 10. That of Manasseh following in the next chapter.

1. A ND the lot of the children of Joseph fell from Jordan by Jericho, unto the water of Jericho on the east, to the wilderness that goeth up from Jericho throughout mount Beth-el. 2. And goeth out from Beth-el to Luz, and passeth along unto the borders of Archi to Araroth. 3. And goeth down westward to the coast of Japhleti, unto the coast of Beth-horon the nether, and to Gezer: and the goings out thereof are at the sea. 4. So the children of Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, took their inheribance.

Though Joseph was one of the younger sons of Jacob, yet he was his eldest by his most just and best beloved wife, Rachel; was himself his best beloved son, and had been the greatest ornament and support of his family, kept it from perishing in a time of famine, and had been the shepherd and stone of Israel, and therefore his posterity were very much favoured by the lot. Their portion lay in the very heart of the land of Canaan. It extended from Jordan in the east, v. 1. to the sea, the Mediterrean sea, in the west, so that it took up the whole breadth of Canaan from side to side; and, no question, the fruitfulness of the soil answered the blessings both of Jacob and Moses, Gen. 49. 25. 26. and Deut. 33. 13. &c.

The portions allotted to Ephraim and Manassach are not so particularly described as those of the other tribes; we have only the limits and bounddaries of them, not the particular cities in them, as before we had of the cities of Judah, and afterward those of the other tribes. For which no reason can be assigned, unless we may suppose that Joshua, being himself of the children of Joseph, they referred it to him alone to distribute among them the several cities that lay within their lot, and therefore did not bring in the names of the cities to the great council of their princes which sat upon this affair; by which means it came to pass that they were not inserted with the rest in the books.

5. And the border of the children of Ephraim, according to their families, was thus; even the border of their inheritance on the east side was Ataroth-addar, unto Beth-horon the upper: 6. And the border went out toward the sea to Michmethah, on the north side; and the border went about eastward unto Taanath-shiloh, and passed by it on the east to Janohah: 7. And it went down from Janohah to Atharoth, and to Naarah, and came to Jericho, and went out at Jordan. 8. The border went out from Tappuah westward unto the river Kanah; and the goings out thereof were at the sea. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Ephraim by their families. 9. And the separate cities for the children of Ephraim were among the inheritance of the children of Manasseh, all the cities with their villages. 10. And they drave not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer; but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day, and serve under tribute.

Here,

1. The border of the lot of Ephraim is set down, by which it was divided on the south from Benjamin and Dan, who lay between it and Judah, and on the north from Manasseh; for east and west it reached from Jordan to the great sea. The learned, who aim to be exact in drawing the line according to the directions here, find themselves very much at a loss, the description here being short and indefinite. The report of those who in these latter ages have travelled those countries, will not serve to clear the difficulties, so vastly unlike is it now to what it was then; not only cities have been so destroyed, as that no mark or footstep of them remains, but brooks are dried up, rivers alter their courses, and even the mountain falling cometh to naught, and the rock is removed out of his place, Job. 14. 8. Unless I could hope to solve the doubts that arise upon this draught of the border of Ephraim, it is to no purpose to mention them; no doubt, they were then perfectly understood, so as that the first intention of recording them was effectually answered, which was to notify the ancient landmarks, which posterity must by no means remove.

2. Some separate cities are spoken of, that lay not within these borders, at least, not if the line were drawn direct, but lay within the lot of Manasseh, v. 9. which might better be read, and there were separate cities for the children of Ephraim, among the inheritance of the children of Manasseh; because it proved that Manasseh could spare them, and Ephraim had need of them, and it might be hoped that no inconvenience would arise from this mixture of these two tribes together, who were both the sons of Joseph, and should love as brethren. And by this it appears, that though when the tribes were numbered in the plains of Moab, Mahlah, and Zilpah, at the start of Ephraim in number, for Manasseh was then fifty-two thousand, and Ephraim but thirty-two thousand, Numb. 26. 34, 37. yet by the time they were well settled in Canaan, the hands were crossed again, and the blessing of Moses was verified, Deut. 33. 17. They are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh. Families and kingdoms are diminished and increased, increased and diminished again, as God pleases.

3. A brand is put upon the Ephraimites, that they did not drive out the Canaanites from Gezer, v. 10. Either through carelessness or cowardice, either for want of faith in the promise of God, that He would give them success if they would make a vigorous effort, or for want of zeal for the command of God, which obliged them utterly to drive out the Canaanites, and to make no peace with them. And though they hoped to satisfy the law by putting them under tribute, yet (as Calvin thinks) that made the matter worse, for it shows that they spared them out of covetousness, that they might be profited by their labours, and by dealing with them for their tribute they were in danger of being infected with their idolatry; yet some think, when they brought them under tribute, they obliged them to renounce their idols, and to observe the seven precepts of the sons of Noah; and I should think, for that we find in the sequel of the story, that the Israelites were so far from restraining idolatry in others, that they soon fell into it themselves.

Many famous places were within this lot of the tribe of Ephraim, though not mentioned here. In it were Ramah, Samuel's city, called in the New Testament, Arimathea, of which Joseph was, that took care of our Saviour's burial, and Shiloah, where the tabernacle was first set up. Tirzah, also, the royal city of Jeroboam and his successors, and Deborah's palm-tree, under which she judged Israel, were in this tribe. Samaria, built by Omri, after the burning of the royal palace of Tirzah, was in this tribe, and was long the royal city of the kingdom of the ten tribes; not far from it were Shechem, and the mountains Ebal and Gerizim, and Sychar, near which was Jacob's well, where Christ talked with the woman of Samaria. We read much of mount Ephraim in the story of the Judges, and of a city called Ephraim, it is probable in this tribe, to which Christ retired, John 11. 54. The whole kingdom of the ten tribes is often in the prophets, especially in Hosea, called Ephraim.

CHAP. XVII.

The half-tribe of Manasseh comes next to be provided for; and here we have, 1. The families of that tribe that were to be portioned, v. 1. 3. The country that fell to their lot to be portioned, v. 1. 7. 3. The tribes that descended from Joseph, for the enlargement of their lot, and Joshua's answer to that request, v. 14. 18.

1. THERE was also a lot for the tribe of Manasseh, for he was the first-born of Joseph; to wit, for Machir the first-born of Manasseh, the father of Gilead; because he was a man of war, therefore he had Gilead and Bashan. 2. There was also a lot for the rest of the children of Manasseh by their families; for the children of Abiezer, and for the children of Helek, and for the children of Asriel, and for the children of Shechem, and for the children of Heper, and for the children of Shenida: these were the male children of Manasseh, the son of Joseph by their families. 3. But Zelophehad, the son of Heper, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had no sons, but daughters: and these are the names of his daughters, Mahlah, and Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah. 4. And they came near before Eleazar the priest, and before Joshua the son of Nun, and before the princes, saying, The Lord commanded Moses to give us an inheritance among our brethren. Therefore, according to the commandment of the Lord, he gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father. 5. And there fell ten portions to Manasseh, beside the land of Gilead and Bashan, which were on the other side Jordan; 6. Because the daughters of Manasseh had an inheritance among his sons: and the rest of Manasseh's sons had the land of Gilead.

Manasseh was itself but one half of the tribe of Joseph, and yet was divided and subdivided.

1. It was divided into two parts, one already settled on the other side Jordan, consisting of those who were the posterity of Machir, v. 1. This Machir was born to Manasseh in Egypt, there he had signalized himself as a man of war, probably, in the contest between the Ephraimites and the men of Gath, 1 Chron. 7. 21. His warlike disposition descended to his posterity, and therefore Moses gave them Gilead and Bashan, on the other side Jordan, of which before, ch. 13. 31. It is here said, that the lot came to Manasseh, for he was the first-born of Joseph. Bishop Patrick thinks it should be translated, though he was the first-born of Joseph, and then the meaning is plain, that the second lot was for Manasseh, because, though he was the first-born, yet Jacob had preferred Ephraim before him.

See the names of those heads of the families that settled on the other side Jordan, 1 Chron. 5. 24.

2. That part on this side Jordan was subdivided into ten families, v. 5. There were six sons of Gilead here named, v. 2. the same that are recorded, Numb. 26. 30. 32. only that he who is there called Jecarz (or Jecarz), is here called Abiezer; five of these had each of them a portion, namely, v. 6. which was Heper, had his male line cut off in his son Zelophehad, who left daughters only, five in number, of whom we have often read, and these five had each of them a portion; though perhaps they claiming under Heper, all the five portions were not equal to one of the portions of the five sons. Or if Heper had other sons beside Zelophehad, in whom the name of his family was kept up, their posterity married to the daughters of Zelophehad the elder brother, and in their right had these portions assigned them. See Numb. 26. 12.

Here is, (1.) The claim which the daughters of Zelophehad made, grounded upon the commands God gave to Moses concerning them, v. 4. They had themselves, when they were young, pleaded their own cause before Moses, and obtained the grant of an inheritance with their brethren, and now they could not lose the benefit of that grant. for want of speaking to Joshua, but seasonable put in their demand themselves, as it should seem, and not their husbands for them. (2.) The assignment of their portions according to their claim: Joshua knew very well what God had ordered in their case, and did not object, that they having not served in the wars of Canaan, there was no reason why they should share in the possessions of Canaan, but readily gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father. And now they reaped the benefit of their own pious zeal and prudent forecast in this matter. Thus they who take care in the wilderness of this world, to make sure to themselves a place in the inheritance of the saints in light, will certainly have the comfort of it in the other world, while those that neglect it now, will lose it for ever.

7. And the coast of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethath, that lieth before Shechem; and the border went along on the right hand unto the inhabitants of En-tappuah. 8. Now Manasseh had the land of Tappuah: but Tappuah, on the border of Manasseh, belonged to the children of Ephraim. 9. And the coast descended unto the river Kanah, southward of the river: these cities of Ephraim are among the cities of Manasseh: the coast of Manasseh also was on the north side of the river, and the out-goings of it were at the sea: 10. Southward it was Ephraim's, and northward it was Manassæh's, and the sea is his border; and they met together in Asher on the north, and in Issachar on the east. 11. And Manasseh had in Issachar, and in Asher, Beth-shean and her towns, and Ibleam and her towns, and the inhabitants of Dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of En-dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of Taanach and her towns, and the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns, even three countries. 12. Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities; but the Canaanites would dwell in that land. 13. Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out.

We have here a short account of the lot of this half-tribe. It reached from Jordan on the east, to the great sea on the west, on the south it lay all along contiguous to Ephraim, but on the north it abutted upon Asher and Issachar; Asher lay north-west, and Issachar north-east, which seems to be the meaning of the ch. 10: that is, that this (that is, Manasseh, and Ephraim as related to it, both together making the tribe of Joseph) met in Asher on the north, and Issachar on the east, for Ephraim itself reached not those tribes.

Some things are particularly observed concerning this lot: 1. That there was great communication between this tribe and that of Ephraim. The city of Tappuah belonged to Ephraim, but the country adjoining to Manasseh, v. 8, there were likewise many cities of Ephraim, that lay within the border of Manasseh, v. 9, of which before, ch. 16. 9. 2. That Manasseh liked the cities with their appurtenances in the tribes of Issachar and Asher, v. 11. God so ordering it, that though each tribe had its peculiar inheritance, which might not be alienated from it, yet they should thus intermix one with another, to keep up mutual acquaintance and correspondence between the tribes, and to give occasion for the doing of good offices one to another, as became those, who, though of different tribes, were all one Israel, and were bound to love as brethren.

3. That they suffered the Canaanites to live among them, contrary to the command of God, serving their own ends by conning at them, for they made them tributaries, v. 12, 13. The Ephraimites had done the same, ch. 16, 10, and from them perhaps the Manassites learned it, and, with their example excused themselves in it. The most remarkable person of this half-tribe in after time, was Gideon, whose great actions were done within this lot. He was of the family of Abiezer; Cesarea was in this lot, and Antipatris, famed in the latter ages of the Jewish state.

14. And the children of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto? 15. And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people, then get thee up to the wood country, and cut down for thyself there in the land of the Perizzites and of the giants, if mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee. 16. And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us: and all the Canaanities that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Beth-shean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel. 17. And Joseph spake unto the house of Joseph, even to Ephraim and to Manasseh, saying, Thou art a great people, and hast great power; thou shalt not have one lot only: 18. But the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down: and the outgoings of it shall be thine: for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong.

1. The children of Joseph quarrel with their lot; if they had had any just cause to quarrel with it, we have reason to think Joshua would have relieved them, by adding to it, or altering it, which it does not appear he did. It is probable, because Joshua was himself of the tribe of Ephraim, they promised themselves that they should have some particular provision that was made for them, as much, for aught that appears, as they were able to manage, and yet they call it in disdain but one lot, as if that which was assigned to them both, was scarcely sufficient for one. The word for complainers (Judg. 16.) is προσλογίσας, blamers of their lot, like the children of Jacob, who cried before the departure of the Lord. Two things they suggest, to enforce their petition for an augmentation of their lot. 1. That they were very numerous, through the blessing of God upon them, v. 14. I am a great people, for the Lord has blessed me; and we have reason to hope that he that hath sent mouths, will send meat. "I am a great people, and in so small a lot shall not have room to thrive."

2. That the present increase, do they not speak confidently of the continuance of it; "the Lord has blessed me hitherto, however he may see fit to deal with me for the future." The uncertainty of what may be, must not make us unthankful for what has been, and is done in kindness to us. 2. That a good part of that country which was now fallen to their lot, was in the hands of the Canaanites, and that they were formidable enemies, who brought into the field of battle chariots of iron, v. 16. That is, chariots with long scythes fastened to the sides of them, or the axle-tree, which made great destruction of all that came in their way, mowing them down like corn. They urge, that though they had a good portion assigned them, yet it was in bad hands, and they could not come to the possession of it, wishing to have their lot in those countries that were more thoroughly subdued. II. Joshua endeavours to reconcile them to their lot, he owns they were a great people, and being two tribes, ought to have more than one lot only, v. 17. but tells them, that what was fallen to their share, would be a sufficient lot to them both, if they would but work and fight. They desired a lot in which they might indulge themselves in ease and luxury; but, says Joshua, you must not count upon that; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, is a sentence in force, even in Canaan itself. He retorts their own argument, that they were a great people, "If so, you are the better able to help yourselves, and have the less reason to expect help from others. If thou hast many mouths to be filled, thou hast twice as many hands to be employed; earn and then eat."

2. He bids them work for more, v. 18. Get thee up to the good-country, which is within thy own border, and let all hands be set on work to cut down the trees, rid the rough lands, and make them, with art and industry, good arable ground. Note, Many wish for large possessions, who do not cultivate and make the best of what they have, think they should have more talents given them, who do not trade with those with which they are supplied. Most people's poverty is the effect of their idleness; whereas they would have need not beg.

2. He bids them fight for more, v. 17, 18. when they pleaded that they could not come at the woodlands he spoke of, because in the valley between them and it, there were Canaanites whom they durst not enter the list with. "Never fear them," said Joshua, thou hast God on thy side, and thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, if thou wilt set thine heart to do it, and be not afraid of "the rioters." We straiten ourselves by apprehending the difficulties in the way of our enlargement to be greater than really they are. What can be insuperable to faith and holy resolution?

CHAP. XVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. The setting up of the tabernacle at Shiloh, v. 1. II. The stirring up of the seven tribes that were yet unsettled, to look after their lot, and the putting of them in a method for it, by Joshua, v. 2. III. The distributing of the land into seven lots, by certain men employed for that purpose, v. 3, 9. IV. The determining of these seven into the several tribes yet unprovided for by lot, v. 10. V. The particular lot of the tribe of Benjamin, the borders of it, v. 11-20. And the cities contained in it, v. 21-28. The other six tribes we shall find well provided for in the next chapter.

1. And the whole congregation of the children of Israel assembled together at Shiloh, and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there. And the land was subdued before them.

In the midst of the story of the dividing of the land, comes in this account of the setting up the tabernacle, which had hitherto continued in its old place in the centre of their camp; but now that three of the four squadrons that used to surround it in the wilderness, were broken and diminished, those of Judah, Ephraim, and Reuben, by the removal of those tribes to their respective possessions, and that of Dan only remained entire, it was time to think of removing the tabernacle itself into a city. Many a time the priests and Levites had taken it down, carried it, and set it up again in the wilderness, according to the directions given them, Num. 4. 5, &c. but now they must do it for good and all, not one of the stakes thereof must any more be removed, nor any of the cords thereof broken, Josh. 33. 20. 21.

1. The place to which the tabernacle was removed, and in which it was set up. It was Shiloh, a city in the lot of Ephraim, but lying close upon the lot of Benjamin. Doubtless, God himself did some way or other direct them to this place, for he had promised to choose the place where he would make his name to dwell, Deut. 12. 11. It is most probable, God made his mind in this matter by "Observing the judgment of Uriah." This place was not so much upon, (1.) Because it was in the heart of the country, nearer the centre than Jerusalem was, and therefore the more convenient for the meeting of all Israel there from the several parts of the country; it had been in the midst of their camp in the wilderness, and therefore must now be in the midst of their nation, as that which sanctified the whole, and was the glory in the midst of them. See Ps. 4. 5. (2.) Because it was in the lot of that tribe of which Joshua was, who was now their chief magistrate, and it would be both for his honour and convenience, and for the advantage of the country, to have it near him. The testimony of Israel and the thrones of judgment do well together, Ps. 122. 4. 5. (3.) Some think there was an eye to the name of the place, Shiloh being the name by which the Messiah was known, in dying Jacob's prophecy, Gen. 49. 10. which name is well known among the Jews; the setting up of the tabernacle in Shiloh gave them a hint, that in that Shiloh, whom Jacob spoke of, all the ordinances of this worldly sanctuary should have their accomplishment in a greater and more perfect tabernacle, Heb. 9. 1, 11. And Dr. Lightfoot thinks that the place where the tabernacle was set up, was therefore called Shiloh, because of the peaceableness of the land at this time, as afterwards Salem was his temple, which also signifies peaceable.

2. The solemn manner of doing it. The whole congregation assembled together to attend the solemnity, to do honour to the ark of God, as the token of his presence, and to bid it welcome to its settlement. Every Israelite was interested in it, and therefore all testified their joy and satisfaction upon this occasion. See 2 Sam. 6. 15. It is probable, those tribes that were yet encamped when the tabernacle was removed to Shiloh, decamped from Gilgal, and pitched about Shiloh, for every Israelite will desire to fix there where God's tabernacle fixes. Mention is made, on this occasion, of the land's being subdued before them, to intimate, that the country, hereabouts at least, being thoroughly reduced, they met with no opposition, nor were they apprehensive of any danger, but thought it time to make this grateful acknowledgment of God's goodness to them in the constant series of successes with which he had blessed them. It was a good presage of a comfortable settlement to themselves in Canaan, when their first care was to see the ark well settled, as soon as they had a safe place ready to settle it in. Here the ark continued about three hundred years, till the sins of Eli's house forfeited the ark, lost it, and ruined Shiloh, and its ruins were long after made use of as warnings to Jerusalem; Go, see what I did to Shiloh, Jer. 7. 12. Ps. 78. 60.

2. And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes which had not yet received their inheritance. 3. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, How long are ye slack to go to possess the land which the Lord God of your fathers hath given you? 4. Give out from among you three men for each tribe: and I will send them, and they shall rise and go through the land, and describe it, according to the inheritance of them; and they shall come again to me. 5. And they shall divide it into seven parts: Judah shall abide in their coast on the south, and the house of Joseph shall abide in their coasts on the north. 6. Ye shall therefore describe the land into seven parts, and bring the description hither to me, that I may cast lots for you here before the Lord our God. 7. But the Levites have no part among you; for the priesthood of the Lord is their inheritance: and Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, have received their inheritance beyond Jordan on the east, which Moses the servant of the Lord gave them. 8. And the men arose, and went away: and Joshua charged them that went to describe the land, saying, Go and walk through the land, and describe it, and come again to me, that I may here cast lots for you before the Lord in Shiloh. 9. And the men went, and passed through the land, and described it by cities, into seven parts, in a book, and came again to Joshua to the host at Shiloh. 10. And Joshua cast lots for them in Shiloh before the Lord: and there Joshua divided the land unto the children of Israel, according to their divisions. Here, I. Joshua reproves those tribes which were yet unsettled, that they did not bestir themselves to gain a settlement in the land which God had given them. Seven tribes were yet unprovided for: though sure of an inheritance, yet uncertain where it should be, and, it seems, in no great care about it, v. 2. and with them Joshua reasons, v. 3, How long are ye slack? 1. They were too well pleased with their present condition, liked well enough to live in a body together, the more the merrier, and, like the Babel-builders, had no mind to be scattered abroad, and break good company. The spoil of the cities they had taken, served them to live plentifully upon for the present, and they banished the thoughts of time to come. Perhaps, the tribes of Judah and Joseph, who had already received their inheritance in the countries next adjoining, were generous in entertaining their brethren, who were not provided for, so that they went from one good house to another among their friends, with which, instead of grudging that they were postponed, they were so well pleased, that they cared not of going to houses of their own. 2. They were slothful and dilatory; it may be, they wished the thing done, but had not spirit to stir in it, or move toward the doing of it, though there was so much for their own advantage; like the sluggard, that hides his hand in his bosom, and it grieves him to bring it to his mouth again. The countries that remained to be divided, lay at a distance, and some parts of them in the hands of the Canaanites. If they go to take possession of them, the cities must be rebuilt or repaired, they must drive their flocks and herds a great way, and carry their wives and children to strange places, and this they cannot do without an expedition through some hardships; thus, He that observes the wind, shall not sow; and he that regards the clouds shall not reap, Eccl. 11. 4. Note, Many are diverted from real duties, and debauched from real comforts, by seeming difficulties. God by his grace has given us a title to a good land, the heavenly Canaan, but we are slack to take possession, we enter not into that rest, as we might, by faith, and hope, and holy hands, as not being able to go on without our accoutrements; though, by setting our affections on things above, and having our conversation there, How long shall it be thus with us? How long shall we thus stand in our own light, and forsake our own mercies for lying vanities? Joshua was sensible of the inconveniences of this delay, that while they neglected to take possession of the land that was conquered, the Canaanites were recovering strength and spirit, and gaining possessions in the adjacent countries, and not only by the violence of their hands, which would make the total expulsion of them the more difficult. They would lose their advantages by not following their blow; and therefore as an eagle stirreth up her nest, so Joshua stirs them up to take possession of their lot. He is ready to do his part, if they will but do theirs. II. He puts them in a way to settle themselves 1. The land that remained must be surveyed, at the account taken of the cities, and the territories belonging to them, v. 4. These must be divided into seven equal parts, as near as they could guess at their true value, which they must have an eye to, and not only to the number of the cities, and extent of the country. Judah is fixed on the south, and Joseph on the north, of Shiloh, to protect the tabernacle, v. 5. and therefore they need not describe their country, but those countries only that were yet undisposed of. He gives a reason, v. 7. why they must divide it into seven parts only, because the Levites were to have no temporal estate, (as we say,) but their benefits only, which were entail upon their families. The priesthood of the Lord is their inheritance, and a very honourable, comfortable, plentiful inheritance it was. Gad and Reuben, with half of the tribe of Manasseh, were already fixed, and needed none, but a further care taken of them. Now, (1.) The surveyors were three men out of each of the seven tribes that were to be provided for, v. 4. one-and-twenty in all, who, perhaps, for greater expedition, because they had already lost time, divided themselves into three companies, one of each tribe in each company, and took each their district to survey. The matter was thus referred equally, that there might be neither any partiality used in making up the seven lots, nor any embargo or suspicion given, but all might be satisfied that they had right done them. 2. The survey was accordingly made, and brought in to Joshua, v. 8, 9. Josephus says it was seven months in the doing. And we must in it observe, [3.] The faith and courage of the persons employed, abundance of Canaanites remained in the land, and all raging against Israel, as a bear robbed of her whelps, the business of these surveyors would soon be known, and what could they expect but to be waylaid, and have their brains knocked out by the fierce observers? But, in obedience to Joshua’s command, and in dependence upon God’s power, they thus put their lives in their hands to serve their country. 2. The good providence of God in protecting them from the many deaths they were exposed to, and bringing them all safe again to the host at Shiloh. When we are in the way of our duty, we are under the special protection of the Almighty.

2. When it was surveyed, and reduced to seven lots, then Joshua would by appeal to God, and direction from him, determine which of the three parts should belong to each tribe, v. 6. That I may cast lots for you here at the tabernacle (because it was a sacred transaction) before the Lord our God, to whom each tribe must have an eye, with thankfulness for the conveniences, and submission to the inconveniences, of their allotment. What we have in the world, we must acknowledge God’s property in, and dispose of it as before, with justice and charity, and dependence upon Providence. The heavenly Canaan is described to us in a book, the book of the scriptures, and there are in it mansions and portions sufficient for all God’s spiritual Israel; Christ is our Joshua that divides it to us, on him we must attend, and to him we must apply ourselves, for an inheritance with the saints in light. See John 17. 2, 3.

11. And the lot of the tribe of the children of Benjamin came up according to their families: and the coast of their lot came up forth between the children of Judah and the children of Joseph. 12. And their border, on the north side, was from Jordan: and the border went up to the side of Jericho on the north side, and went up through the mountains westward; and the going out thereof were at the wilderness of Bethaven. 13. And the border went over from thence toward Luz, to the side of Luz, (which is Bethel,) southward; and the border descended to Astaroth-adar, near the hill that lieth on the south side of the nether Bethhoron. 14. And the border was drawn thence, and compassed the corner of the sea southward, from the hill that lieth before Bethhoron southward; and the going out thereof were at Kirjathbaal (which is Kirjath-jearim,) a city of the children of Judah: this was the west quarter. 15. And the south quarter was from the end of Kirjathjearim; and the border went out on the west, and went out to the well of waters of Nephtoah: 16. And the border came down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom, and which is in the valley of the giants on the north, and descended to the valley of Hinnom, to the side of Jebusi on the south, and descended to Enrogel, 17. And was drawn from the north, and went forth to En-shemesh, and went forth toward Gelithoth, which is over against the going up of Adummin, and descended to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben, 18. And passed along toward the side over against Arabah northward, and went down unto Arabah: 19. And the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward: and the beginnings of the border were at the north bay of the salt sea, at the south end of Jordan: this was the south coast. 20. And Jordan was the border of it on the east side. This was the inheritance of the children of Benjamin, according to the coasts thereof round about, according to their families. 21. Now the cities of the tribe of the children of Benjamin, according to their families, were Jericho, and Beth-hoglah, and the valley of Keziz, 22. And Beth-arabah, and Zemaraim, and Beth-erel, 23. And Avim, and Parah, and Ophrah, 24. And Chepharhaammonai, and Ophni, and Gaba; twelve cities with their villages: 25. Gibeon, and Ramah, and Beeroth, 26. And Mizpah, and Chephirah, and Moza, 27. And Rekem, and Irpeel, and Taralah, 28. And Zelah, Eleph, and Jebusi (which is Jerusalem,) Gibeah, and Kirjath, fourteen cities with their villages. This was the inheritance of the children of Benjamin, according to their families.

We have here the lot of the tribe of Benjamin, which Providence cast next to Joseph on the one hand, because Benjamin was own and only brother to Joseph, and was little Benjamin, Ps. 68. 27. that needed the protection of great Joseph, and yet had a better Protector, for the Lord shall cover them all the day long, Deut. 33. 12. And next to Judah, on the other hand, that this tribe might hereafter unite with Judah in an adherence to the throne of David, and the temple at Jerusalem. Here we have, 1. The exact borders and limits of this tribe, which we need not be exact in the explication of; as it had Judah on the south, and Joseph on the north, so it had Jordan on the east, and Dan on the west. The western border is said to compass the corner of the sea southward, v. 14. whereas no part of the lot of this tribe came near to the great sea. Bishop Fuller suggests that since it is not called the great sea, but only the sea, which often signifies any lake or mere, it may be meant of the pool of Gibeon, which may be called a corner or canto of a sea; it is called the great waters in Gibeon, Jer. 41. 12. and it is compassed by the western border of this tribe. 2. The particular cities in this tribe, not all, but the most considerable, twenty-six, are here named. Jericho is put first, though dismantled, and forbidden to be rebuilt as a city with gates and walls, because it might be built and inhabited as a country village, and so was not useless to this tribe. Gilgal was in this tribe, where Israel first encamped when Saul was made king, 1 Sam. 11. 14. It was afterward a very profane place, Hos. 9. 15. All their wickedness is in Gilgal. Beth-El was in this tribe, a famous place; though Benjamin adhered to the house of David, yet Beth-el, it seems, was in the possession of the house of Joseph, Judg. 1:23. 25. and their descendants set up a pillar at Beth-el, and Gilgal was in this tribe, where the altar was in the beginning of Solomon's time, 2 Chron. 1. 3. Gibeah likewise, that infamous place, where the Levite's concubine was abused; Mizpeh, and near it, Samuel's Eben-ezer; Anathoth also, Jeremiah's city, were in this tribe, as was the northern part of Jerusalem. Paul was the honour of this tribe, Rom. 11. 1. Phil. 3. 5. but where his land lay, we know not, he sought the better country.

CHAP. XIX.

In the description of the lots of Judah and Benjamin, we have an account both of the borders that surrounded them, and of the cities contained in them. In that of Ephraim and Manasseh we have the hand of God, but not the cities; in this chapter, Simeon and Dan are described by their cities only, and not their borders, because they lay very much within Judah, especially the former, the rest have both their borders described, and their cities named, especially frontiers. Here is 1. The lot of Simeon, v. 1. to 9. II. Of Zebulun, v. 10. to 16. III. Of Issachar, v. 17. to 25. IV. Of Asher, v. 24. to 31. V. Of Naphtali, v. 32. to 39. VI. Of Dan, v. 40. to 45. Lastly, the inheritance assigned to Joshua himself and his own family, v. 49. to 51.

1. And the second lot came forth to Simeon, even for the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families: and their inheritance was within the inheritance of the children of Judah. 2. And they had in their inheritance, Beer-sheba or Sheba, and Moladah, 3. And Hazar-shual, and Balah, and Azem, 4. And Eتلolad, and Bethul, and Hormah, 5. And Ziklag, and Beth-marcarboth, and Hazar-susah, 6. And Beth-lebaoth, and Sharuruhen; thirteen cities and their villages; 7. Ain, Remmon, and Ether, and Ashan; four cities and their villages: 8. And all the villages that were round about these cities to Baalath-beer, Ramath of the south. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families. 9. Out of the portion of the children of Judah was the inheritance of the children of Simeon; for the part of the children of Judah was too much for them; therefore the children of Simeon had their inheritance within the inheritance of them.

Simeon's lot was drawn after Judah's, Joseph's, and Benjamin's, because Jacob had put that tribe under disgrace, yet it is put before the two younger sons of Leah and the three sons of the hand-maidens. Not one person of note, either judge or prophet, was of the tribe, that we know of.

1. The situation of their lot was within that of Judah, v. 1. and was taken from it, v. 9. It seems, they that first surveyed the land, thought it larger than it was, and that it would have held out, to give every tribe in proportion as large a share as they had carved out of Judah; but, upon a more strict inquiry, it was found that it would not reach, v. 9, the part of the children of Judah was too much for them, more than they needed, and more, as it proved, than fell to their share. Yet God did not by the lot lessen it, but left it to their prudence and care afterward to discover and rectify the mistake, which, as they did, (1.) The men of Judah did not oppose the taking away of the cities again, which by the first distribution fell within their border, when they were convinced that they had more than their proportion. In all such cases, errors must be expected, and even admitted if there be occasion. Though, in strictness, what fell to their lot, was their right against all the world, yet they would not insist upon it, when it appeared that another tribe would want what they had to spare. Note, We must look on the things of others, and not on our own only. The abundance of some must supply the wants of others, that there may be some of an equality, for which there may be equity where there was not before; and thus they that had thus taken off from Judah to be put into a new lot, Providence directed to the tribe of Simeon, that Jacob's prophecy concerning this tribe might be fulfilled, I will divide them in Jacob. The cities of Simeon were scattered in Judah, with which tribe they were surrounded, except on that side toward the sea. This brought them into a confederacy with the tribe of Judah, Judg. 1. 3. and afterward was a proper occasion of the adherence of many of this tribe to the house of David, at the time of the revolt of the ten tribes to Jeroboam, 2 Chron. 15. 9, out of Simeon they fell to Asa in abundance. It is good being in a good neighbourhood.

2. The cities within their lot are here named. Beer-sheba, or Sheba, for they seem to be the same place, is put first, Ziklag is one of them, which we read of in David's story. What course they took to enlarge their borders and make room for themselves, we find 1 Chron. 4. 39. &c.

10. And the third lot came up for the children of Zebulun, according to their families: and the border of their inheritance was unto Sarid; 11. And their border went up toward the sea, and Maralah, and reached to Dabbasbeth, and reached to the river that is before Jokneam; 12. And turned from Sarid eastward, toward the sun-rising, unto the border of Chisloth-tabor, and then goeth out to Daberath, and goeth up to Japhia, 13. And from thence passeth on along on the east to Gittah-hepher, to Ittah-kazin, and goeth out to Remmon-methoar to Neah: 14. And the border compasseth it on the north side to Hannathon: and the outgoings thereof are in the valley of Jiphthah-el: 15. And Kattath, and Nahalal, and Shimron, and Idalah, and Beth-lehem: twelve cities with their villages. 16. This is the inheritance of the children of Zebulun according to their families, these cities with their villages.

This is the lot of Zebulun, who, though born of Leah after Issachar, yet was blessed by Jacob and Moses before him; and therefore it was so ordered, that his lot was drawn before that of Issachar's, north of which it lay, and south of Asher.

1. The lot of this tribe was washed by the great sea on the west, and by the sea of Tiberius on the north, answering Jacob's prophecy, Gen. 49. 13. Zebulun shall be a haven of ships; trading ships on the great sea, and fishing ships on the sea of Galilee.

2. Though there were some palaces in this tribe which were made famous in the Old Testament, especially Mount Carmel, on which the famous trial was between God and Baal in Eliah’s time, yet it was made much more illustrious in the New Testament, for within the lot of this tribe was Nazareth, where our blessed Saviour spent so much of his time on earth, and from which he was called Jesus of Nazareth, and Mount Tabor on which he was transfigured, and that coast of the sea of Galilee on which Christ preached so many sermons, and wrought so many miracles.

17. And the fourth lot came out to Issachar, for the children of Issachar according to their families. 18. And their border was toward Jezreel, and Chesulloth, and Shunem, 19. And Haphraim, and Shihon, and Anaharath, 20. And Rabbith, and Kishion, and Abez, 21. And Remeth, and Engannim, and En-haddah, and Beth-pazzez; 22. And the coast reacheth to Tabor, and Shazimuth, and Beth-shemesh; and the outgoings of their border were at Jordan: sixteen cities with their villages. 23. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Issachar according to their families, the cities and their villages.

The lot of Issachar ran from Jordan in the east, to the great sea in the west, Manasseh on the south, and Zebulun on the north. A numerous tribe, Numb. 26. 25. Tola, one of the judges, was of this tribe, Judg. 10. 1. So was Baasha, one of the kings of Israel, 1 Kings 15. 27. The most considerable places in this tribe were, 1. Jezreel, in which was Ahab’s palace, and near it Naboth’s vineyard. 2. Shunem, where lived the good Shunamite, that entertained Elisha. 3. The river Kishon, on the banks of which, in this tribe, Sisera was beaten by Deborah and Barak. 4. The mountains of Gilboa, on which Saul and Jonathan were slain, which were not far from En-dor, where Saul consulted the witch. 5. The valley of Megiddo, where Josiah was slain, near Hadad-rimmon, 2 Kings 23. 29. Zech. 12. 11.

24. And the fifth lot came out for the tribe of the children of Asher according to their families. 25. And their border was Helkath, and Hali, and Bethen, and Achshaph, 26. And Alammelech, and Amad, and Mishael; and reacheth to Carmel westward, and to Shihor-libnah; 27. And turneth toward the sun-rising to Beth-dagon, and reacheth to Zebulun, and to the valley of Jiphthah-el, toward the north side of Bethemek, and Neiel, and goeth out to Cabul on the left hand, 28. And Hebron, and Rehob, and Hammon, and Kanah, even unto great Zidon; 29. And then the coast turneth to Ramah, and to the strong city Tyre; and the coast turneth to Hosah; and the outgoings thereof are at the sea, from the coast to Achzib: 30. Ummah also, and Aphek, and Rehob: twenty and two cities with their villages. 31. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Asher according to their families, these cities with their villages.

The lot of Asher lay upon the coast of the great sea; we read not of any famous person of this tribe, but Anna the prophetess, who was a constant resident in the temple at the time of our Saviour’s birth, Luke 2. 36. Nor were there many famous places in this tribe. Apehek, mentioned v. 30. was the place near which Ben-hadad was beaten by Ahab, 1 Kings 20. 50. But close adjoining to this tribe were the celebrated sea-port towns of Tyre and Sidon, which we read so much of. Tyre is called here that strong city, v. 29. But Bishop Patrick thinks it was not the same Tyre, that we read of afterwards, for that was built on an island; this old strong city was on the continent. And it is conjectured by some, that into these two strong holds, Sidon and Tzor, or Tyre, many of the people of Canaan fled and took shelter, when Joshua invaded them.

32. The sixth lot came out to the children of Naphtali, even for the children of Naphtali according to their families. 33. And their coast was from Heleph, from Alon to Zaanannim, and Adamim, Nekeb, and Jabbeneel, unto Lakum; and the outgoings thereof were at Jordan; 34. And then the coast turneth westward to Aznoth-tabor, and goeth out from thence to Hukkok, and reacheth to Zebulun on the south side, and reacheth to Asher on the west side, and to Judah upon Jordan toward the sun-rising. 35. And the fenced cities are Ziddim, Zer, and Hammath, Rakkath, and Chinnereth, 36. And Adamah, and Ramah, and Hazor, 37. And Keled, and Edrei, and En-hazor, 38. And iron, and Migdal-el, Horem, Bethanath, and Beth-shemesh; nineteen cities with their villages. 39. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Naphtali according to their families, the cities and their villages.

Naphtali lay furthest north of all the tribes, bordering on mount Libanus. The city of Lesheem, or Luish, lay on the utmost edge of it to the north, and therefore, when the Danites had made themselves masters of it, and called it Dan, the length of Canaan from north to south was reckoned from Dan to Beer-sheba. It had Zebulun on the south, Asher on the west, and Judah upon Jordan, probably, a city of that name, and so distinguished from the tribe of Judah, on the east. It was in the lot of this tribe, near the waters of Merom, that Joshua fought and routed Jabin, ch. 11. 1. &c. In this tribe stood Capernaum and Bethsaida, on the north end of the sea of Tiberias, in which Christ did so many mighty works; and the mountain (as is supposed) on which Christ preached, Matt. 5. 1.

40. And the seventh lot came out for the tribe of the children of Dan, according to their families. 41. And the coast of their inheritance was Zorah, and Eshtaol, and Ir-shemesh, 42. And Shaalabbin, and Ajalon, and Jethlah, 43. And Elon, and Thimnahath, and Ekron, 44. And Eltekeh, and Gibbethon, and Baalath, 45. And Jehud.
and Bene-berak, and Gath-rimmon, 46. And Me-jarkon, and Rakkon, with the border before Japho. 47. And the coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them; therefore the children of Dan went up to fight against Leshem, and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Leshem, Dan, after the name of Dan their father. 48. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Dan according to their families, these cities with their villages.

Dan, though commander of one of the four squadrons of the camp of Israel, in the wilderness, that which brought up the rear, yet was last provided for in Canaan, and his lot fell in the southern part of Canaan, between Judah on the east, and the land of the Philistines on the west; Ephraim on the north, and Simeon on the south. Providence ordered this numerous and powerful tribe into a post of danger, as best able to deal with those vexatious neighbours the Philistines, and so it was found in Samson. Here is,

1. An account of what fell to this tribe by lot: Zorah, and Eshtaol, and the camp of Dan thereabouts, we read of in the story of Samson. And near there was the valley of Eschol, whence the spies brought the famous bunch of grapes. Japho, or Joppa, was in this lot.

2. An account of what they got by their own industry and valour, which is mentioned here, v. 47, but related at large, Judg. 18. 7, &c.

49. When they had made an end of dividing the land for inheritance by their coasts, the children of Israel gave an inheritance to Joshua the son of Nun among them: 50. According to the word of the Lord, they gave him the city which he asked, even Timnath-serah in mount Ephraim: and he built the city, and dwelt therein. 51. These are the inheritances which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, divided for an inheritance by lot in Shiloh before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. So they made an end of dividing the country.

Before this account of the dividing of the land is solemnly closed up, in the last verse, which intimates that the thing was done to the satisfaction of all, here is an account of the particular inheritance assigned to Joshua:

1. He was last served, though the eldest and greatest man of all Israel, and who, having commanded in the conquest of Canaan, might have demanded the first settlement in it for himself and his family. But he would make it appear that in all he did, he sought the good of his country, and not any private interest of his own. He was content to be unfixed till he saw them all placed; and herein is a great example to all in public places, to prefer the common welfare before their particular satisfaction. Let the public first be served.

2. He had his lot according unto the word of the Lord; it is probable, when God by Moses told Caleb what inheritance he should have, Josh. 14. 9, he gave the like promise to Joshua, which he had an eye to in making his election, which made his portion doubly pleasant, that he had it, not as the rest, by common providence, but by special promise.

3. He chose it in mount Ephraim, which belonged to his own tribe, with which he thereby put himself in common, when he might by prerogative have chosen his inheritance in some other tribe, as suppose that of Judah, and thereby have distinguished himself from them. Let no man's preference or honour make him ashamed of his family or country, or estrange him from it. The tabernacle was set up in the lot of Ephraim, and Joshua would foretell not to be far from that.

4. The children of Israel are said to give it him, v. 49, which bespeaks his humility, that he would not take it to himself without the people's consent and approbation, as if he would thereby own himself, though major singulis—greater than any one, yet minor universis—less than the whole assembly, and would hold even the estate of his family, under God, by the grant of the people.

5. It was a city that must be built before it was fit to be dwelt in: while others dwelt in houses which they builded not, Joshua must build for himself, that he might be a pattern of industry and contentment with mean things, such buildings as he could hastily run up, without curiosity or magnificence. Our Lord Jesus thus came and dwelt among us, not in pomp but poverty, providing rest for us, yet himself not having where to lay his head. Even Christ pleased not himself.

CHAP. XX.

This short chapter is concerning the cities of refuge, which we often read of in the writings of Moses, but this is the last time that we find mention of them, for now that matter was thoroughly settled. Here is, I. The law God gave concerning them, v. 1. 8. II. The people's designation of the particular cities for that use, v. 7. 9. And this remedial law was a figure of good things to come.

1. The Lord also spake unto Joshua saying, 2. Speak to the children of Israel, saying, Appoint out for you cities of refuge, whereof I spake unto you by the hand of Moses: 3. That the slayer that killeth any person unwares and unwittingly may flee thither: and they shall be your refuge from the avenger of blood. And when he that doth flee unto one of those cities shall stand at the entering of the gate of the city, and shall declare his cause in the ears of the elders of that city, they shall take him into the city unto them, and give him a place, that he may dwell among them. 5. And if the avenger of blood pursue after him, then they shall not deliver the slayer up into his hand: because he smote his neighbour unwittingly, and hated him not beforehand.

6. And he shall dwell in that city, until he stand before the congregation for judgment, and until the death of the high priest that shall be in those days: then shall the slayer return, and come unto his own city, and unto his own house, unto the city from whence he fled.

Many things were by the law of Moses ordered to be done when they came to Canaan, and this among the rest, the appointing of sanctuaries for the protection of those that were guilty of casual murder; which was a privilege to all Israel, since no man could be sure but some time or other it might be his own case; and it was for the interest of the next person whose hand only was guilty, but not his heart, should not he shed, no not by the avenger of blood: of this law God here reminds them, which was so much for their advantage, that they might remind themselves of the other laws he had given them, which concerned his honour.

1. Orders are given for the appointing of these cities, v. 2. and very seasonably at this time when the land was surveyed, and so they were enabled to divide the coasts of it into three parts, as God had directed them, in order to the more convenient situation of these cities of refuge, Deut. 19. 3. Yet, it is probable that it was not done till after the Levites had their portion assigned them in the next chapter, because the cities of refuge were all to be Levites’ cities. As soon as ever God had given them their cities of rest, he bade them appoint cities of refuge, and so by this law they might be glad to escape. Thus God provided, not only for their case at all times, but for their safety in time of danger, and such times we must expect and prepare for in this world. And it intimates what God’s spiritual Israel have, and shall have in Christ and heaven, not only to repose themselves in, but refuge to secure themselves in. And we cannot think these cities of refuge would have been so often and so much spoken of in the law of Moses, and have had so much care taken about them, (when the intention of them might have been effectually answered, as it is in our law, by authorising the courts of judgment to protect and acquit the manslayer in all those cases wherein he was to have privilege of sanctuary,) if they were not designed to typify the relief which the gospel provides for poor penitent sinners, and their protection from the curse of the law and the wrath of God, in our Lord Jesus, to whom believers flee for refuge, Heb. 6. 18. and in whom they are found, Phil. 3. 9. as in a sanctuary, where they are privileged from arrest, and there is now no condemnation to them, Rom. 8. 1.

II. Instructions are given for the using of these cities. The laws in this matter we had before, Numb. 35. 10, &c. where they were opened at large.

1. It is supposed that a man might possibly kill a person, it may be, his own child, or dearest friend, unaawares and unwittingly, v. 3. not only whom he hated not, but whom he truly loved, beforehand, v. 5, for the way of man is not in himself. What reason have we to thank God who has kept us both from slaying, and from being slain by accident! In this case, it is supposed that the relations of the person slain would demand the life of the slayer, as a satisfaction to that ancient law, that, who sheds man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed.

2. It is provided, that if upon trial it appeared, that the murder was done purely by accident, and not by design, either upon an old grudge, or a sudden passion, then the slayer should be sheltered from the avenger of blood in any one of these cities, v. 4. But if the murderer was entitled to a dwelling in that city, was taken into it, and became a constant inhabitant of it, but was confined to it, as a prisoner at large; only if he survived the High Priest, then, and not till then, he might return to his own city. And the Jews say, “If he died before the High Priest in the city of his refuge and exile, and was buried there, yet at the death of the High Priest, his bones should be removed with respect to the place of his fathers sepulchres.”

7. And they appointed Kedesh in Galilee in mount Naphtali, and Shechem in mount Ephraim, and Kuyath-arba (which is Hebron,) in the mountain of Judah. 8. And on the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward, they assigned Bezer in the wilderness upon the plain out of the tribe of Reuben, and Ramoth in Gilgal out of the tribe of Gad, and Golan in Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh. 9. These were the cities appointed for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them, that whosoever killeth any person at unaawares might flee thither, and not die by the hand of the avenger of blood, until he stood before the congregation.

We have here the nomination of the cities of refuge in the land of Canaan, which was made by the law of Moses (as the case of Joshua and the princes, v. 7, and upon occasion of the murder of the Levite,) repeated the nomination of the other three in the lot of the other two tribes and a half, which was made by Moses, Deut. 4. 43. but (as Bishop Patrick thinks) they had not the privilege till now.

1. They are said to sanctify these cities, that is the original word for appointed, v. 7. Not that any ceremony was used to signify the consecration of them, only they did by a public act of court solemnly declare them cities of refuge; and, as such, sacred to the honour of God, as the protector of exposed innocence. If they were sanctuaries, it was proper to say, they were sanctified. Christ, our Refuge, was sanctified by his Father; nay, for our sakes he sanctified himself, John 17. 19.

2. These cities (as those also on the other side Jordan) stood in the three several parts of the country, so conveniently that a man might (they say) in half a day reach some one of them from any corner of the country. Kedesh was in Naphtali, the most northern tribe, Hebron in Judah, the most southern, and Shechem in Ephraim, which lay in the middle, about equally distant from the other two. God is a refuge at hand.

3. They were all Levites’ cities, which put an honour upon God’s tribe, making them judges in those cases wherein divine providence was so nearly concerned, and protectors to oppressed innocence; it was also a kindness to the poor refugee, that when he might not go up to the house of the Lord, nor tread his courts, yet he had the servants of God’s house with him, to instruct him, and pray for him, and help to make up the want of public ordinances. If he must be confined, it shall be to a Levite-city, where he may, if he will, improve his time.

4. These cities were upon hills to be seen afar off, for a city on a hill cannot be hid; and this would both direct and encourage the poor distressed man that was making that way; and though therefore his way at last was up-hill, yet this would comfort him, that he would be in his place of safety quickly; and if he could but get into the suburbs of the city, he was well enough off.

5. Some observe a significance in the names of these cities with application to Christ our Refuge. I delight not in quibbling upon names, yet am willing to take notice of these. Kedesh signifies holy, and our refuge is the holy Jesus. Shechem, a shoulder, and the government is upon his shoulder: Hebron, felicity, and believers are called into the fellowship of Christ Jesus our Lord. Bezer, a fortification, for he is a strong-hold to all them that trust in him.

Chap. XXI.

It had been often said that the tribe of Levi should have no inheritance with their brethren, no particular part of the country assigned them, as the other tribes had, no not the country about Shiloh, which, one would have expected, should have been appropriated to them as the hands of the church; but though they were not thus cast into a country by themselves, it appears, by the provision made for them in this chapter, that they were no losers, but the rest of the tribes were very much gainers, by their being dispersed. We have here, 1. The motion they made to have their cities assigned them, according to God's appointment, v. 1. 2. The nomination of the cities accordingly, out of the several tribes, and the distribution of them to the respective families of this tribe, v. 3-8. III. A catalogue of the cities, forty-eight in all, v. 9-42. IV. A receipt entered in full of all that God had promised to his people Israel, v. 43-45.

1. THEN came near the heads of the fathers of the Levites unto Eleazar the priest, and unto Joshua the son of Nun, and unto the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel; 2. And they spake unto them at Shiloh in the land of Canaan, saying, The Lord commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities to dwell in, with the suburbs thereof for our cattle. 3. And the children of Israel gave unto the Levites out of their inheritance, at the commandment of the Lord, these cities and their suburbs. 4. And the lot came out for the families of the Kohathites: and the children of Aaron the priest, which were of the Levites, had by lot, out of the tribe of Judah, and out of the tribe of Simeon, and out of the tribe of Benjamin, thirteen cities. 5. And the rest of the children of Kohath had by lot, out of the families of the tribe of Ephraim, and out of the tribe of Dan, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh, ten cities. 6. And the children of Gershon had by lot, out of the families of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, thirteen cities. 7. The children of Merari, by their families, had, out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities. 8. And the children of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites these cities with their suburbs, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.

1. The Levites' petition presented to this general convention of the states, now sitting at Shiloh, v. 1, 2. Observe,

1. They had not their lot assigned them till they made their claim. There is an inheritance provided for all the saints, that royal priesthood, but then they must petition for it, Ask, and it shall be given you. Joshua had quickened the rest of the tribes who were slack, to put in their claims, but the Levites, it may be supposed, knew their duty and interest better than the rest, and were therefore forward in this matter, when it came to their turn, without being called upon. They build their claim upon a very good foundation, not their own merits or works, but the divine grace and promise; "The Lord commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities, commanded you to grant them, which implied a command to us to ask them." Note, The maintenance of ministers is not an arbitrary thing, left purely to the good-will of the people, who may let them starve if they please; no, as the God of Israel commanded that the Levites should be well provided for, so has the Lord Jesus, the King of the christian church, ordained, and a perpetual ordinance, "The Lord commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities, commanded you to grant them, which implied a command to us to ask them." 2. They did not make their claim till all the rest of the tribes were provided for, and then they did it immediately. There was some reason for it: every tribe must first know their own, else they would not know what they gave the Levites, and so it could not be such a reasonable service as it ought to be. But it is also an instance of their humility, modesty, and patience, (and Levites should be examples of these and other virtues,) that they were willing to be served last, and they feared never the worse for it. Let not God's ministers complain if at any time they find themselves postponed in men's thoughts and cares, but let them make sure of the favour of God, and the honour that comes from him, and then they may well enough afford to bear the slight and neglects of men.

II. The Levites' petition granted immediately, without any dispute, the princes of Israel being perhaps ashamed that they needed to be called upon in this matter, and that the motion had not been made among themselves for the settling of the Levites. 1. The children of Israel are said to give the cities for the Levites. God had appointed how many they should have, forty-eight; it is said, that Joshua, and the princes, upon consideration of the extent and value of the lot of each tribe as it was laid before them, had appointed how many cities should be taken out of each; and then the fathers of the several tribes themselves agreed which they should be, and therefore are said to give them as an offering, to the Lord; so God had appointed, Numb. 33. 8. Every one shall give of his cities to the Levites as an offering, to the Lord, one city out of every five. And it was found to praise and honour, for it appears by the following catalogue, that the cities they gave to the Levites, were generally some of the best and most considerable in each tribe. And it is probable, that they had an eye to the situation of them, taking care they should be so dispersed, as that no part of the country should be too far distant from a Levites' city. 2. They gave them at the commandment of the Lord, that is, with an eye to the command, and in obedience to it, which was it that sanctified the grant. They gave the number that God commanded, and it was well that matter was settled, that the Levites might not ask more, nor the Israelites offer less. They gave them also with their suburbs, or glebe-lands, belonging to them, so many cubits by measure from the walls of the city, as God had commanded, Num. 35. 4, 5, and did not go about to cut them short. 3. When the forty-eight cities were pitched upon, they were divided into four lots, as they lay next together, and then by lot were determined to the four several families of the tribe of Levi. When the Israelites had surrendered the cities into the hand of God, he would himself have the distributing of them. (3.) The same seven families of Kohath, who were the only priests, had to their share the thirteen cities that were given by the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, v. 4. God in wisdom ordered it thus, that though Jerusalem itself was not one of their cities, it being as yet in the possession of the Jebusites, (and those generous tribes would not mock the Levites who had another warfare to mind, with a city that must be covered by the sword before it could be enjoyed,) yet the cities that fell to their lot were those which lay next to Jerusalem, because that was to be in process of time, the holy city, where their business would chiefly lie. (2.) The Kohathite Levites (among whom were the posterity of Moses, though never distinguished from them) had the cities that lay in the lot of Dan, which lay next to Judah, and in that of Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manassasse, which lay next to Benjamin. So they who descended from Aaron's father, joined nearest to Aaron's sons. (3.) Gershon was the eldest son of Levi, and therefore, though the younger house of the Kohathites was preferred before his, yet his children had the precedence of the other family of Merari, v. 6. (4.) The Merarites, the youngest house, had their lot last, and it lay furthest off, v. 7. The rest of the sons of Jacob had a lot for every tribe only, but Levi, God's tribe, had a lot for each of its families; for there is a particular providence directing and attending the removes and settlements of ministers, and appointing where they shall fix, who are to be the lights of the world.

9. And they gave out of the tribe of the children of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children of Simeon, these cities which are here mentioned by name, 10. Which the children of Aaron, being of the families of the Kohathites, who were of the children of Levi, had: for theirs was the first lot. 11. And they gave them the city of Arba, the father of Anak, (which city is Hebron,) in the hill-country of Judah, with the suburbs thereof round about it. 12. But the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, gave they to Caleb the son of Jephunneh for his possession. 13. Thus they gave to the children of Aaron the priest, Hebron with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Libnah with her suburbs, 14. And Jattir with her suburbs, and Eshtemoa with her suburbs, 15. And Holon with her suburbs, and Debir with her suburbs, 16. And Ain with her suburbs, and Juttah with her suburbs, and Beth-shemesh with her suburbs; nine cities out of those two tribes. 17. And out of the tribe of Benjamin, Gibeon with her suburbs, Geba with her suburbs, 18. Anathoth with her suburbs, and Almon with her suburbs; four cities. 19. All the cities of the children of Aaron the priests, were thirteen cities with their suburbs. 20. And the families of the children of Kohath the Levites which remained of the children of Kohath, even they had the cities of their lot out of the tribe of Ephraim. 21. For they gave them Shechem with her suburbs in mount Ephraim, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Gezer with her suburbs, 22. And Kibzaim with her suburbs, and Beth-horon with her suburbs; four cities. 23. And out of the tribe of Dan, Eltekeh with her suburbs, Gibbethon with her suburbs, 24. Ajalon with her suburbs, Gath-rimon with her suburbs; four cities. 25. And out of the half tribe of Manasseh, Taanach with her suburbs, and Gath-rimon with her suburbs; two cities. 26. All the cities were ten, with their suburbs, for the families of the children of Kohath that remained. 27. And unto the children of Gershon, of the families of the Levites, out of the other half tribe of Manasseh, they gave Golan in Bashan with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Beesh-terah with her suburbs; two cities. 28. And out of the tribe of Issachar, Kishon with her suburbs, Dabareh with her suburbs. 29. Jarmuth with her suburbs, En-gannim with her suburbs; four cities. 30. And out of the tribe of Asher, Mishal with her suburbs, Abdon with her suburbs, 31. Helkath with her suburbs, and Rehob with her suburbs; four cities. 32. And out of the tribe of Naphtali, Kedesh in Galilee with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Hammoth-dor with her suburbs, and Kartan with her suburbs; three cities. 33. All the cities of the Gershonites, according to their families, were thirteen cities with their suburbs. 34. And unto the families of the children of Merari, the rest of the Levites, out of the tribe of Zebulun, Jokneam with her suburbs, and Kartah with her suburbs, 35. Dimnah with her suburbs, Nahalal with her suburbs; four cities. 36. And out of the tribe of Reuben, Bezer with her suburbs, and Jahazah with her suburbs. 37. Kedemoth with her suburbs, and Mephaath with her suburbs; four cities. 38. And out of the tribe of Gad, Ramoth in Gilead with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Mahanaim with her suburbs. 39. Heshbon with her suburbs, Jazer with her suburbs; four cities in all. 40. So all the cities for the children of Merari, by their families, which were remaining of the families of the Levites, were, by their lot, twelve cities. 41. All the cities of the Levites within the possession of the children of Israel were forty and eight cities. with their suburbs. 42. These cities were every one with their suburbs round about them: thus were all these cities.

We have here a particular account of the cities which were given to the children of Levi, out of the several tribes, not only to be occupied and inhabited by them, as tenants to the several tribes in which they lay; no, their interest in them was not dependent and precarious, but to be owned and possessed by them as lords and proprietors, and as having the same title to them that the rest of the tribes had to their cities or lands, as appears by the law which preserved the houses in the Levites' cities from being alienated any longer than till the year of jubilee, Lev. 25, 32, 33. Yet it is probable, that the Levites having only the cities and suburbs, while the land about pertained to the tribes in which they lay, those of that tribe, for the convenience of occupying that land, might commonly rent houses of the Levites, as they could spare them in their cities, and so live among them as their vassals.

Several things may be observed in this account, beside what was observed in the law concerning it, Num. 35.
1. That the Levites were dispersed into all the tribes, and not suffered to live all together in any one part of the country: this would find them all with work, and employ them all for the good of others; for ministers, of all people, must neither be idle, nor live to themselves, or to one another only. Christ left his twelve disciples together in a body, but left orders that they should in due time disperse themselves, that they might preach the gospel to every creature. The mixing of the Levites thus with the other tribes, would be an obligation upon them to walk circumspectly, and as became their sacred function, and to avoid every thing that might disgrace it; had they lived all together, they would have been tempted to wink at one another's faults, and to excuse one another when they did amiss; but by this means they were made to see the eyes of all Israel upon them, and therefore saw it their concern to walk so as that their ministry might in nothing be blamed, nor their high character suffer by their ill carriage.
2. That every tribe of Israel was adorned and enriched with its share of Levites' cities, in proportion to its compass, even those that lay most remote. They were all God's people, and therefore they all had Levites among them. (1.) To show kindness to, as God appointed them, Deut. 12, 19.—14, 29. They were God's receivers, to whom the people might give their grateful acknowledgments of God's goodness, as the occasion and disp'sion were. (2.) To receive advice and instruction from; when they could not go up to the tabernacle to consult those who attended there, they might go to a Levites' city, and be taught the good knowledge of the Lord. Thus God set up a candle in every room of his house, to give light to all his family; as those that attended the altar, kept the charge of the Lord, to see that no divine appointment was neglected there; so they that were scattered in the country, had their charge too, which the temple did not oblige them to. And the Levites were introduced at a distance, and to watch for the souls of God's Israel. Thus did God graciously provide for the keeping up of religion among them, and that they might have the word nigh them; yet, blessed be God, we under the Gospel, have it yet nearer, not only Levites in every county, but Levites in every parish, whose office it is still to teach the people knowledge, and to go before them in the things of God.
3. That here were thirteen cities, and those some of the best, appointed for the priests, the sons of Aaron, v. 19. Aaron left but two sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, yet his family was now so much increased, and it was foreseen that it would in process of time grow so numerous, as to replenish all these cities; though a considerable number must of necessity be resident wherever the ark and the altar were. We read in both Testaments of such numbers of priests, that we may suppose none of all the families of Israel that came out of Egypt, increased afterward so much as that of Aaron and his family. Moreover, the passage before us further shows, that the Lord would assign a part of the cities to Aaron and the Levites, as a part of the inheritance given to the Levites, v. 35. And though the Levites afterward became possessed of new cities, as a part of the inheritance, and very likely that their number of cities was increased, yet the whole number of Levites' cities is marked here.

4. That the Levites had nothing like another tribe; they had cities which were intended to be their particular portion. They were not to have them with the other tribes, as the other tribes had their cities, but as cities peculiar to them. Israel, as a whole nation, was divided into twelve tribes, and each tribe had its particular inheritance, Cities of refuge, cities of asylum, parishes, cities, and towns, each of the other tribes; and the Levites only had cities. The Levites were not to have them with the other tribes; they were to have them by themselves. The Levites were not to have them with the other tribes; but among the other tribes. The Levites were to have them, among the other tribes; and to them alone. The Levites were to have them, among the other tribes; and by themselves, Lev. 25, 32, 33. And in the second book of Moses, when the division of the land was made among the twelve tribes, to be occupied by them, concerning which, see Gene. 30, 14, 15; they were to take the land by lot, as a heritage among the other tribes, Deut. 1, 19. And when they were divided by lot, the Levites had not a portion among the other tribes, but a portion among themselves. And the Levites were not to have the land of Israel, among the other tribes, but among themselves. And the Levites were to have it among the other tribes, and not among themselves. And the Levites were to have it among the other tribes, and not among themselves, Lev. 25, 32, 33; and they were to have it, among the other tribes, and not among themselves, Deut. 1, 19, 20. And the Levites were to have it, among the other tribes, and not among themselves, Deut. 1, 19, 20.

43. And the Lord gave unto Israel all the land which he spake to give unto their fathers; and they possessed it, and dwelt therein. 44. And the Lord gave them rest round about, according to all that he spake unto their fathers: and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them; the Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand. 45. There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass.

We have here the conclusion of this whole matter, the foregoing history summed up, and, to make it appear the more bright, compared with the promise, of which it was the full accomplishment. God's word and his works mutually illustrate each other. The performance makes the promise appear very true, and the promise makes the performance appear very kind.

1. God had promised to give the seed of Abraham the land of Canaan for a possession; and now at last he performed that promise. 43. thp possessed it, and dwelt therein. Though they had often forfeited the benefit of that promise, and God had long delayed the performance of it, yet, at last, all difficulties were conquered, and Canaan was their own. And the promise of the heavenly Canaan is as sure to all God's spiritual Israel, for it is the promise of him that cannot lie.

2. God had promised to give them rest in that land, and now they had rest round about. Rest from the fatigues of their travel through the wilderness, which tedious march, perhaps, was long in their bones; rest from their wars in Canaan, and the insults which their enemies there had at first offered them. They now dwelt, not only in habitations of their own, but those, quiet and peaceable ones; though there were Canaanites that remained, yet none of that either strength or spirit to attack them, or so much as to give them an alarm. This rest continued, till they by their own sin and folly put thorns into their own beds, and their own eyes.

3. God had promised to give them victory and success in this war. The sign of this promise likewise was fulfilled, there stood not a man before them, v. 44. They had the better in every battle, and which way soever they turned their forces, they prospered. It is true, there were Canaanites now remaining in many parts of the land, and such as afterward made head against them, and became very formidable. But, (1.) As to the present remains of the Canaanites, they were no contradiction to the promise, as God had said he would not drive them out all at once, but by little and little, Exod. 23. 30. They had now as much in their full possession as they had occasion for, and as they had hands to manage; so that the Canaanites only kept possession of some of the less cultivated parts of the country against the beasts of the field, till Israel, in process of time, should become numerous enough to replenish them, [2.] As to the permanency of this possession, that was purely the effect of Israel's cowardice and slothfulness, and the punishment of their sinful inclination to the idolatries and other abominations of the heathen, which the Lord would have cast out before them, but they harboured and indulged them.

So that the foundation of God stands sure: Israel's experience of God's fidelity is here upon record, and we may account for their station in life to the hour of God, the vindication of his promise which had been so often distracted, and the encouragement of all believers to the end of the world. There failed not any good thing, no, nor aught of any good thing, (so full is it expressed,) which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel, but in due time all came to pass, v. 45. Such an acknowledgment as this, here subscribed by Joshua, in the name of all Israel, we are not without a reason to believe, that all Israel did in effect say amen to it, 1 Kings 8. 36. The inviolable truth of God's promise, and the performance of it to the utmost, is what all the saints have been ready to bear their testimony to; and if in any thing it has seemed to come short, they have been as ready to own that they themselves must bear all the blame.

CHAP. XXII.

Many particular things we have read concerning the two tribes and a half, though nothing separated them from the rest of the tribes except the river Jordan, this chapter is wholly concerning them. 1. Joshua's dismission of the militia of those tribes from the camp of Israel, in which they had served as auxiliaries during all the war of Canaan, and their return thereto upon their own country, v. 1-8. II. The altar they built on both sides of Jordan, in token of their communion with the land of Israel, v. 10. III. The offence which the rest of the tribes took at this altar, and the message they sent thereupon, v. 19-29. IV. The apology which Joshua gave to all the tribes on half made for what they had done, v. 21-29. V. The satisfaction which their apology gave to the rest of the tribes, v. 30-34. And (which is strange) whereas in most differences there is a fault on both sides, here there was fault on no side; none (for aught that appears) were to be blamed, but all to be praised.

1. THEN Joshua called the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, 2. And said unto them, Ye have kept all that Moses the servant of the LORD commanded you, and have obeyed my voice in all that I commanded you: 3. Ye have not left your brethren these many days unto this day, but have kept the charge of the commandment of the LORD your God. 4. And now the LORD your God hath given rest unto your brethren, as he promised them: therefore now return ye, and get you unto your tents, and unto the land of your possession, which Moses the servant of the LORD gave you on the other side Jordan. 5. But take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law, which Moses the servant of the LORD charged you, to love the LORD your God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul. 6. So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away: and they went unto their tents. 7. Now, to the one half of the tribe of Manasseh Moses had given possession in Bashan; but unto the other half thereof gave Joshua among their brethren on this side Jordan westward. And when Joshua sent them away also unto their tents, then he blessed them; 8. And he spake unto them, saying, Return with much riches unto your tents, and with very much cattle, with silver, and with gold, and with brass, and with iron, and with very much raient: divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren. 9. And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, returned, and departed from the children of Israel out of Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan, to go unto the country of Gilead, to the land of their possession, whereof they were possessed, according to the word of the LORD by the hand of Moses.

The war being ended, and ended gloriously, Joshua, as a prudent general, disbands his army, who never designed to make war their trade, and sends them home to enjoy what they had conquered, and to beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; and, particularly, the forces of these separate tribes, who had received their inheritance on the other side Jordan from Moses, upon this condition, that their men of war should assist the other tribes in the conquest of Canaan, which they promised to do, Numb. 32. 32. and renewed the promise of Joshua at the opening of the campaign, Josh. 1. 16. and noted now that they had performed their bargain, Joshua publicly and solemnly in Shiloh gives them their discharge. Whether this was done, as it was placed, not till after the land was divided, as some think, or whether after the war was ended, and before the division was made, as others think, (because there was no need of their assistance in dividing the land, but only in conquering it, nor were there any of their tribes employed as commissioners in that affair; but only of the other ten, Numb. 34. 18. &c.) this is certain, it was not done till after Shiloh was made the head-quarters, v. 2, and the land was begun to be divided before they removed from Gilgal, ch. 14, 6.

It is probable that this army of Reubenites and Gadites, which had led the van in all the wars of Canaan, had sometimes, in the intervals of action, and when the rest of the army retired into winter-quarters, some of them, at least, made a step over Jordan, for it was not far, to visit their families, and to look after their private affairs, and perhaps tar-died at home sent others to their own tribes, on more serviceable; but still these two tribes and a half had their quota of troops ready, forty thousand in all, which, whenever there was occasion, rendered themselves at their respective posts, and now attended in a body to receive their discharge. Though their affection to their families, and concern for their affairs, could not but make them, after so long abom staying at home, to turn to the staff of good soldiers, they would not move till they had orders from their general. So though our heavenly Father's house above be never so desirable, (it is Bishop Hall's allusion), yet must we stay on earth till our warfare be accomplished, wait for a due discharge, and not anticipate the time of our removal.

1. Joshua dismisses them to the land of their possession, v. 4. They that were first in the assignment of the land, and that you have been the first to receive the start of their brethren in title, but their brethren were before them in full possession; so the last shall be first, and the first last, that there may be something of equality.

II. He dismisses them with their pay; for who goes a warfare at his own charge? v. 8, Return with much riches unto your tents. Though all the land they had helped to conquer, was to go to the other tribes, yet they should have their share of the plunder, and had so, and that was all the pay that any of the soldiers expected; for the wars of Canaan bore their own charges. "Go," says Joshua, "go home to your tents," that is, "your houses," which he calls tents, because they had been so much used to tents in the wilderness; and indeed the strongest and stateliest houses in this world are to be looked upon but as tents, mean and moveable in comparison of those pavement houses. They were to receive "much riches, not only cattle, the spoil of the country, but silver and gold, the plunder of the cities, and," 1. "Let your brethren whom you leave behind, have your good word, who have allowed your share in full, though the land is entirely their's, and have not offered to make any drawback. Do not say that you are losers by us." 2. Let your brethren whom you go to, who have done by the stuff of your soldiers, have some share of the spoil. Divide the spoil with your brethren, as that was divided, which was taken in the war with Midian, Numb. 31. 27. Let your brethren that have wanted you all this while, be the better for you when you come home.

III. He dismisses them with a very honourable character. Though their service was a due debt, and the performance of a promise, and they had Joshua no more than was their duty to do, they were highly commends them; not only gives them up their bonds, as it was, now that they had fulfilled the condition, but applauds their good services. Though it was by the favour of God and his power, that Israel got possession of this land, and he must have all the glory, yet Joshua thought there was a thankful acknowledgment due to their brethren who assisted them, and whose sword and bow were employed for them. God must be chiefly eyed in our praises, yet instruments must not be altogether overlooked. He here commends them. 1. For the readiness of their obedience to their commanders, v. 2. When Moses was gone, they remembered and observed the charge he had given them; and all the orders which Joshua, as general of the forces, had issued out, they had carefully obeyed, went, and came, and did, as he appointed, Matt. 8. 9. It is as much as anything the soldier's praise, to observe the word of command. 2. For the constancy of their affection, and adherence to their brethren, Ye have not left them these many days. How many days, he does not say, nor can we gather it for certain from any other place. Calvibus and others of the best chronologers compute, that the conquering and dividing the land was the work of about six or seven years, and so long, these separate tribes atten-tended their camp, and did them the best service they could. Note, It will be the honour of those that have espoused the cause of God's Israel, and twisted interests with them, to adhere to them, and never to leave them till God has given them rest, and then they shall rest with them. 3. For the upholding of their obedience to the divine law. They had not only done their duty to Joshua and Israel, but, which was best of all, they had made conscience of their duty to God, Ye have kept the charge; or, as the word is, Ye have kept the keeping, that is, "Ye have carefully and circumspectly kept the commandment of the Lord your God; not only in this particular instance of continuing in the service of Israel to the end of the war, but, in geneerally, have observed their obedience to the divine law. They had not only done their duty to Joshua and Israel, but, which was best of all, they had made conscience of their duty to God, Ye have kept the charge; or, as the word is, Ye have kept the keeping, that is, "Ye have carefully and circumspectly kept the commandment of the Lord your God; not only in this particular instance of continuing in the service of Israel to the end of the war, but, in gene-

erally, have observed their obedience to the divine law. They had not only done their duty to Joshua and Israel, but, which was best of all, they had made conscience of their duty to God, Ye have kept the charge; or, as the word is, Ye have kept the keeping, that is, "Ye have carefully and circumspectly kept the commandment of the Lord your God; not only in this particular instance of continuing in the service of Israel to the end of the war, but, in gene-

erally, have observed their obedience to the divine law. They had not only done their duty to Joshua and Israel, but, which was best of all, they had made conscience of their duty to God, Ye have kept the charge; or, as the word is, Ye have kept the keeping, that is, "Ye have carefully and circumspectly kept the commandment of the Lord your God; not only in this particular instance of continuing in the service of Israel to the end of the war, but, in gene-

of their possession in a body, v. 9. ferry-boats being, it is likely, provided for their repassing Jordan. Though masters of families may have occasion to be absent, long absent, from their families sometimes, yet, when their business abroad is finished, they must remember home is their place, from which they ought not to wander as a bird from her nest.

10. And when they came unto the borders of Jordan, that are in the land of Canaan, the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, built there an altar by Jordan, a great altar to see to. 11. And the children of Israel heard say, Behold, the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, have built an altar over against the land of Canaan, in the borders of Jordan, at the passage of the children of Israel. 12. And when the children of Israel heard of it, the whole congregation of the children of Israel gathered themselves together at Shiloh, to go up to war against them. 13. And the children of Israel sent unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, into the land of Gilead, Phinehas, the son of Eleazar the priest; 14. And with him ten princes, of each chief house a prince throughout all the tribes of Israel; and each one was a head of the house of their fathers among the thousands of Israel. 15. And they came unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, unto the land of Gilead; and they spake with them, saying, 16. Thus saith the whole congregation of the Lord, What trespass is this that ye have committed against the God of Israel, to turn away this day from following the Lord, in that ye have builded you an altar, that ye might rebel this day against the Lord? 17. Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed until this day, although there was a plague in the congregation of the Lord, 18. But that ye must turn away this day from following the Lord? and it will be, seeing ye rebel to-day against the Lord, that to-morrow he will be wroth with the whole congregation of Israel. 19. Notwithstanding, if the land of your possession be unclean, then pass ye over unto the land of the possession of the Lord, wherein the Lord's tabernacle dwelleth, and take possession among us: but rebel not against the Lord, nor rebel against us, in building you an altar, besides the altar of the Lord our God. 20. Did not Achan the son of Zerah commit a trespass in the accursed thing; and wrath fell on all the congregation of Israel? and that man perished not alone in his iniquity.

Here is,

I. The pious care of the separated tribes to keep their hold of Canaan's religion, then when they were leaving Canaan's land, that they might not be like the sons of the stranger, utterly separated from God's people, Isa. 56. 3. In order to this, they built a great altar on the borders of Jordan, to be a witness for them that they were Israelites, and as such partakers of the altar of the Lord, 1 Cor. 10. 18. When they came to Jordan, v. 10. they did not consult how to preserve the remembrance of their own exploits in the wars of Canaan, and the services they had done their brethren, by erecting a monument to the immortal honour of the two tribes and a half. But their relation to the church of God, together with their interest in the communion of saints, is that which they are solicitous to preserve and perpetuate the proofs and evidences of; and therefore, without delay, when the thing was first proposed by some among them, who, though glad to think that they were going toward home, were sorry to think that they were going from the altar of God, immediately they erected this altar, which served as a bridge to keep up their fellowship with the other tribes in the things of God. Some think they built this altar on the Canaan-side of Jordan, in the lot of Benjamin, that looking over the river, they might see the figure of the altar at Shiloh, when they could not conveniently go to it; but it is more likely that they built it on their own side of the water, for what had they to do to build upon another man's land without his consent? And it is said to be over-against the land of Canaan, nor would there have been any cause of suspecting it designed for sacrifice, if they had not built it among themselves.

This altar was very innocently and honestly designed, but it had been well, if, since it had in it an appearance of evil, and might be an occasion of offence to their brethren. And though it was inspired by the oracle of God about it before they did it; or at least acquainted their brethren with their purpose, and given them the same explication of their altar before, to prevent their jealousy, which they did after, to remove it. Their zeal was commendable, but it ought to have been guided with discretion; there was no need to hasten the building of an altar for the purpose they intended this, but they might have taken time to consider and take advice; and when their sincerity was made to appear, we do not find that they were blamed for their rashness; God does, and men should, overlook the weakness of an honest zeal.

II. The holy jealousy of the other tribes for the honour of God, and his altar at Shiloh. Notice was immediately brought to the princes of Israel of the setting up this altar, v. 11. And they, knowing how strict and severe that law was, to prevent them to offer all their sacrifices in the place which God should choose, and not elsewhere, Deut. 12. 5, 7. were soon apprehensive, that the getting up of another altar, was an affront to the choice which God had lately made of a place to put his name in, and had a direct tendency to the worship of some other God. Now, 1. Their suspicion was very excusable, for it must be confessed, the thing frima facie—at first sight, looked ill, and seemed to shadow forth a design to set up and maintain a competitor with the altar at Shiloh. It was no strained impietate, from the building an altar, to infer an intention to offer sacrifice upon it, and that might introduce idolatry, and end in a total apostasy from the faith and worship of the God of Israel. So great a matter might this fire kindle. God is jealous for his own institutions, and therefore we should be so too, and afraid of every thing that looks like, or leads to, idolatry.
2. Their zeal, upon this suspicion, was very commendable, v. 12. When they apprehended that these tribes, which by the river Jordan were separated from them, were separating themselves from God, they took it as the greatest injury that could be done to themselves, and showed a readiness, if it were necessary, to put their lives in their hands, in defence of the altar of God, and to take up arms for the chastising and reducing of these rebels, and to prevent the spreading of the infection, if no gentle methods would serve, by cutting off from their body the gangermed member. They all gathered together, and Shiloh was the place of their rendezvous, because it was in defence of the divine charter lately granted to that place, that they now appeared; their resolution was as became a kingdom of priests, who, being devoted to God and his service, did not acknowledge their brethren, nor know their own children, Deut. 33. 9. They would immediately go up to war against them, if it appeared they were revoked from God, and in rebellion against him: though they were bone of their bone, had been compassionated with them in tribulation in the wilderness, and serviceable to them in the wars of Canaan; yet if they turn to serve other gods, they will treat them as enemies, not as sons of Israel, but as children of whoredoms, for so God had appointed, Deut. 13. 12, &c. They had but lately sheathed their swords, and retired from the perils and fatigues of war to the rest God had given them, and yet they are willing to begin a new war, rather than be of the number of those who provoke God and his service, and revenge idolatry, and every step towards it. A brave resolution, and which shows them hearty for their religion, and, we hope careful and diligent in the practice of it themselves. Corruptions in religion are best dealt with at first, before they get a head, and plead prescription.

3. Their prudence in prosecution of this zealosous resolution is no less commendable, as God had appointed them in cases of this nature, to inquire and make search, Deut. 13. 14. that they might not wrong their brethren under pretence of righting their religion; accordingly, they resolve here not to send forth their armies to wage war, till they had first sent their ambassadors to inquire into the merits of the case, and these men of the first rank, one out of each tribe, and Phinehas at the head of them, to the holy person, v. 13, 14. Thus was their zeal of God tempered with prudence and justice, by the meekness of wisdom. He that knows all things, and hates all evil things, would not punish the worst of criminals, but he would first go down and see, Gen. 18. 21. Many an unhappy strife would be prevented, or soon taken up, by an impartial and favourable inquiry into that which is the matter of the offence. The rectifying of mistakes and the taking away of mistakes of mind, by strud words and actions in a true light, would be the most effectual way to accommodate both private and public quarrels, and bring them to a happy period.

4. The ambassadors' management of this matter came fully up to the sense and spirit of the congregation concerning it, and bespeaks much both of zeal and prudence, especially that they draw up against their brethren, is indeed very high, and admits no other excuse than that it was in their zeal for the honour of God, and was now intended to justify the resentment of the congregation at Shiloh, and to awaken the supposed delinquents to clear themselves, otherwise they might have suspected their judgment, or mollified it at least, and not have taken it for granted, as they do here, v. 16. that the building of this altar was a trespass against the God of Israel, and a trespass, no less heinous than the revolt of the Lord, v. 20, than their own children, Deut. 33. 9. They were to make it appear that there was a treason, not against God, but against themselves, and they did not venture to assert their innocence think it strange to be thus misrepresented and accused; they laid to my charge things that I knew not.

(2.) The aggravation of the crime charged upon their brethren, is somewhat far-fetched, v. 17. Is the iniquity of Peer too little for us? Probably, that is mentioned, because Phinehas, the first commissioner in this treaty, had signalized himself in that matter, Numb. 25. 7, and because we may suppose they were now about the very place in which that iniquity was committed on the other side Jordan. It is good to recollect and improve those instances of the wrath of God, revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, which have fallen out in our own time, and which we ourselves have been eye-witnesses of. He reminds them of the iniquity of Peer, [1.] As a very great sin, and very provoking to God. The ingrafting of this altar seemed but a small matter, but it might lead to iniquity as bad as that of Peer, and therefore must be crushed in its first rise. Note, The remembrance of great sins committed formerly, should engage us to stand upon our guard against the least occasions and beginnings of sin: for the way of sin is down hill. [2.] As a sin that the whole congregation had sanctioned; there was a plague in the congregation, and all Jordan was in confusion, v. 18, the number of the souls of Israel being not less than twenty-four thousand; was that not enough for ever to warn you against idolatry? What, will you bring upon yourselves another plague? Are you so mad upon an idolatrous altar, that you will run yourselves thus upon the sword's point of God's judgments? Does not our camp still feel from that sin, and the punishment of it? We are not cleansed from it unto this day; there are remaining sparks, First, "Of the infection of that sin; some among us so inclined to idolatry, that if you set up another altar, they will soon take occasion from that, whether you intend it or no, to worship another god." Secondly, "Of the wrath of God against us for that sin: we have reason to fear, that if we provoke God by another sin to visit, he will remember against us the iniquity of Peer, as he threatened to do that of the golden calf, Exod. 32. 34. And dare you think, in your sleepimg li ne of divine vengeance? Note, It is a foolish and dangerous thing for people to think their former sins sins little, too little for them, as those do who add sin to sin, and so treasure up wrath against the day of wrath. Let therefore the time past suffice, 1 Pet. 4. 3.

(3.) The reason they give for their concerning themselves so warmly in this matter, is very sufficient; they were obliged to it, in regard of the necessity of upholding the law of self-preservation; "for if you revolt from God to-day, who knows, but to-morrow, his judgments may break in upon the whole congregation, v. 18. as in the case of Achan, v. 20. He sinned, and we all smarted for it, by which we should receive instruction, and from what God did then, infer what we may do, and fear what he will do, if we do not witness against your sin, who do not perish thereby, and pursue the servants of the public peace are obliged, in justice to the common safety, to use their power for the restraining and so suppressing of vice and profaneness, lest, if it be connived at, the sin thereby become national, and bring God's judgments upon the community. Nay, We are all concerned therefore to reprove our neighbour when he does amiss, lest you bear sin for him, Lev. 19. 17.

(4.) The offer they make is very fair and kind, v. 19, that if they thought the land of their possession unclean for want of an altar, and therefore could not be easy without one; rather than they should set up another in competition with that of Shiloh, they should be welcome to come back to the land where the Lord's tabernacle was, and settle there, and they would very willingly straiten themselves to make room for them. By this they showed a sincere and truly pious zeal against schism, that rather than their brethren should have any occasion to set up a separate altar, though their pretence for it, as here supposed, was very weak, and grounded upon a great mistake, yet they were willing to part with a considerable share of the land which God himself had by the lot assigned them, to comprehend them and take them in among them. This was the spirit of Israelites indeed.

21. Then the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, answered and said unto the heads of the thousands of Israel, 22. The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods, he knoweth, and Israel he shall know; if it be in rebellion, or if in transgression against the Lord, (save us not this day,) 23. That we have built us an altar to turn from following the Lord, or if to offer thereon burnt-offering or meat-offering, or if to offer peace-offerings thereon, let the Lord himself require it; 24. And if we have not rather done it for fear of this thing, saying, In time to come your children might speak unto our children, saying, What have you to do with the Lord God of Israel? 25. For the Lord hath made Jordan a border between us and you; ye children of Reuben, and children of Gad, ye have no part in the Lord: so shall your children make our children cease from fearing the Lord. 26. Therefore we said, Let us now prepare to build us an altar, not for burnt-offering, nor for sacrifice: 27. But that it may be a witness between us and you, and our generations after us, that we might do the service of the Lord before him with our burnt-offerings, and with our sacrifices, and with our peace-offerings; that your children may not say to our children in time to come, Ye have no part in the Lord. 28. Therefore said we, that it shall be, when they should so say to us, or to our generations in time to come, that we may say again, Behold the pattern of the altar of the Lord, which our fathers made, not for burnt-offerings, nor for sacrifices; but it is a witness between us and you. 29. God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, and turn this day from following the Lord, to build an altar for burnt-offerings, for meat-offerings, or for sacrifices; besides the altar of the Lord our God that is before his tabernacle.

We may suppose there was a general convention called of the princes and great men of the separate tribes, to give audience to these ambassadors; or perhaps, the army, as it came home, were still encamped together in a body, and not yet dispersed; however it was, there were enough to represent the two tribes and a half, and to give their sense.

Their reply to the warm remonstrance of the ten tribes is very fair and ingenious. They do not retract their charge, upbraid them with the injustice and unkindness of their threatenings, or re-proach them for their rash and hasty ensours; but give them that soft answer which turns away wrath, avoiding all those grievous words which stir up anger; they demonstrate not by argument, nor plead that they were not accountable to them for what they had done, nor bid them mind their own business; but, by a free and open declaration of their sincere intention in what they did, free themselves from the imputation they were under, and set themselves right in the opinion of their brethren; to do which they only needed to state the case, and put the matter in a true light.

1. They solemnly protest against any design to use this altar for sacrifice or offering, and therefore were far from setting it up in competition with the altar at Shiloh, or from entertaining the least thought of despising that. They had indeed set up that which had the shape and fashion of an altar, but they had not dedicated it to a religious use, had had no solemnity of its consecration, and therefore might not be charged with a design to put it to any such use. To gain credit to this protestation, here is,

1. A solemn appeal to God concerning it, with which they begin their defence, intending thereby to give glory to God first, and then to give satisfaction to their brethren, v. 22.

(1.) A profound awe and reverence of God are expressed in the form of their appeal; The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods, he knoweth. Or, as it might be read somewhat closer to the original, The God of gods, Jehovah, the God of gods, Jehovah, he knoweth; which bespeaks his self-existence and self-sufficiency, he is Jehovah, and has sovereignty and supremacy over all beings and powers whatsoever, even those that are called gods, or that are worshipped. This brief confession of their faith would help to obviate the charge of their brethren, and to prove their true appreciation of them, as if they intended to desert the God of Israel, and worship other gods; how could they entertain such a thought, who believed him to be God over all? Let us learn hence always to speak of God with reverence and seriousness, and to mention his name with a solemn pause. Those who make their appeals to heaven with a slight, careless, "God knows!" have reason to fear lest they take his name in vain, for it is very unlike this here.

(2.) It is a great confidence of their own integrity, which they express in the matter of their appeal. They refer the controversy to the God of gods, whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth, such as the guilty have reason to dread, and the upright and pure to rejoice in; If thou art against that transgression that we have built this altar, to confront the altar of the Lord at Shiloh, to make a party, or to set up any new gods or worship;[1] [2] He knows it, v. 22. for he is perfectly acquainted with the thoughts and intents of the heart, and particularly with all inclinations to idolatry, Ps. 44. 20, 21. That is in a particular manner before him, we believe he knows it, and we cannot by any arts convert it from him. [3] [4] Let him require it, as we know he will, for he is a jealous God. Nothing but a clear conscience would have thus imprecated divine justice to averge the rebellion, if there had been any. Note, First, In every thing we do in religion, it highly concerns us to appove ourselves to God in our integrity therein, remembering that he knows the heart. Secondly, When we fall under the censures of men, it is very comfortable to be able with a humble confidence to appeal to God concerning our cases. See 1 Cor. xiv. 4.

2. A more apology presented to their brethren. Israel, he shall know. Though the record on high, and the witness in our bosoms, are principally to be made sure for us, yet there is a satisfaction besides, which we owe to our brethren, who doubt concerning our integrity, and which we should be ready to give with meekness and fear. If our sincerity be known to God, we should study likewise to let others know it by its fruits, especially those, who, though they mistake us, yet show a zeal for the glory of God, as the ten tribes here did.

3. A serious abjuration or renunciation of the design which they were suspected to be guilty of. With this they conclude their defence, v. 29. "God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, as we own we should, if we had set up this altar for burnt-offerings; no, we abhor the thought of it. We have as great a value and veneration for the altar of the Lord at Shiloh, as any of the tribes of Israel have, and are as firmly resolved to adhere to it, and constantly to attend it; we have the same concern that you have for the purity of God's worship, and the unity of his church; far be it, far be it from us, to think of turning away from following God."

II. They fully explain their true intent and meaning in building this altar; and we have all the reasons the world to the altar, there was a true representation of their design, and not advanced now to palliate it afterward; as we have reason to think that these same persons meant very honestly, when they petitioned to have their lot on that side Jordan, though then also it was their unhappiness to be misunderstood even by Moses himself.

In their vindication they make it out, that the building of this altar was no far from being a step towards a separation from the true church, and from the altar of the Lord at Shiloh, that, on the contrary, it was really designed for a pledge and preservative of their communion with their brethren, and with the altar of God, and a token of their resolution to do the service of the Lord before him, v. 27. and to continue to do so.

1. They gave an account of the fears they had, lest in process of time, their posterity, being seated at, the distance from the true church, should be looked upon and treated as strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, v. 24. it was for fear of this thing, and the word signifies a great perplexity and solicitude of mind which they were in, until they eased themselves by this expeditor. As they were returning home, (and we may suppose it was not thought of before, else they would have made Joshua acquainted with their purpose,) some of them divined this heart of the people, and the rest took the hint, and represented to themselves and one another, a very melancholy prospect of what might, probably, happen in after-ages, that their children would be looked upon by the other tribes as having no interest in the altar of God, and the sacrifices there offered. Now indeed they were owned as brethren, and were as welcome at the tabernacle of the true God, as children of their common father. What then of the children after them should be disowned? They by reason of their distance, and the interposition of Jordan, which it was not easy at all times to pass and repass, could not be so numerous and constant in their attendance on the three yearly feasts as the other tribes to make a continual claim to the privileges of Israelites, and would therefore be looked upon as inconsiderable members of their church, and by degrees would be rejected as not members of it at all, so shall your children, (who in their pride will be apt to monopolize the privileges of the altar,) make our children (who perhaps will not be so careful as they ought to be to keep hold of those privileges) cease from fearing the Lord. Note, (1.) They who have themselves found the comfort and benefit of God's ordinances, cannot but desire to preserve and perpetuate the entail of them upon their seed, and use all possible precautions that their children after them may not be made to cease from following the Lord, or be looked upon as having no part in him. (2.) They who have themselves found the comfort and benefit of God's ordinances, cannot but desire to preserve and perpetuate the entail of them upon their seed, and use all possible precautions that their children after them may not be made to cease from following the Lord. Therefore to secure an interest in the altar of God to those who shall come after us, and to prove their title to it, we said, Let us build an altar, to be a witness between us and you. That having this copy of the altar in their custody, it might be produced as an evidence of their right to the privileges of the original. Every one that saw this altar, and observed it was never used for sacrifice and offering, would inquire what was the meaning of it, and this answer would be given to that inquiry, that it was built by those separate tribes, in token of their common interest, with a joint interest with them in the altar of the Lord. Christ is the great Altar that sanctions every gift; the best evidence of our interest in him will be the pattern of his Spirit in our hearts, and our conformity to him: if we can produce that, it will be testimony for us, that we have a part in the Lord, and an earnest for our perseverance in following him.

30. And when Phinehas the priest, and the princes of the congregation, and heads of the thousands of Israel which were with him, heard the words that the children of Reuben and the children of Gad, and the children of Manasseh, spoke, it pleased them. 31. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest said unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the children of Manasseh, This day we perceive that the Lord is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the Lord: now ye have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Lord. 32. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, and the princes, returned from the children of Reuben, and from the children of Gad, out of the land of Gilead, unto the land of Canaan, to the children of Israel, and brought them word again. 33. And the children of Israel sent and delivered the children of Gad, and the children of Manasseh, unto the children of Israel, and they went out of Gilead unto the land of Canaan, and dwelt. 34. And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, called the altar Ed: for it shall be a witness between us that the Lord is God.

We have here the good issue of this controversy, which, if there had not been on both sides a disposition to peace, as there was on both sides a zeal for God, might have been of ill consequence; for quarrels about religion, for want of wisdom and love, often prove the most fierce and most difficult to be taken up. But these contending parties, when the matter was fairly stated and argued, were so happy as to understand one another very well, and so the difference was presently compromised.

1. The ambassadors were exceedingly pleased, when the separate tribes had given in a protestation of the innocence of their intentions in building this altar. (1) The ambassadors did not call in question their sincerity in that protestation, did not say, "You tell us you design it not for sacrifice and efficacy." No, charity believes all things, hopes all things, believes and hopes the best, and is very loath to give the lie to any.

(2) They did not upbraid them with the rashness and unadvisedness of this action; did not tell them, "If you would do such a thing, and with this good intention, yet you might have had that respect for Joshua and Eleazar, to have advised them, or at least have made them acquainted with it, and so have saved the trouble and expense of this embassy." But a little want of consideration and good manners should be excused and overlooked in those who, we have reason to think, mean honestly. (3) Much less did they go about to fish for evidence to make out their charge, because they had once exhibited it, but were glad to have their mistake rectified, and were glad, v. 31. They were civil, patient, and peevish spirits, when they have past an unjust censure upon their brethren, though never so much convincing evidence be brought of the injustice of it, will stand to it, and can by no means be persuaded to retract it. These ambassadors were not so pre-judiced; their brethren's vindication pleased them, v. 30. They looked upon their innocence as a token of God's favor; they might, therefore, had they been found what was done, was so far from being an indication of their growing cool to the altar of God, that, on the contrary, it was a fruit of their zealous affection to it; Ye have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Lord, that is, "You have not, as we feared, delivered them into the hand of the Lord, or exposed them to his judgments, by the trespass we were jealous." They were abundantly satisfied, when their ambassadors reported to them their brethren's apology for what they had done. It should seem, they staid together, at least by their representatives, until they heard the issue, v. 32. And when they understood the truth of the matter, they pleased them, v. 33. and they blessed God. Note, Our brethren's constancy in religion, their zeal for the power of godliness, and their keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace and the jealousies conceived of them as breaking the unity of the church, are things which we should be very glad to be satisfied of, and should make the matter both of our rejoicing and of our thanksgiving; let God have the glory of it, and let us take the comfort of it. Being thus satisfied, they laid down their arms immediately, and were so far from being angry at the particulars that they had been meditating against their brethren, that we may suppose them wishing for the next feast, when they should meet them at Shilohe.

3. The separate tribes were gratified, and since they had a mind to preserve among them this pattern of the altar of God, though there was not likely to be that occasion for it which they fancied, yet Joshua and the princes let them have their humour, and did not give orders for the demolishing of it, though there was as much reason to fear that it might in process of time be an occasion of idolatry, as there was to hope that ever it might be a preservation from idolatry. Thus did the strong hear the infirmities of the weak. Only, care was taken that they having explained the meaning of their altar, that it was intended to be no more than a testimony of their communion with the altar at Shilohe, this explanation should be recorded, which was done according to the usage of those times, by giving a name to it, signifying so much, v. 34. They called it Ed, a witness, to that and no more. A witness of the relation they stood in to God and Israel, and of their concurrence with the rest of the tribes in the same common faith, that Jehovah he is God, and he no other. It was a witness to preserve their cure to truth, their religion pure and entire to them, and would be a witness against them if ever they should forsake God, and turn from following after him.

CHAP. XXIII.

In this and the following chapter we have two farewell sermons, which Joshua preached to the people of Israel a little before his death. Had he designed to gratify the curiosity of succeeding ages, he would rather have recorded the many of Israel's settlement in their new conquests, their husbandry, manufactures, trade, customs, courts of justice, and the constitutions of their infant commonwealth, which one would wish to be informed of; but that which he intended in the registers of this book, was, to dwell on public religion and their duty to God; and therefore, overlooking these things which are the usual subjects of a common history, he here transmits to his reader the methods he took to persuade Israel, or rather to their covenant with their God, which might have a good influence on the generations to come who should read those reasonings, as we may hope they had on that generation which then heard them. In this chapter we have, 1. A convenient account of the state of the states, v. 1. 2. probably to consult about the common concerns of their land, and to set in order that which, after some years' trial, being left to their prudence, was found wanting. II. Joshua's speech to them at the opening of this chapter, the concluding of the sessions, to hear which was the principal design of their coming together. In it, 1. Joshua reminds them of what God had done for them, v. 3. 4. 9. 14. and what he was ready to do yet further, v. 5. 10. 2. He exhorts them carefully and resolutely to persevere in their duty to God, v. 6. 8. 11. III. He cautions them against all familiarity with their idolatrous neighbors, v. 7. 4. He gives them fair warning of the future danger, if they should revolt from God and turn to idolats, v. 12, 13. 15. 16. In all which he showed himself zealous for his God, and jealous over Israel with a godly jealousy.

1. And it came to pass, a long time after that the Lord had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies round about, that Joshua waxed old and stricken in age. 2. And Joshua called for all Israel, and for their elders, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers, and said unto them, I am old and stricken in age: 3. And ye have seen all that the Lord your God hath done unto all these nations because of you: for the Lord your God is he that hath fought for you. 4. Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance for your tribes, from Jordan, with all the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward. 5. And the Lord your God, he shall expel them from before you, and drive them from out of your sight; and ye shall possess their land, as the Lord your God hath promised unto you. 6. Be ye therefore very courageous, to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left; 7. That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among you; neither make mention of the name of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them: 3. But cleave unto the Lord your God, as ye have done unto this day. 9. For the Lord hath driven out from before you great nations and strong: but as for you, no man hath been able to stand before you unto this day. 10. One man of you shall chase a thousand: for the Lord your God, he it is that fighteth for you, as he hath promised you.

As to the date of this edict of Joshua's,
I. No mention at all is made of the place where this general assembly was held; some think it was at Timnath-serah, Joshua's own city, where he lived, and whence, being old, he could not well remove: but it does not appear that he took so much state upon him, therefore it is more probable this meeting was at Shiloh, where the tabernacle of meeting was, and to which place, perhaps, all the males that could, were now coming to worship before the Lord, at one of the three great feasts, which Joshua took the opportunity of, for the delivering of this charge to them.

II. There is only a general mention of the time when this was done. It was long after the Lord had given them rest, but it is not said how long, v. 1. It was, 1. So long as that Israel had time to feel the comforts of their rest and possessions in Canaan, and to enjoy the advantages of that good land. 2. So long as that Joshua had time to observe which way their danger lay of being corrupt, namely, by their intimacy with the Canaanites, that remained, against which he is therefore careful to arm them.

III. The persons to whom Joshua made this speech, to all Israel, even their elders, &c. So it might be read, v. 2. they could not all come within hearing, but he called for all the elders, that is, the privy council or, which in latter times constituted the great Sanhedrim, the heads of the tribes, that is, the noblemen and gentlemen of their respective countries, the judges learned in the laws, that tried criminals and causes, and gave judgment upon them—and, lastly, the officers or sheriffs, who were intrusted with the execution of those judgments. These Joshua called together, and to them he addressed himself, 1. That they might come; but, secondly, that he might discourse with them, and communicate what lay nearest on his heart; and substance of it, to those under them in their respective countries, and so this charge might be dispersed through the whole nation. 2. Because if they would be prevailing with to serve God and cleave to him, they, by their influence on the common people, would keep them right. If great men be good men, they will help to make many good men.

IV. In the instances when he gave them this charge; he was old and stricken in age, v. 1. probably, it was in the last year of his life, and he lived to be one hundred and ten years old, ch. 24. 29. And he himself takes notice of it, in the first words of his discourse, v. 2. when he began to be old, some years ago, God reminded him of it, ch. 13. 1. Thou art old. But now that he did himself feel so much of the decays of age that he needed not to be told of it, he readily speaks of it himself, I am old and stricken in age. He uses it, 1. As an argument with himself to give them this charge, because being old he could expect to be but a little while with them to advise and instruct them, and therefore (so far as it respects, 2 Pet. 1. 12.) as long as he is in this tabernacle, he will do all possible to put them in remembrance of their duty, knowing by the increasing infirmities of age, that he must shortly put off this tabernacle, and desiring that after his decease they might continue as good as they were now. When we see death hastening towards us, that should quicken us to do the work of life with all our might. 2. As an argument with them, he was old and experienced, and therefore to be the more regarded for days should speak; he was grown old in their service, and had spent himself for their good, and therefore was to be the more regarded by them. He was old and dying, they would not have him long to preach to them, therefore let them observe what he said now, and lay it up in store for the time to come.

V. This discourse itself, the scope of which is to engage them, if possible, them, and their seed after them, to persevere in the true faith and worship of the Lord of Israel.
1. He puts them in mind of the great things God had done for them, now in his days, and under his administration, for here he goes no further back. And for the proof of this, he appeals to their own eyes, v. 3. Ye have seen all that the Lord your God hath done, not what I have done, or what you have done, we were only instruments in God's hand, but what God himself has done by me, and for you. (1.) "Many great and mighty nations (as the rate of nations then went) were driven out from as fine a country as any was at that time upon the face of the earth, to make room for Israel." (2.) "You see what he has done to these nations who were his creatures, the work of his hands, and whom he could have made new creatures, and fit for his service; yet see what destruction he has made of them because of you, v. 3. how he has driven them out from before you, v. 9. if as they were of no account with him, though great and strong in comparison with you."
(2.) They were not only driven out, (that they might have been, and yet sent to some other country less rich, to begin a new plantation there, suppose to that wilderness in which Israel had wandered so long, and so they had only exchanged seats with them,) but they were "driven after them;" though they held out against them with the greatest obstinacy that could be, yet they were subdued before them, which made the possessing of their land so much the more glorious to Israel, and so much the more illustrious an instance of the power and goodness of the God of Israel, v. 3. The Lord your God has not only led you, and fed you, and kept company with you as a man would," by which title he was known among them when he first brought them out of Egypt, Exod. 15. 3. So clear and cheap were all their victories during the course of this long war, that no man had been able to stand before them, v. 9. that is, to make head against them, so as either to put them in fear, create them any difficulty, or give any check to the progress of their victorious arms. It is evident they carried the day, and in every siege they carried the city; their loss before Ai was upon a particular occasion, was inconsiderable, and only served to show them on what terms they stood with God; but otherwise, never was army crowned with such a constant uninterrupted series of successes, as the armies of Israel were in the wars of Canaan. (3.) They had not only conquered the Canaanites, but were put in full possession of their land, v. 4. "I have divided to you by lot these na
2. He assures them of God's readiness to carry on, and complete, this glorious work in due time. It is true, some of the Canaanites did yet remain, and in some places were strong and daring; but that should not disappoint their expectations; when Israel was so multiplied as to be able to replenish this land, God would expel the Canaanites to the last man, provided Israel would pursue their advantages, and carry on the war against them with vigour, v. 5. "The Lord your God will drive them from out of your sight, so that there shall not be a Canaanite to be seen in the land; and even that part of all the land which is yet in their hands, shall possess." If it were objected, that the men of war of the several tribes being dispersed to their respective countries, and the army disbanded, it would be difficult to get them together when there was occasion to renew the war upon the remainder of the Canaanites; in answer to that, he tells them what little need they had to be in care about the numbers of their forces, v. 10. One man of you shall be as strong as ten men. No one man is the match of ten; so you must not compare your little forces against theirs, but look to the Lord, who is able to make them as strong as ten, even in the battle, as he had made them in the time of their victory over them, v. 13. "Each tribe may venture for itself, and for the recovery of its own lot, without fearing disadvantage by the disproportion of numbers; for the Lord your God, whose all power is, both to inspire and to dispirit, and who has all creatures at his beck, he it is, that fighteth for you; and how many do you reckon him for?"

3. He hereupon most expressly charges them to adhere to their duty, to go on and persevere in the good ways of the Lord wherein they were so well set out. He exhorts them,

(1.) To be very courageous, v. 6. "God fighteth for you against your enemies, do you therefore behave yourselves valiantly for him. Keep and do with a firm resolution all that is written in the book of the law." He presses upon them no more than what they are already bound to. "Keep with care, do with diligence, and eye what is written with sincerity."

(2.) To be very cautious. "Take heed of missing it, either on the right hand, or on the left, for there are errors and extremes on both hands. Take heed of running either into a profane neglect of any of God's institutions, or into a superstitious addition of any of your own inventions. They must especially take care of going toward Jericho, and to which they were first inclined, and would be most tempted, v. 7. [1.] They must not acquaint themselves with idolaters, nor come among them to visit them, or be present at any of their feasts or entertainments, for they could not contract any intimacy, or keep up any conversation with them, without danger of infection. [2.] They must not show the least respect to any idol, nor mention the name of their gods, but endeavour to bury the remembrance of them in perpetual oblivion, that the worship of them may never be revived; let the very name of them be forgotten. "Look upon idols as filthy detestable things, to be named without the utmost loathing and detestation." The Jews would not suffer their children to name swine's flesh, because it was forbidden, lest the naming of it should occasion their desiring of it; but if they had occasion to speak of it, they must call it, that strange thing. It is pitty, that among Christians the names of the heathen gods are so commonly used, and made so familiar as they are, especially in plays and poems: Let these names which have been set up in rivalry with God, be for ever loathed and lost. [3.] They must not contemn others in showing respect to them. They must not only not swear by them themselves, but they must not cause others to swear by them, which supposes that they must not make any covenants with idolaters, because they, in the confirming of their covenants, would swear by their idols; never let Israelites admit such an oath. [4.] They must take heed of these occasions of idolatry, lest by degrees they should arrive at the highest step of it, which was serving false gods, and bowing down to them, against the letter of the second commandment.

4. To be very constant, v. 8. "Cleave unto the Lord your God, that is, 'delight in him, depend upon him, devote yourselves to his glory, and continue to do so to the end, as you have done unto this day, ever since you came to Canaan;' for, being willing to make the best of them, he looks not so far back as the iniquity of Peor. There might be many things amiss among them, but they had not forsaken the Lord their God, and it is in order to insinuate his exhortation to perseverance with the more pleasing power, that he praises them. "Go on and prosper, for the Lord is with you while you are with him." Those that command, should commend; the way to make people better, is, to make the best of them. "You have cleared the Lord unto this day, therefore go on to do so, else you lose the praise and recompense of what you have wrought. Your righteousness will not be mentioned unto you, if you turn from it."

11. Take good heed therefore unto yourselves, that ye love the Lord your God. 12. Else if ye do in any wise go back, and cleave unto the remnant of these nations, even these that remain among you, and shall make marriages with them, and go in unto them, and they to you: 13. Know for a certainty that the Lord your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourgings in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land, which the Lord your God hath given you. 14. And, behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth: and ye know in all your hearts, and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof. 15. Therefore it shall come to pass, that as all good things are come upon you, which the Lord your God promised you; so shall the Lord bring upon you all evil things, until he have destroyed you from off this good land which the Lord your God hath given you. 16. When ye have transgressed the covenant of the Lord your God, which he commanded you, and have gone and served other gods, and bowed yourselves to them; then shall the anger of the Lord be kindled against you, and ye shall perish quickly from off the good land which he hath given unto you. Here,
I. Joshua directs them what to do, that they might preserve every religion. v. 11. Would we avoid the wrath of the Lord, and not forsake him, 1. We must always stand upon our guard, for many a precious soul is lost and ruined through carelessness; "Take heed therefore, take good heed to yourselves, to your souls, (so the word is,) that the inward man be kept clean from the pollutions of sin, and closely employed in the service of God. God has given us precious souls, with this charge, "Take good heed to them, keep them, with all diligence, above all keepings." 2. What we do in religion, we must do from a principal of love, not by constraint or from a slavish fear of God, but of choice and with delight. "Love the Lord your God, and you will not leave him." II. He urges God's fidelity to them as an argument why they should be faithful to him, v. 14. "I am going the way of all the earth, I am old and dying," to die, is to go a journey, a journey to our long home; it is the way of all the earth, the way that all mankind must go, sooner or later. Joshua himself, though so great and good a man, and one that could so ill be spared, cannot be exempted from this common lot. He takes notice of it here, that they might look upon these as his dying words, and regard them accordingly. Or thus, "I am dying, and leaving you, me ye have not always, but if you cleave to the Lord, he will never leave you." (Cf. Deut. 4. 37.) Even if I am near my end, its proper to look back upon the years that are past; and in the review, I find, and ye yourselves know it in all your hearts, and in all your souls, by a full conviction on the clearest evidence, and the thing has made an impression upon you," (that knowledge does us good, which is seated, not in the head only, but in the heart and soul, and with which we are duly affected, being made a discovery to us, and knew it to be the true good and the evil things which the Lord spake concerning you," (and he speaks a great many;) see ch. 21. 45. God had promised them victory, rest, plenty, his tabernacle among them, &c., and not one thing had failed of all he had promised. "Now," said he, "has God been truly just to you? Be not you false to him." It is the apostle's argument for perseverance, Heb. 10. 23. "He is faithful that has promised." He gives them fair warning, what would be the fatal consequences of apostasy, v. 12, 13, 15, 16. "If you go back, know for a certainty it will be your ruin." Observe, 1. How he describes the apostasy which he warns them against. The steps of it would be, v. 12. growing intimate with idolaters, who would candidly wheedle them, and insinuate themselves into their acquaintance, now that they were come lords of the country, to serve their own ends. The next step would be intermarrying with them, drawn to it by their artifices, who would be glad to bestow their children upon these wealthy Israelites. And the consequence of that would be, v. 16. serving their gods, (which were pretended to be the ancient deities of the country,) and bowing down to them. Thus the way of sin is down-hill, and those who have had the benefit of education with sinners, cannot avoid having fellowship with sin. This he represents, (1.) As a base and shameful desertion; "it is going back from what you have so well begun," v. 12. (2.) As a most pernicious breach of promise, v. 16. "It is a transgression of the covenant of the Lord your God, which he commanded you, and which you yourselves set your hand to." Other sins were transgressions of the law God commanded them, but this was a transgression of the covenant that he commanded them, and amounted to a breach of the relation between God and them, and a forfeititure of all the benefits of the covenant.

2. How he describes the destruction which he warns them of. He tells them, (1.) That these remainders of the Canaanites, if they should harbour them, and indulge them, and join in affinity with them, would be snares and traps to them, both to draw them to sin, (not only to idolatry, but to all immoralities, which would be the ruin, not only of their virtue, but of their wisdom and sense, their spirit and honour,) and also to draw them into foolish bargains, unprofitable projects, and all manner of inconveniences. (2.) That by underhand practices they decoyed them into one mischief or other, so as to gain advantages against them, they would then act more openly, and be scourges in their sides, and thorns in their eyes, would perhaps kill or drive away their cattle, burn or steal their corn, alarm or plunder their houses, and would by all ways possible vexations to them: for, whatever pretences of friendship they might make, a Canaanite, unless proselyted to the faith and worship of the true God, would in every age hate the very name and sight of an Israelite. See how the punishment would be made to answer the sin, nay, how the sin itself would be the punishment. (2.) That the anger of the Lord would be kindled against them. Their making leagues with the Canaanites, would not only give them the opportunity of doing them a mischief, and be the fostering of snakes in their way, but God would make them to become their enemy, and would kindle the fire of his displeasure against them. (3.) That all the threatenings of the word would be fulfilled, as the promises had, for the God of eternal truth is faithful to both, v. 15. "As all good things have come upon you according to the promise, so long as you have kept close to God, so all evil things will come upon you according to the threatening, if you forsake him." They would not only have experienced the good, and were now in the enjoyment of it, and the evil would as certainly come, if they were disobedient. As God's promises are not a fool's paradise, so his threatenings are not bogeys. (4.) That it would end in the utter ruin of their church and nation, as Moses had foretold. This is three times mentioned here. Your enemies will vex you until ye perish from off this good land, v. 3. "God will make you to perish from off this good land, which he destroyed you from off this good land," v. 15. Heaven and earth will concur to root you out. So that, v. 16, ye shall perish from off the good land." It will aggravate their perdition, that the land from which they shall perish, is a good land, and a land which God himself had given them, and which therefore he would have secured to them, if they by their wickedness had not thrown themselves out of it. Thus the goodness of the heavenly Canaan, and the free and future grant God has made of it, will aggravate the misery of those that shall for ever be shut out and perish from it. Nothing will make them see how wretched they are, so much as to see how happy they might have been. Joshua thus sets before them the fatal consequences of their apostasy, that, knowing the terror of the Lord, they might be persuaded with forfeiture of heart to cleave to him.

CHAP. XXIV.

This chapter concludes the life and reign of Joshua, in which we have, 1. The great care and pains he took to confirm the people of Israel in the true faith and worship of God, that they might, after his death, persevere therein. In order to this, he called an other general assembly of the heads of the congregation of Israel, v. 1. and dealt with them, 1. By way of narrative, recounting the great things God had done for them and their fathers, v. 2. - 18. 2. By way of charge to them, in consideration thereof, to serve God, v. 14. 3. By way of treaty with them, wherein he aims to bring them, (1.) To make rebi
AND Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for the elders of Israel, and for their heads, and for theirjudges, and for their officers; and they presented themselves before God. And Joshua said unto all the people, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor: and they served other gods. And I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood, and led him throughout all the land of Caannah, and multiplied his seed, and gave him Isaac. And I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau; and I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it: but Jacob and his children went down into Egypt. I sent Moses also and Aaron, and I plagued Egypt, according to that which I did among them: and afterward I brought you out. And I brought your fathers out of Egypt: and you came unto the sea; and the Egyptians pursued after your fathers with chariots and horsemen unto the Red Sea. And when they cried unto the Lord, he put darkness between you and the Egyptians, and brought the sea upon them, and covered them: and your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt: and ye dwelt in the wilderness a long season. And I brought you into the land of the Amorites, which dwelt on the other side Jordan; and they fought with you: and I gave them into your hand, that ye might possess their land; and I destroyed them from before you. Then Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab, arose and warred against Israel, and sent and called Balaam the son of Beor to curse you: but I would not hearken unto Balaam; therefore he blessed you still: so I delivered you out of his hand. And ye went over Jordan, and came unto Jericho: and the men of Jericho fought against you, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Girgashites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; and I delivered them into your hand. And I sent the hornet before you, which drove them out from before you, even the two kings of the Amorites; but not with thy sword, nor with thy bow. And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not, do ye eat. 14. Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth: and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt; and serve ye the Lord.

Joshua thought he had taken his last farewell of Israel, in the solemn charge he gave them in the foregoing chapter, when he said, I go the way of all the earth; but God graciously continuing his fellowship longer than he expected, and renewing his strength, he was desirous to prove it for the good of Israel: he did not say, I have taken my leave, as once, and let that serve; but, having yet a longer space given him, he summons them together again, that he might try what more he could do to engage them for God. Note, We must never think our work for God done, till our life is done; and if he lengthen out our days beyond what we thought, we must conclude it is because he has some further service for us to perform.

The assembly is the same with that in the foregoing chapter, the elders, heads, judges and officers of Israel, v. 1. But it is here made something more solemn than it was there.

I. The place appointed for their meeting is Shechem, not only because that lay nearer to Joshua than Shiloh, and therefore more convenient now that he was infant, and unfit for travelling, but because it was the place where Abraham, the first trustee of God's covenant with this people, settled at his coming to Canaan, and where God appeared to him, Gen. 12. 6, 7. and near which stood mount Gerizim and Ebal, where the people had renewed their covenant with God at their first coming into Canaan, Josh. 8. 30. Of the promises God had made to their fathers, and of the promises they themselves had made to God, this place might serve to put them in mind.

II. They presented themselves, not only before Joshua, but before God, in this assembly; that is, they came together in a solemn religious manner, as into the special presence of God, and with an eye to him speaking to them by Joshua; and, it is probable, the service began with prayer. It is the conjecture of interpreters, that upon this great occasion, Joshua ordered the ark of God to be brought by the priests to Shechem, which, they say, was but about ten miles from Shiloh, and to be set down in the place of their meeting, which is therefore called, v. 26, the sanctuary of the Lord, the presence of the ark making it so at that time; and this was done to grace the solemnity, and to strike an awe upon the people that attended. We have not any such sensible tokens of the divine presence, but are to believe that wherever three are gathered together in Christ's name, he is as really in the midst of them, as God was where the ark was, and they are indeed presenting themselves before him.

III. Joshua spake to them in God's name, and as from him, in the language of a prophet, v. 2. "Thus saith the Lord, Jehovah, the great God, and the God of Israel, your God, to Jericho, whom therefore you are bound to hear and give heed."

Note, The word of God is to be received by us as his, whoever is the messenger that brings it, whose greatness cannot add to it, nor his meanness diminish from it.

His sermon consists of doctrine and application. I. The doctrinal part is a history of the great things God had done for his people, and for their fathers before them. God by Joshua recounts the marvels of old, "I did so and so." They must know and consider, not only that such and such things were done, but that God did them. It is a series of wonders that is here recorded, and perhaps man was not meant to understand, which for beauty's sake are here omitted. See what God had wrought; (1.) He brought Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees, v. 2, 3. He and his ancestors had served other gods there, for it was the country in which, though celebrated for learning, idolatry, as some think, had its rise; there the world by wisdom knew not God. Abraham, who afterward was the friend of God, and the great favourite of heaven, was born by and by bound by a holy vow, till God by his grace snatched him as a brand out of that burning. Let them remember that rock out of which they were hewn, and not relapse into that sin from which their fathers by a miracle of free grace were delivered. "I took him," says God, "else he had never come out of that sinful state."

Hence Abraham's justification is made by the apostle to be an instance of God's justifying the ungodly, Rom. 4. 5. (2.) He brought his family, led him through the land to Shechem, where they now were, multiplied his seed by Ishmael, who begat twelve princes, but at last gave him Isaac the promised son, and in him multiplied his seed. When Isaac had two sons, Jacob and Esau, God provided an inheritance for Esau elsewhere in Mount Seir, tht the land of Canaan might be reserved entire for the seed of Jacob, and the poverty of Esau might never pretend to a share in it. (3.) He delivered the seed of Jacob out of Egypt with a high hand, v. 5, 6, and rescued them out of the hands of Pharaoh and his host at the Red-sea, v. 6, 7. The same waters were the Israelites' guard, and the Egyptians' grave; and this in answer to prayer; for though we find in the story, that they in that distress murmured against God, Exod. 14. 11, 12. notice is here taken of their crying to God; he graciously accepted those that prayed to him, and overlooked the folly of those that quarrelled with him. (4.) He protected them in the wilderness, where they are here said, not to wander, but to dwell for a long season, v. 7. So wisely were all their motions directed, and so safely were they kept, that even there they had as certain a dwelling place as if they had been in a walled city. (5.) He gave them the land of the Amorites, on the other side Jordan, v. 8. and there defeated the plot of Balak and Balaam against them, so that Balaam could not curse them, as he desired, and therefore Balak durst not fight them, as he designed, and, because he designed it, is here said to do it. The turning of Balaam's tongue to bless Israel, when he intended to curse them, is often mentioned as an instance of the divine power put forth in Israel's favour, as remarkable as any other, because in it God proved (and does still, more than we are aware of) his dominion over men, the power of darkness, and over the spirits of men. (6.) He brought them safely and triumphantly into Canaan, delivered the Canaanites into their hand, v. 11, sent hornets before them, when they were actually engaged in battle with the enemy, which with their wings tormented them, and with their noise terrified them, so that they became a very easy prey to Israel. These dreadful swarmers were the two kings of the Amorites, and afterwards in their other battles, v. 12. God had promised to do this for them, Exod. 23. 27, 28. Deut. 7. 20. These hornets, it should seem, annoyed the enemy more than all the artillery of Israel, therefore he adds, not with thy sword nor bow. It was purely the Lord's doing. Lastly, They were now in the peaceable possession of a good land, and lived comfortably upon the fruit of other people's labour, v. 13.

2. The application of this history of God's mercies to them, is by way of exhortation, to fear and serve God, in gratitude for his favour, and that it might be continued to them, v. 14. Now therefore, in consideration of all this, (1.) "Fear the Lord, the Lord and his goodness, Hos. 3. 5. Reversion of a God of such infinite power, fear to offend him, and to forfeit his goodness. Keep up an awe of his majesty, a deference to his authority, a dread of his displeasure, and a continual regard to his all-seeing eye upon you." (2.) "Let your practice be consonant to this principle, and serve him, both by the outward acts of religious worship, and every instance of obedience in your whole conversation, and this, in sincerity and truth, with a single eye and an upright heart, and inward impressions, answerable to outward expressions." That is the truth in the inward part, which God requires, Ps. 51. 6. For what good will it do us to assemble with a God that searches the heart? (5.) Put away the strange gods, both Chaldean and Egyptian idols, for these they were most in danger of revolting to. It should seem by this charge, which is repeated, v. 23. that there were some among them that privately kept in their closets the images or pictures of these dunghill-deities, which came to their hands from their ancestors, as heir-looms of their families, though it may be, they did not worship them; these Joshua earnestly urges them to throw away. Do face them, destroy them, lest you be tempted to serve them." Jacob pressed his household to do this, and at this very place; for when they gave him up the little images they had, he buried them under the oak that grows by Shechem, Gen. 33. 2, 4. Perhaps the oak mentioned here, v. 26. was the same oak, or another in the same place, which might be well called the oak of reformation, as there were idolatrous oaks.

15. And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom you will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served, that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord. 16. And the people answered and said, God forbid that we should forsake the Lord, to serve other gods; 17. For the Lord our God, he is that brought us up, and our fathers, out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage, and which did those great signs in our sight, and preserved us in all the way wherein we went, and among all the people through whom we passed: 18. And the Lord drave out from before us all the people, even the Amorites which dwelt in the land: therefore will we also serve the Lord; for he is our God. 19. And Joshua said unto the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord: for he is a holy God; he is a jealous God; he will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins. 20. If ye forsake the Lord, and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you, after that he hath done you good. 21. And the people said unto Joshua:
ing in a state of probation, it is fit there should be some difficulties in the way, else there were no trial. [3.] He refers it to themselves, "Choose you whom ye will serve, choose this day, now that the matter is laid thus plainly before you, speedily bring it to a head, and do not stand hesitating." Elijah, long after this, referred the decision of the matter to them, in opposition to Jehovah and Baal, to the conscience of those of whom we read, 1 Kings 18. 21. Joshua's putting off the matter here to this plain, intimately two things, First, That it is the will of God we should every one of us make religion our serious and deliberate choice. Let us state the matter impartially to ourselves, weigh things in an even balance, and then determine for that which we find to be really true and good. Let us resolve on God's service, and we do not lightly because we know no other way, but because ready, upon search, we find no better. Secondly, That religion has so much self-evident reason and righteousness on its side, that it may safely be referred to every man that allows himself a free thought, either to choose or refuse it; for the merits of the case are so plain, that no considerate man can do otherwise but choose it. The case is so clear that it determines itself. Perhaps Joshua detained by putting them to their choice, thus to try if there were any among them, who, upon so fair an occasion given, would show a coolness and indifference toward the service of God; whether they would desire time to consider and consult their friends, before they gave in an answer; that if any such should appear, they might set a mark upon them, and warn the rest to avoid them. [4.] He directs their choice in this matter, by an open declaration of his own resolutions. "But as for me and my house, whatsoever you do, we will serve the Lord, and I hope you will all be of the same mind." Here he resolves, First, For himself; As for me, I will serve the Lord. Note, The service of God is nothing below the greatest of men; it is so far from being a diminution and disparagement to princes and those of the first rank to be religious, that it is their greatest honour, and adds the brightest glory of all to them. Observe how positive he is, "I will serve God." It is no abridgment of our liberty to bind ourselves with a bond to God." Secondly, For his house, that is, his family, his children, and servants, such as were immediately under his eye and care, his inspection and influence. Joshua was a ruler, a judge in Israel, yet he will not make his necessary application to public affairs an excuse for the neglect of family-religion. Those that have the charge of many families, as magistrates and ministers, must take special care of their own, 1 Tim. 3, 4, 5. I and my house will serve God.

1. "Not my house, without me." He would not engage them to that work, which he would not set his own hand to. As some who would have their children and servants, not be so themselves; that is, they would have them go before, but intend to go to hell themselves. 2. "Not I, without my house." He supposes he might be forsaken by his people, but in his house, where his authority was greater, and more immediate, there he would overrule. Note, When we cannot bring as many as we would to the service of God, we must bring as many as we can, and extend our endeavours to the people to be instructed and trained up, and cannot reform the land, let us put away iniquity far from our own tabernacle. 3. "First, I, and then my house." Note, Those that lead and rule in other things, should be first in the service of God, and go before in the best things. Lastly, He resolves to do this, whatever others did. Though all the families of Israel should revolt from God, and serve idols, yet Joshua and his family will steadfastly ad here to the God of Israel. Note, Those that resolve to serve God, must not mind being singular in it, nor be drawn by the crowd to forsake his service. Those that are bound for heaven, must be willing to stand against the stream, and must not do as the most do, but as the best do.

(2.) The matter being thus put to their choice, they immediately determine it by a free, rational, and intelligent, declaration, for the God of Israel, against all competitors whatsoever, v. 16-18.

Here, [1.] They concur with Joshua in this resolution, being influenced by the example of so great a man, whom they had been so great a blessing to. v. 18. We also will serve the Lord. See how much good great men might do, if they were but zealous in religion, by their influence on their inferiors. [2.] They startle at the thought of apostatising from God, v. 16. God forbid! the word intimates the greatest dread and detestation imaginable; "Far be it, far be it from us, that we or our's should ever forsake the Lord to serve other gods."

We must be lost to all sense of justice, gratitude, and honour, ere we can harbour the least thought of such a thing." Thus must our hearts rise against all temptations to desert the service of God: Get thee behind me, Satan. [3.] They give very substantial reasons for their choice, to show that they did not make it purely in compliance to Joshua, but from a full conviction of the reasonable-ness and equity of it. They make this choice for another reason. First, they knew, that of every kind things God had done for them, bringing them out of Egypt through the wilderness into Canaan, v. 17, 18. Thus they repeat to themselves Joshua's sermon, and then express their sincere compliance with the intentions of it. Secondly, Of the relation they stood in to God, and his covenant with them, "We will serve the Lord, v. 18, for he is our God, who has graciously engaged himself by promise to the covenant, from which we have by solemn vow engaged ourselves."

2. He brings them to embrace their religion resolutely, and to express a full purpose of heart to cleave to the Lord. Now that he has them in a good mind, he follows his blow, and drives the nail to the head, that it might, if possible, be a nail in a sure place. Fast bind, fast find.

(1.) In order to this he sets before them the difficul-ties of religion, and the correction of religious stumbling, v. 19, 20. Ye cannot serve the Lord, for he is a holy God, or as it is in the Hebrew, he is the holy Gods, intimating the mystery of the Trinity, three in one; holy, holy, holy, holy Father, holy Son, holy Spirit. He will not forgive. And if ye forsake him, he will do you hurt. Certainly Joshua does not intend hereby to deter them from the service of God as impracticable and dangerous. [1.] Perhaps he perhaps to repel the suggestions of seducers, who tempted Israel from their God, and from the service of him, with such insinuations as these, that he was a hard master, his work impossible to be done, and he not to be pleased, and if displeased, implacable and revengeful; that he would confine他们的 respects to himself only, and would not suffer them to show the least kind of affection to any other. They were very unlike the gods of the nations, which were easy, and neither holy nor jealous. It is probable that this was then commonly objected against the Jewish religion, as it has all along been the artifice of Satan ever since he tempted our first parents, thus to misrepresent God and his laws, as harsh and severe; and Joshua by his tone and manner of speaking might make them perceive he intended it as an objection, and would put it to them how they would keep their ground against the force of it. Or, [2.] He thus expresses his godly jealousy over them, and his fear concerning them, that, notwithstanding the professions they now made of zeal for God and his service, they would afterward draw from their great and holy God, and would find him just and jealous to avenge it. Or, [3.] He resolves to let them know the worst of it, and what strict terms they must expect to stand upon with God, that they might sit down and count the cost. "Ye cannot serve the Lord, except you put away all other gods, for he is holy and jealous, and will by no means admit a rival, and therefore you must be very watchful and careful, for it is at your peril, if you desire his service; better you had never known it." Thus though our Master has assured us that his yoke is easy, yet lest, upon the presumption of that, we should grow remiss and careless, he has also told us that the gate is straight, and the way narrow, that leads to life, that we may therefore strive to enter, and not seek only. "You cannot serve God and mammon; therefore if you resolve to serve God, you must renounce all competitions with him. You cannot serve God in your own strength, nor will he forgive your transgressions for any righteousness of your own; but all the seed of Israel must be justified and must glory in the Lord alone, as their righteous-ness and strength, Isa. 45. 24, 25. They must therefore come off from all confidence in their own sufficiency, else their purposes would be to no purpose. Or, [4.] Joshua thus urges upon them the seeming discouragements which lay in their way, and the difficulty of what they undertook, and his thoughts of their choice would make them draw from them a promise yet more expressive and solemn, that they would continue faithful to God and their religion. He draws it from them that they might catch at it the more earnestly, and hold it the faster.

(2.) Notwithstanding this statement of the difficulties of religion, they declared a firm and fixed resolution to continue and proceed in the service of the Lord, we will serve the Lord, we will serve the Lord, we will serve the Lord. This resolution they repeat with an explication, v. 24. "The Lord our God will we serve, not only be called his servants, and wear his livery, but our religion shall rule us in every thing, and his voice will we obey." And in vain do we call him Master and Lord, if we do not the things which he saith, Luke 6. 46. This last promise they make, in answer to the charge Joshua gave them, v. 23. that, in order to their perseverance, they should, [1.] Put away the images and relics of the strange gods, and not keep any of the tokens of those other lovers in their custody, if they resolved their Maker should be their Husband; they promise in this to obey his voice. [2.] That they should incline their hearts to the God of Israel, use their authority over their own hearts to engage for him, and not suffer the least thing to hinder their service for him, but to settle them so. These terms they agreed to, and thus, as Joshua explains the bargain, they strike it, The Lord our God will we serve.

II. The service of God being thus made their deliberate choice, Joshua binds them to it by a solemn covenant, v. 25. Moses had twice publicly ratified this covenant between God and Israel, at Mount Sinai, Exod. 24. and in the plains of Moab, Deut. 29. 1. Joshua had likewise done it once, ch. 8. 31, &c. and now the second time. It is here called a statute and an ordinance, because of the strength and perpetuity of its obligation; and because even this covenant bound them to no more than what they were antecedently bound to by the divine command.

1. Here is Joseph buried, v. 32. He died about two hundred years before in Egypt, but gave commandment concerning his bones, that they should not rest in their grave until Israel had rest in the land of promise; now therefore, the children of Israel, who had brought this coffin full of bones with them out of Egypt, carried it along with them in all their marches through the wilderness; as of Ephraim and Manasseh, it is probable, taking particular care of it,) and kept it in their camp till Canaan was perfectly reduced, now at last they deposited it in that piece of ground which his father gave him near Shechem, Gen. 48. 22. Probably it was upon this occasion that Joshua called out for all Israel to meet him at Shechem, (v. 1.) to attend Joseph's coffin to the grave there; so that the sermon in this chapter served both for Joseph's funeral sermon, and his own farewell sermon; and if it was, as is supposed, in the last year of his life, the occasion might very well remind him of his own death being at hand, for he was now just at the same age that his illustrious ancestor Joseph was arrived at when he died, one hundred and ten years old; compare v. 29, with Gen. 50. 26.

JOSHUA, XXIV.

2. He put it in writing, and inserted it, as we find it here, in the sacred canon; he wrote it in the book of the law, v. 26. in that original which was laid up in the side of the ark, and from thence, probably, it was transcribed into the several copies which the princes had for the use of each tribe. There it was written, that their obligation to religion by the divine precept, and that to their own promise, might remain on record together.

2. He erected a memorandum of it, for the benefit of those who perhaps were not conversant with writing, v. 26, 27. He set up a great stone under an oak, as a monument of this covenant, and perhaps wrote an inscription upon it, (by which stones are made to speak,) signifying the intention of it. When he says, It had heard what was past, he tacitly upbraids the people with the hardness of their hearts, as if this stone had heard to as good purpose as some of them; and if they should forget what was now done, this stone would so far preserve the remembrance of it, as to reprove them for their stupidity and carelessness, and be a witness against them.

The matter being thus settled, Joshua dismissed this assembly of the grandees of Israel, v. 28. and took his last leave of them, well satisfied in having done his part, by which he had delivered his soul; if they perished, their blood would be upon their own heads.

29. And it came to pass after these things, that Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died, being a hundred and ten years old. 30. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, which is in mount Ephraim, on the north side of the hill of Gaash. 31. And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that overlived Joshua, and which had known all the works of the Lord, that he had done for Israel. 32. And the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought up out of Egypt, buried they in Shechem, in a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for a hundred pieces of silver: and it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph. 33. And Eleazar, the son of Aaron, died; and they buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son, which was given him in mount Ephraim.

This book, which began with triumphs, here ends with funerals, by which all the glory of man is stained.
temporaries died, it went to decay, so much often times does one head hold up: how well is it for the gospel church, that Christ, our Joshua, is still with it, by his Spirit, and will be always, even unto the end of the world!

WITH

UPON THE BOOK OF

JUDGES.

This is called in the Hebrew Sherpher Shophhtim, the Book of Judges, which the Syriac and Arabic versions enlarge upon, and call it, The Book of the Judges of the children of Israel; the judgments of that nation being peculiar, so were their judges, whose office differed vastly from that of the Judges of our nations. The LXX entitle it only Κρατος, Judges. It is the history of the commonwealth of Israel, during the government of the Judges from Othniel to Eli; so much of it as God saw fit to transmit to us. It contains the history (according to Dr. Lightfoot's computation) of two hundred and ninety-nine years; reckoning to Othniel of Judah, forty years; to Ehud of Benjamin, eighty years; to Barak of Naphtali, forty years; to Gideon of Manasseh, forty years; to Abimelech his son, three years; to Tola of Issachar, twenty-three; to Jair of Manasseh, twenty-two; to Jephthah of Manasseh, six; to Ibzan of Judah, seven; to Elon of Zebulon, ten; to Abdon of Ephraim, eight; to Samson of Dan, twenty; in all two hundred and ninety-nine. As for the years of their servitude, as where Eglon is said to oppress them eighteen years, and Jabin twenty years, and so some others, those must be reckoned to fall in with some or other of the years of the Judges. The judges here appear to have been of eight several tribes; that honour was thus diffused, until at last it centered in Judah. Eli and Samuel, the two Judges that fell not within this book, were of Levi. It seems, there was no Judge of Reuben or Simeon, Gad or Asher. The history of these Judges in their order we have in this book, to the end of ch. 16. And then in the five last chapters we have an account of some particular memorable events which happened, as the story of Ruth did, (Ruth 1.1.) in the days when the Judges ruled, but it is not certain in which Judge's days; but they are put together at the end of the book, that the thread of the general history might not be interrupted. Now as to the state of the commonwealth of Israel during this period.

I. They do not appear here either so great or so good as one might have expected the character of such a peculiar people should have been; that were governed by such laws, and enriched by such promises.
We find them wretchedly corrupted and wretchedly oppressed, by their neighbours about them, and no where in all the book, either in war or council, do they make any figure proportionable to their honourable entry into Canaan. What shall we say to it? God would hereby show us the lamentable imperfection of all persons and things under the sun, that we may look for complete holiness and happiness in the other world, and not in this. Yet,

II. We may hope that though the historian in this book enlarges most upon their provocations and grievances, yet there was a face of religion upon the land; and however there were those among them, that were drawn aside to idolatry, yet the tabernacle-service, according to the law of Moses, was kept up, and there were many that attended it. Historians record not the common course of justice and commerce in a nation, taking that for granted, but only the wars and disturbances that happen; but the reader must consider the other, to balance the blackness of them.

II. It should seem that in these times each tribe had very much its government in ordinary within itself, and acted separately, without one common head, or council, which occasioned many differences among themselves, and kept them from being or doing anything considerable.

IV. The government of the Judges was not constant, but occasional, when it is said that after Ehud's victory the land rested eighty years, and after Barak's forty, it is not certain that they lived, much less that they governed, so long; but they and the rest were raised up and animated by the spirit of God to do particular service to the public when there was occasion, to avenge Israel of their enemies, and to purge Israel of their idolatries, which are the two things principally meant by their judging Israel. Ye Deborah, as a prophetess, was attended for judgment by all Israel, before there was occasion for her agency in war, ch. 4. 4.
V. During the government of the Judges, God was in a more especial manner Israel's king, so Samuel tells them when they were resolved to throw off this form of government, 1 Sam. 12. 12. God would try what his own law and the constitutions of that would do to keep them in order, and it proved that when there was no king in Israel, every man did that which was right in his own eyes; he therefore, toward the latter end of this time, made the government of the judges more constant and universal than it was at first, and at length gave them David, a king after his own heart; then, and not till then, Israel began to flourish; which should make us very thankful for magistrates both supreme and subordinate, for they are ministers of God unto us for good. Four of the Judges of Israel are here canonized, Heb. 11. 32. Gideon, Barak, Samson, and Jephthah. The learned Bishop Patrick thinks the prophet Samuel was the penman of this Book.

This chapter gives us a particular account of what sort of progress the several tribes of Israel made in the reducing of Canaan after the death of Joshua. He did (as we say) break the neck of that great work, and put it into such a posture, that they might easily have perfected it in due time, if they had not been wanting to themselves; what they did in order hereunto, and wherein they come short, we are here told. 1. The united tribes of Judah and Simeon did bravely. 1. God appointed Judah to begin,

v. 1. 2. Judah took Simeon to act in conjunction with him, v. 3. 3. They succeeded in their enterprises against Bezek, (v. 4. 7.) Jerusalem, (v. 8.) Hebron and Debir, (v. 9. 15.) Hormah, Gaza, and other places, v. 17. 18. 4. Yet where there were chariots of iron, their hearts failed them, v. 19. Mention is made of the Kenites settling among them, v. 16. II. The other tribes, in comparison with these, acted a cowardly part. 1. Benjamin failed, v. 21. 2. The house of Joseph did well against Bethel, (v. 22. 26.) but in other places did not improve their advantages, nor Manasseh, (v. 27. 28.) nor Ephraim, v. 29. 3. Zebulun spared the Canaanites, v. 30. 4. Ashur truckled worse than any of them to the Canaanites, v. 31. 32. 5. Naphtali was kept out of the full possession of several of his cities, v. 33. 6. Dan was straitened by the Amorites, v. 34. No account is given of Issachar, nor of the two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan.

1. NOW, after the death of Joshua, it came to pass, that the children of Israel asked the Lord, saying, Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them ? 2. And the Lord said, Judah shall go up: behold, I have delivered the land into his hand. 3. And Judah said unto Simeon his brother, Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites; and I likewise will go up with thee into thy lot. So Simeon went with him. 4. And Judah went up; and the Lord delivered the Canaanites and the Perizzites into their hand: and they slew of them in Bezek ten thousand men. 5. And they found Adoni-bezek in Bezek; and they fought against him, and they slew the Canaanites and the Perizzites. 6. But Adoni-bezek fled: and they pursued after him, and caught him, and cut off his thumbs and his great toes. 7. And Adoni-bezek said, three-score and ten kings, having their thumbs and their great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table: as I have done, so God hath required me. And they brought him to Jerusalem, and there he died. 8. Now the children of Judah had fought against Jerusalem, and had taken it, and smitten it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire.

Here, I. The children of Israel consult the oracle of God for direction, which of all the tribes should first attempt to clear their country of the Canaanites, and to animate and encourage the rest. It was after the death of Joshua: while he lived, he directed them, and all the tribes were obedient to him; but when he died, he left no successor in the same authority that he had had: but the people must consult the breast-plate of judgment, and thence receive the word of command; for God himself, as he was their King, gave them their Laws, and directed them in all their actions. The question they ask is, Who shall go up first ? 1. By this time, we may suppose, they were so multiplied, that the places they were in possession of, began to be too strait for them, and they must thrust out the enemy to make room: now they inquire, who should first take up arms. Whether each tribe was ambitious of being first, and so strive for the honour of it, or whether each was afraid of being first, and so strive to decline it, does not appear; but by common consent the matter was referred to God himself, who is the fittest both to dispose of honours, and to cut out work. 2. God appointed that Judah should go up first, and promised him success; (v. 2.) "I have delivered the land into his hand to be possessed, and therefore will deliver the enemy into his hand, that keeps him out of possession, to be destroyed." And why must Judah be first in this undertaking? 1. Judah was the most numerous and powerful tribe, and therefore let Judah venture first. Note, God appoints service according to the strength he has given. These that are most able, from them most work is expected. 2. Judah was first in dignity, and therefore must be first in duty. He it is, whom his brethren must praise, and therefore he it is, who must lead in perilous services. Let the burden of honour and the burden of work go together. 3. Judah was first served; the lot came up for Judah first, and therefore Judah must first fight. 4. Judah was the tribe out of which our Lord was to spring: so that in Judah, Christ, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, went before them. Christ engaged the powers of darkness first, and foiled them, which animates us for our conflicts; and it is in him that we are more than conquerors. Observe, The service and the success are put together: "Judah shall go up, let him do his part, and then he shall find, I have delivered the land into his hand." His service will not avail unless God give the success: but God will not give the success, unless he vigorously apply himself to the service.

III. Judah hereupon prepares to go up, but courts his brother and neighbour the tribe of Simeon (the rest of which tribe fell within that of Judah, and was assigned out of it) to join forces with him, v. 3. Ob. serve here, 1. That the strongest should not despise, but desire the assistance even of those that are weaker. Judah was the most considerable of all the tribes, and Simeon the least considerable, and yet Judah begs Simeon's friendship, and prays an aid from him; the head cannot say to the foot, I have no need of thee, for we are members one of another. 2. Those that crave assistance, must be ready to give assistance; Come with me into my tent, and then I will go with thee into thine. It becomes forces to aid another in danger against Canaanites and all Christians, even those of different tribes, to strengthen one another's hands against the common interests of Satan's kingdom. Those who thus help one another in love, have reason to hope that God will graciously help them both.

IV. The confederate forces of Judah and Simeon take the field. Judah went up, (v. 4.) and Simeon with him, v. 5. Caleb, it is probable, was commandant of the chief expedition; for who could it be but he who had both an old man's head and a young man's hand; the experience of age and the vigour of youth! Josh. 14. 10, 11. It should seem too, by what follows, that he (v. 10, 11.) was not yet in possession of his own allotment. It was happy for them that they had such a general, as, according to his name, was all heart. Some think that the Canaanites were got together into a body, a formidable body, when Israel consulted who should go fight against them, that they might be afraid, and they heard of the death of Joshua, whose name had been so dreadful to them; but, if so, it proved they did but meddle to their own hurt.

V. God gave them great success. Whether they invaded the enemy, or the enemy first gave them the alarm, The Lord delivered them into their hand, v. 4. Though the army of Judah was strong and bold, yet the victory is attributed to God! he delivered the Canaanites into their hands; having given them authority, he here gives them ability to destroy them—put it in their power, and so tried their obedience to his command, which was utterly to cut them off. Bishop Patrick observes upon this, that we meet not with such religious expressions in the heathen writers, concerning the success of their arms, as we have here and elsewhere in this sacred history. I wish such pious acknowledgments of the Divine Providence were not grown into disuse at this day, and that they should continue as ours.

Now, 1. We are told how the army of the Canaanites was routed in the field, in or near Bezek, the place where they drew up, which afterward Saul made the place of a general rendezvous; (1 Sam. 11. 8.) they slew ten thousand men, which blow, if followed, could not but be a very great weakening to those that were brought already so very few. 2. How their king was taken and mortified. His name was Adoni-bezek, which signifies, lord of Bezek. There have been those that called their lands by their own names, (Ps. 49. 11.) but here was one (and there has been many another) that called himself by his land's name. He was taken prisoner after the battle, and we are here told how they used him; they cut off his thumbs, to disfigure him for fighting, and his great toes, that he might not be able to run away, v. 6. It had been barbarous thus to treat a sovereign, it was mere mischief, and he had no mercy, but that he was a devoted Canaanite, and one that had in like manner abused others, which, probably, they had heard of. Josephus says, "They cut off his hands and his feet," probably supposing those more likely to be mortal wounds, than only the cutting off his thumbs and his great toes. But this indignity which they did him, extorted from him an acknowledgment of the righteousness of God. v. 7. Where observe, (1.) What a grudging man this Adoni-bezek had been; how great in the field, where armies fled before him, how great at home, where kings were run with the dogs of his flock; and yet now himself a captive, and reduced to the extremity of meanness and disgrace. See how changeable this world is, and how slippery its high places are. Let not the highest be proud, nor the strongest secure, for they know not how low they may be brought before they die. (2.) What desolation he had made among his neighbours, he had wholly subdued seventy kings, to that degree so as to have them his prisoners; he that was the chief person in a city, was then called a king, and his greatness of their title did but aggravate their disgrace, and fired the pride of him that insulted over them. We cannot suppose that Adoni-bezek had seventy of these petty princes at once his slaves, but first and last, in the course of his reign, he had thus deposed and abused so many, who perhaps were many of them kings of the same cities that successively opposed him, and whom he thus treated to plesse his own imperious barbarous fancy, and for a terror to others. It seems, the Canaanites had been wasted by civil wars, and those bloody ones, among themselves, which would very much facilitate the conquest of them by Israel. "Judah," says Dr. Lightfoot, "in conquering Adoni-bezek, did, in effect, conquer seventy kings." (3.) How justly he was treated as he had treated others. Thus the righteous God sometimes, in his providence, makes the punishment to be just in proportion to the crime, and shows an equality in his judgments; the spoiler should be spoiled, and the treacherous dealer dealt treacherously with, Isa. 33. 1. And they that showed no mercy, shall have no mercy shown them, Jam. 2. 13. See Rev. 13. 10.—18. 6. (4.) How honestly he owned the righteousness of God herein. As I have done, so God has required me. See the power of conscience, when God by his judgments awakens it, how it brings sin to remembrance, and subscribes to the justice of God. He that in his pride had set God at defiance, now yields to him, and reflects with as much regret upon the kings under his table, as ever he had looked upon them with pleasure when he had them there. He seems to own that he was better dealt with than he had dealt with his prisoners; for though the Israelites maimed him, (according to the law of retaliation, an eye for an eye, so a thumb for a thumb,) yet he did not break his neck, nor put his head on the crumbs there; because, though the other might well be looked upon as an act of justice, that would have savoured more of pride and haughtiness that did become an Israelite.

VI. Particular notice is taken of the conquest of Jerusalem, v. 8. Our translators judge it spoken of here, as done formerly in Joshua's time, and only repeated on occasion of Adoni-bezek's dying there, and therefore read it, "they had fought against Jerusalem," and put this verse in a parenthesis; but the original speaks of it as a thing now done; and that seems most probable, because it is said to be done by the children of Judah in particular, not by all Israel in general, whom Joshua commanded. Joshua indeed conquered and slew Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, Josh. 10. but we read not there of his taking the city; probably, while he was purifying his city, he had lain asleep in the harbour, and his neighbouring prince, got possession of it, whom, having conquered in the field, the city fell into their hands, and they slew the inhabitants, except those who retreated into the castle, and held out there till David's time, and they set the city on fire, in token of their devastation of the idolatry with which it had been deeply infected, yet, probably, not so utterly to consume it, but to leave convenient habitations for as many as they had to put into the possession of it.
9. And afterward the children of Judah went down to fight against the Canaanites, that dwelt in the mountain, and in the south, and in the valley. 10. And Judah went against the Canaanites that dwelt in Hebron, (now the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba,) and they slew Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmai. 11. And from thence he went against the inhabitants of Debir; (and the name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher:) 12. And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife. 13. And Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, took it: and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife. 14. And it came to pass, when she came to him, that she moved him to ask of her father a field: and she lighted from off her ass; and Caleb said unto her, What wilt thou? 15. And she said unto him, Give me a blessing: for thou hast given me a south land, give me also springs of water. And Caleb gave her the upper springs and the nether springs. 16. And the children of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law, went up out of the city of palm-trees with the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah, which lieth in the south of Arad: and they went and dwelt among the people. 17. And Judah went with Simeon his brother, and they slew the Canaanites that inhabited Zephath, and utterly destroyed it: (And the name of the city was called Hormah.) 18. Also Judah took Gaza with the coast thereof, and Ashkelon with the coast thereof, and Ekron with the coast thereof. 19. And the Lord was with Judah, and he drew out the inhabitants of the mountain, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron. 20. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb, as Moses said: and he expelled thence the three sons of Anak.

We have here a further account of that glorious and successful campaign which Judah and Simeon made.

1. The lot of Judah was pretty well cleared of the Canaanites, yet not thoroughly. Those that dwelt in the mountain (the mountains that were round about Jerusalem) were driven out, (v. 9, 19,) but those in the valley kept their ground against them, having chariots of iron, such as we read of, Josh. 17, 16. Here the men of Judah failed, and thereby spoiled the influence, which otherwise their example hitherto might have had on the rest of the tribes, who followed them in this instance of their cowardice, rather than in all the other instances of their courage. They had iron chariots, and therefore it was thought not safe to attack them; but had not Israel God on their side, whose chariots are thousands of angels, (Ps. 68, 17,) before whom these iron chariots would be but as stubble to the fire? Had not God expressly promised by the oracle, (v. 2,) to give them success against the Canaanites in this very expedition, without excepting those that had iron chariots? Yet they suffered their fears to prevail against their faith, they could not trust God under any disadvantages, and therefore durst not face their iron chariots, but meekly withdrew their forces, then when with one bold stroke they might have completed their victories; and it proved of pernicious consequence. They did run well, what hindered them? Gal. 5, 7.

2. Caleb was put in possession of Hebron, which, though given him by Joshua ten or twelve years ago, (as Dr. Lightfoot computes,) yet being employed in public service, for the settling of the tribes, which was determined before the expiry of forty years, it seems he did not till now make himself master of; so well content was that good man to serve others, while he left himself to be served last; few men are like-minded, for all seek their own, Phil. 2, 23, 21. Yet now the men of Judah all came in to his assistance for the reducing of Hebron, (v. 10,) slew the sons of Anak, and put him in possession of it, v. 20. They gave Hebron unto Caleb. And now Caleb, that he might return the kindness of his countrymen, is impatient to see Debir reduced, and put into the hands of the men of Judah, to expedite which, he proffers his daughter to the person that will undertake to command in the siege of that important place, v. 11, 12. Othniel bravely undertakes it, and wins the town and the lady; (v. 13,) and by his wife's interest and management with her father, gains a city. But afterward they returned himself and family, v. 14, 15. We had this passage before, Josh. 15, 16-19, where it was largely explained and improved.

3. Simeon got ground of the Canaanites in his border, v. 17, 18. In the eastern part of Simeon's lot, they destroyed the Canaanites in Zephath, and called it Hormah, destruction; adding this to some other devoted cities not far off, which they had some time ago, with that reason, called by that name, Numb. 21, 2, 3. And this perhaps was the complete performance of the vow they then made, that they would utterly destroy these cities of the Canaanites in the south. In the western part they took Gaza, Askalon, and Ekron, cities of the Philistines; they gained present possession of the cities, but not destroying the inhabitants, the Philistines retreated in process of time recovered the cities, and proved inveterate enemies to the Israel of God, and no better could come of doing their work by the halves.

4. The Kenites gained a settlement in the tribe of Judah, choosing it there, rather than in any other tribe, because it was the strongest, and there they hoped to be safe and quiet, v. 16. These were the posterity of Jethro, who either went with Israel when Moses invited them, (Num. 10, 29,) or met them about the same place, when they came up from their wanderings in the wilderness thirty-eight years after, and went with them then to Canaan, Moses having promised them that they should fare as Israel fared, Numb. 10, 32. They had at first seated themselves in the city of palm trees, that is, Jericho, a city which never was to be rebuilt, and therefore the fitter for them who dwelt in tents, and did not need public buildings; and they were removed into the wilderness of Judah, either out of their affection to that tribe, which perhaps had been in a particular manner kind to them. Yet we find the tent of Jael, who was of that family, far north, in the lot of Naphtali, when Sisera took shelter there, ch. 4, 17. This respect Israel showed them to let them fix where they pleased, being a quiet people, who, wherever they were, were content with a little. They that molested none, were molested by none. Blessed are the meek, for thus they shall inherit the earth.
21. And the children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem; but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day. 22. And the house of Joseph, they also went up against Beth-el: and the LORD was with them. 23. And the house of Joseph sent to descry Beth-el: (Now the name of the city before was Luz.) 24. And the spies saw a man come forth out of the city; and they said unto him, Show us, we pray thee, the entrance into the city, and we will show thee mercy. 25. And when he showed them the entrance into the city, they smote the city with the edge of the sword; but they let go the man and all his family. 26. And the man went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name thereof Luz: which is the name thereof unto this day. 27. Neither did Manasseh drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shean and her towns, nor Taanach and her towns, nor the inhabitants of Dor and her towns, nor the inhabitants of Ibleam and her towns, nor the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns: but the Canaanites dwelt in that land. 28. And it came to pass, when Israel was strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute, and did not utterly drive them out. 29. Neither did Ephraim drive out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer; but the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among them. 30. Neither did Zebulun drive out the inhabitants of Kitron, nor the inhabitants of Nahalol; but the Canaanites dwelt among them, and became tributaries. 31. Neither did Asher drive out the inhabitants of Acco, nor the inhabitants of Zidon, nor of Aklab, nor of Achzib, nor of Helbah, nor of Aphik, nor of Rehob: 32. But the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land: for they did not drive them out. 33. Neither did Naphtali drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh, nor the inhabitants of Beth-anath; but he dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land: nevertheless the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh and of Beth-anath became tributaries unto them. 34. And the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain: for they would not suffer them to come down to the valley: 35. But the Amorites would dwell in mount Heres in Ajalon, and in Shaalbim; yet the hand of the house of Joseph prevailed, so that they became tributaries. 36. And the coast of the Amorites was from the going up to Akkrabbim, from the rock, and upward.

We are here told upon what terms the rest of the tribes stood with the Canaanites that remained.

I. Benjamin neglected to drive the Jebusites out of that part of the city of Jerusalem which fell to their lot, v. 21. Judah had set them a good example, and gained them great advantages by what they did, (v. 9.) but they did not follow the bow for want of resolution.

II. The house of Joseph bestirred themselves a little to get possession of Beth-el, v. 22. That this city is mentioned in the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. 18. 22. Yet it is spoken of there, (v. 13.) as a city in the borders of that tribe, and it should seem, the line went through it, so that one half of it only belonged to Ephraim, the other half to Benjamin; perhaps the activity of the Ephraimites at this time, to recover it from the Canaanites, secured it entirely to them from henceforward, or at least the greatest part of it, for afterward we find it so much under the power of the ten tribes, (and Benjamin was none of them,) that Jeroboam set up one of his calves in it. In this account of the expedition of the Ephraimites against Beth-el, observe, 1. Their interest in the divine favour. The Lord was with them, and would give them the victory; 2. The tribes of the north asserted their strength. The Chaldee reads it here, as in many other places, The word of the Lord was their Helper, namely, Christ himself, the Captain of the Lord's host, now that they acted separately, as well as when they were all in one body. 2. The prudent measures they took to gain the city. They sent spies to observe what part of the city was weakest, or which way they might make their attack with most advantage, v. 23. These spies got very good information from a man they providentially met with, who showed them a private way into the town, which was therefore left unguarded, because, being not generally known, no danger was suspected on that side. And here, (1.) He is not to be blamed for giving them this intelligence, if he did it from a conviction that the Lord was with them, and that by his donation the land was theirs of right, any more than Rahab was for entertaining those whom she knew to be enemies of her country, but friends of God. Nor, (2.) Are they to be blamed who showed him mercy, gave him and his family not only their lives, but liberty to go wherever they pleased: for one good turn requires another. But, it seems, he would not join himself to the people of Israel, he feared them rather than loved them, and therefore he removed after a colony of the Hittites, which, it should seem, he sent into Arabia, and settled there upon Joshua's invasion of the country; with them this man chose to dwell, and among them he built a city, a small one, we may suppose, such as planters used to build, and in the name of it preserved the ancient name of his native city, Luz, an almond tree, preferring that before its new name which carried religion in it, Beth-el, the house of God. 3. Their success; the spies brought back good news of it, and the men of the army, which improved their advantages, surprised the city, and put them all to the sword, v. 25. But beside this achievement, it seems, the children of Joseph did nothing remarkable. (1.) Manasseh failed to drive out the Canaanites from several very considerable cities in their lot, and did not make any attempt upon them, v. 27. But the Canaanites being in possession, were resisted. (2.) Ephraim, though they were strong, and Manasseh had not resolution enough to offer to dispossess them; as if there were no meddling with them, unless they were willing to resign, which it was not to be expected they ever would be. Only as Israel got strength, they got ground, and served themselves, both by their contributions, and by their personal services, v. 28, 35. (2.) Ephraim likewise, though a powerful tribe neglected Gezer.
a considerable city, and suffered the Canaanites to dwell among them, (v. 29.) which some think, intimates their allowing them a quiet settlement, and indulging them the privileges of an unconquered people, not so much as making them their tributaries.

III. Zebulun, perhaps inclining to the sea-trade, for it was foretold that it should be a haven for ships, neglected to reduce Kitron and Nahalol, (v. 30.) and only made the inhabitants of those places tributaries to them.

IV. Asher quitted itself worse than any of the tribes, (v. 31, 32.) not only in leaving more towns than any of them to the hands of the Canaanites, but in submitting to the Canaanites, instead of making them tributaries; for so the manner of expression intimates, that the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites, as if the Canaanites were the more numerous, and the more powerful, would still be lords of the country, and the Israelites must be only upon sufferance among them.

V. Naphtali, also permitted the Canaanites to live among them, (v. 33.) only by degrees they got them so far under as to exact contributions from them.

VI. Dan was so far from extending his conquests there where his lot lay, that, wanting spirit to make head against the Amorites, he was forced by them to retire into the mountains and inhabit the cities there, but durst not venture into the valley, where, it is probable, the chariots of iron were, v. 34. Nay, and some of the cities in the mountains were kept against them, v. 35. Thus were they straitened in their possessions, and forced to seek for more room at Laish, a great way off, ch. 18. 1, 26. In Jacob's blessing, Judah is compared to a lion, Dan to a serpent; now observe how Judah with his lion-like courage prospered and prevailed, but Dan with all his serpentine subtilty could get no ground; craft and artful management do not always effect the wonders they pretend to. What Dan came short of doing, it seems his neighbours the Ephraimites in part did for him; they put the Amorites under tribute, v. 35.

Upon the whole matter, it appears that the people of Israel were generally very careless both of their duty and interest in this thing; they did not what they might have done to expel the Canaanites and make room for themselves. A sin owing to their slothfulness and cowardice; they would not be at the pains to complete their conquests; like the sluggard, that dreamed of a lion in the way, a lion in the streets, they fancied insuperable difficulties, and frightened themselves with winds and clouds from sowing and reaping. 2. It was owing to their covetousness; the Canaanites' labour and money would do them more good (they thought) than their blood, and therefore they were willing to let them live among them, that they might make a hand of them. 3. They had not that dread and detestation of idolatry, which they ought to have had; they thought it pity to put these Canaanites to the sword, though the measure of their iniquity was full; thought it would be no harm to let them live among them, and that they should be in no danger from them. 4. The same thing that kept their fathers forty years out of Canaan, kept them now out of the full possession of it, and that was, unbelief. Distrust of the power and promise of God lost them their advantages, and ran them into a thousand mischifes.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, we have, I. A particular message which God sent to Israel by an angel, and the impression it made upon them, v. 1. - 3. II. A general idea of the state of Israel during the government of the Judges. In which observe, 1. Their adherence to God while Joshua and the elders lived, v. 6. - 10. 2. Their revolt afterward to idolatry, v. 11. - 13. 3. God's displeasure against them, and his judgment upon them for it, v. 14. - 15. 4. His pity toward them, showed in raising them up deliverers, v. 16, 18. 5. Their relapse into idolatry after the judgment was over, v. 17, 19. 6. The full stop God in anger put to their success, v. 20. - 23. These are the contents, not only of this chapter, but of the whole book.

1. AND an angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I made you to go up out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I sware unto your fathers; and I said, I will never break my covenant with you. 2. And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars: but ye have not obeyed my voice: why have ye done this? 3. Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and your gods shall be a snare unto you. 4. And it came to pass, when the angel of the Lord spake these words unto all the children of Israel, that the people lifted up their voice, and wept. 5. And they called the name of that place Bochim: and they sacrificed there unto the Lord.

It was the privilege of Israel, that they had not only a law in general sent them from heaven, once for all, to direct them into, and keep them in, the way to happiness, but that they had particular messages sent them from heaven, as there was occasion, i.e. reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, when at any time they turned aside out of that way. Beside the written word which they had before them to read, they often heard a word behind them, saying, This is the way, Isa. 30. 21. Here begins that way of God's dealing with them. When they would not hear Moses, let it be tried whether they will hear the prophets. In these verses we have a very awakening sermon that was preached to them when they began to cool in their religion.

I. The preacher was an angel of the Lord, (v. 1.) not a prophet, not Phinehas, as the Jews conject; gospel ministers are indeed called angels of the churches, but the Old Testament prophets are never called angels of the Lord; no doubt, this was a messenger from heaven. Such extraordinary messengers we sometimes find in this book, employed in the raised up of the Judges that delivered Israel, as Gideon and Samson, and now, to show how various the good offices are they do for God's Israel, here is one sent to preach to them, to prevent their falling into sin and trouble. This extraordinary messenger was sent to command, if possible, their great regard to the message, and to affect the minds of a people, whom nothing seemed to affect but what was sensible. The learned Bishop Patrick is clearly of opinion, that this was not a created angel, but the angel of the covenant; the same that appeared to Joshua as Captain of the Hosts of the Lord, who was God himself. Christ himself, says Dr. Lightfoot; who but God and Christ could say, I made you to go up out of Egypt? Joshua had lately admonished them to take heed of entangling themselves with the Canaanites, but they regarded not the words of a dying man; the same warning therefore is here brought them by the living God himself, the Son of God appearing as an angel. If they slight his servants, surely they will reverence his Son. This angel of the Lord is said to come up from Gilgal, perhaps not walking on the earth, but flying swiftly, as the angel Gabriel did to Daniel, in the form of a man, yet very, but whether walking or flying, he seemed to come from Gilgal, for a particular reason; Gilgal was long their head quarters after they came into Canaan, many signal favours they had there received from God, and there the covenant of circumcision was renewed, (Mic. 6. 5.) of which it was designed they should be reminded by his coming from Gilgal. The remembrance of what we have received and heard, will prepare us for a warning to hold fast, Rev. 3. 2, 3.

II. The persons to whom this sermon was preached, were {all the children of Israel, v. 4.} A great congregation for a great preacher! They were assembled either for war, each tribe sending in its forces for some great expedition, or rather for worship, and then the place of their meeting must be Shiloh, where the tabernacle was, at which they were all to come together, three times a year. When we attend upon God in instituted ordinances, we may expect to hear from him, and to receive his gifts at his own gates. The place is called Bechim, (v. 1.) because it gained that name upon this occasion. All Israel need the reproof and warning here given, and therefore it is spoken to them all.

III. The sermon itself is short, but very close. God here tells them plainly, 1. What had done for them, v. 1. He had brought them out of Egypt, a land of slavery and toil, into Canaan, a land of rest, liberty, and plenty. The miseries of the one served as a foil to the felicities of the other. God had here been kind to them, true to the oath sworn to their fathers, had given such proofs of his power as left them insensible if they distrusted it, and such engagement to his service, as left them, insensible if they deserted it. 2. What he had promised, I will never break covenant with you. When he took them to be his peculiar people, it was not with any design to cast them off again, or to change them for another people at his pleasure; let them but be faithful to him, and they should find him unchangeably constant to them. He told them plainly that the covenant he entered into with them should never break, unless it broke on their side. 3. What were his just and received and heard. The reason why he had entered into covenant with God, they should make no league with the Canaanites, who were both his enemies and theirs. That having set up his altar, they should throw down their altars, lest they should be a temptation to them to serve their gods. Could any thing be demanded more easy? 4. How they had in this very thing, which he had most insisted on, disobeyed him. "But ye have not in all the land of Canaan obeyed my voice in contempt of their covenant with God, and their confedency with each other in that covenant, they made leagues of friendship with the idolatrous devoted Canaanites, and connived at their altars, though they stood in competition with God's: "Why have ye done this? What account can you give of this perverseness of your's at the bar of right reason? How can you make us believe for yourselves, or what excuse can you offer?" They that throw off their communion with God, and have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, know not what they do now, and will have nothing to say for themselves in the day of account shortly. 5. How they must expect to smart by and by for this their folly, v. 3. Their tolerating of the Canaanites among them would, (1. Put a period to their victories: "You will not drive them out," says God, "and therefore I will not:" thus their sin was made their punishment. Thus they who indulge their lusts and corruptions, which they should mortify, forfeit the grace of God, and it is justly withdrawn from them. If we will not resist evil, God will not resist us. (2.) It would involve them in continual troubles. "They shall be thorns in your sides to grieve you, which way soever you turn, always doing you one mischief or other." Those deceive themselves, who expect advantage by friendship with those that are enemies to God. (3.) It would (which was worst of all) expose them to constant temptation, and draw them to sin. "Their "shelves, (their altars, so the Chaldee) will be a snare to you, you will find yourselves wretchedly entangled in an affection to them, and it will be your ruin;" so some read it. Those that approach sin, are justly left to themselves to fall into sin, and to perish in it. God often makes men sin, their punishment; and thorns and snares are in the way of the froward, who will walk contrary to God.

IV. The good success of this sermon is very remarkable—the people lifted up their voice and wept, v. 4. 1. The angel had told them of their sins, which they thus expressed their sorrow for; they lifted up their voice in confession of sin, crying out against their own folly and ingratidity, and wept, as those that were both ashamed of themselves, and angry at themselves, as having acted so directly contrary both to their reason and to their interest. 2. The angel had threatened, and now met with the judgment of God, which they thus expressed their dread of; they lifted up their voice in prayer to God to turn away his wrath from them, and wept for fear of that wrath. They relented upon this alarm, and their hearts melted within them, and trembled at the word, and not without cause. This was good, and a sign that the word they heard, made an impression upon them; it is certain sinners can ever read their Bibles with dry eyes: but this was not enough; they wept, but we do not find that they reformed, that they went home and destroyed all the remains of idolatry and idolaters among them. Many are melted under the word, that harden again, before they are cast into a new mould. However, this general weeping, (1.) Gave a new name to the place, (v. 5.) they called it Bochim, Weepers, a good name to the place: for they, having kept close to God and their duty, no voice but that of singing had been heard in their congregation; but by their sin and folly they had made other work for themselves, and now nothing is to be heard but the voice of weeping. (2.) It gave occasion for a solemn sacrifice; they sacrificed there unto the Lord, being (as is supposed) met at Shiloh, where God's altar was. They offered sacrifice to turn away God's wrath, and to obtain his favour, and in token of their dedication of themselves to him, and to him only, making a covenant by this sacrifice. The disease being thus taken in time, and the physic administered working so well, one would have hoped a cure might have been effected. But by the sequel of the story, it appears to have been too deeply rooted to be wept out.

6. And when Joshua had let the people go, the children of Israel went every man unto his inheritance to possess the land. 7. And the people served the Lord all the days of Josua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Josua, who had seen all the great works of the Lord, that he did for Israel. 8. And Josua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died, being a hundred and ten year; old. 9. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-heres, in the mount of Ephraim, on the north side of the hill Gaash. 10. And also all that generation were gathered unto their fathers: and there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the works which he had done for Israel. 11. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim: 12. And they forsook the Lord God of their fathers, which brought them out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods, of the gods of the people that were round about them, and bowed themselves unto them, and provoked the Lord to anger. 13. And they forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashhtaroth. 14. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them, and he sold them into the hands of their enemies round about, so that they could not any longer stand before their enemies. 15. Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil, as the Lord had said, and as the Lord had sworn unto them: and they were greatly distressed.

16. Nevertheless the Lord raised up judges, which delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them. 17. And yet they would not hearken unto their judges, but they went a whoring after other gods, and bowed themselves unto them: they turned quickly out of the way which their fathers walked in, obeying the commandments of the Lord; but they did not so. 18. And when the Lord raised them up judges, then the Lord was with the judge, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge: for it repented the Lord because of their groanings, by reason of them that oppressed them and vexed them. 19. And it came to pass, when the judge was dead, that they returned and corrupted themselves more than their fathers, in following other gods to serve them, and to bow down unto them: they ceased not from their own doings, nor from their stubborn way. 20. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel; and he said, Because that this people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened unto my voice, 21. I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died; 22. That through them I may prove Israel, whether they will keep the way of the Lord, to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or not. 23. Therefore the Lord left those nations, without driving them out hastily; neither delivered he them into the hand of Joshua.

The beginning of this paragraph is only a repetition of what account we had before of the people's good character, during the government of Joshua, and of his death and burial, Josh. 24. 29, 30. Which comes in here again, only to make way for the following account, with this chapter, of their degeneracy and apostasy. The angel had foretold that the Canaanites and their idols would be a snare to Israel: now the historian undertakes to show that they were so, and that they may appear the more clear, he looks back a little, and takes notice, 1. Of their happy settlement in the land of Canaan. Joshua, having distributed this land among them, dismissed them to the out and comfortable possession of it, v. 6. He sent them away, not only every tribe, but every man to his inheritance, no doubt, giving them his blessing. 2. Of their continuance in the faith and fear of God's holy name as long as Joshua lived, v. 7. As they went to their possessions with good resolutions to serve God, so they persisted for some time in these good resolutions, as long as they had good rulers that set them good examples, gave them patterns, and reproved and restrained the corruptions that crept in among them; and as long as they had in remembrance the great things God did for them when he brought them into Canaan: they that had seen these wonders, had so much sense as to believe their own eyes, and so much reason as to serve that God who had appeared so gloriously on their behalf; but they that followed, because they had not seen and believed the great works of God, and the evidence of the hand of Joshua, which gave a fatal stroke to the interests of religion among the people, v. 8, 9. Yet so much sense they had of their obligations to him, that they did him honour at his death, and buried him in Timnath-heres; so it is called here, not, as in Joshua, Timnath-serah. Heres signifies the sun; a representation of which, some think, was set upon his sepulchre, and gave name to it, in remembrance of the sun's standing still at his word. So divers of the Jewish writers say; but I much question whether an image of the sun would be allowed to the honour of Joshua, at that time, when, by reason of men's general proneness to worship the sun, it would be in danger of being abused to the dishonour of God. 4. Of the rising of a new generation, v. 10. All that generation in a few years wore off, their good instructions and examples died, and were buried with them, and there arose another generation of Israelites who had so little sense of religion, and were in so little care about it, that notwithstanding all the advantages of their education, one might truly say, that they knew not the Lord, knew him not at all, knew him not as he had revealed himself, else they would not have forsaken him. They were so entirely devoted to the world, so intent upon the business of this world, and so indulgent of the flesh in case and luxury, that they never minded the true God and his holy religion, and so were easily drawn aside to false gods and their abominable superstitions.

And so he comes to give us a general idea of the series of things in Israel, during the time of the Judges; the same repeated in the same order.

The people of Israel forsook the God of Israel, and gave that worship and honour to the deities of the Canaanites, which was due to him alone, Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and wonder, O earth! Hath a nation, such a nation, so well fed, so well taught, changed its God, such a God, God of infinite power, unpolluted purity, inexhaustible goodness, and so very jealous of a competitor, for stocks and stones that could do neither good nor evil? Jer. 2. 11, 12. Never was there such an instance of folksy, ingratitude, and perfidiousness. Observe how it is described here, v. 11, 15. In general, they did evil, nothing could be more evil, than this, God was their God, and they turned against his worship. They forsook the Lord; Jer. 19. 4. They forsook the worship of the Lord, so the Ch. tell: for they that forsoke the worship of God, do in effect forsoke himself. It aggravated this, that he was the God of their fathers, so that they were born in his house, and therefore bound to serve him; and that he brought them out of the land of Egypt, he loosed their bonds, and upon that account also they were obliged to serve him. 2. When they forsook God, they were so fully persuaded, not nor were they such fools as to say, There is no God; but they followed other gods: so much remained of pure nature as to own a God, yet so much appeared of corrupt nature as to multiply gods, and to take up with any, and to follow the fashion, not the rule, in religious worship. Israel had the honour of being a peculiar people, and dignified above all others, and yet so false were they to their own privileges, that they were fond of the gods of the heathen that were round about them. Baal and Ashtaroth, he-gods and she-gods; they made their court to sun, and moon, Jupiter and Juno. Baalim signifies lords, and Ashtaroth, blessed ones, both plural, for when they forsook Jehovah, whom is one, they had gods many, and lords many, as a luxuriant fancy pleased to multiply them. Whatever they took for their gods, they served them, and bowed down to them, gave honour to them, and begged favours from them.

II. The God of Israel was hereby provoked to anger, and delivered them up into the hand of their enemies, v. 14, 15. He was wrath with them, for he is a jealous God, and true to the honour of his own name; and the way he took to punish them for their apostasy, was, to make those their tormentors whom they yielded to as their temple. They made them the moan and panting of forsaking God, as they would have been great and happy if they had continued faithful to him. 1. The scale of victory turned against them. After they forsook God, whenever they took the sword in hand, they were as sure to be beaten as before they had been sure to conquer. Formerly, their enemies could not stand before them, but wherever they went, the hand of Jehovah was on them; but now that their fall was not so in the religious, God suspended his favour, stopped the progress of their successors, and would not drive out their enemies any more, (v. 3.) only suffered them to keep their ground: but now, when they were quite revoluted to idolatry, the war turned directly against them, and they could not any longer stand before their enemies. God would rather give the success to those that had never known nor observed the truth, than to those that had seen it and despised it. When they came to see that he himself was turned to be their enemy, and fought against them, Isa. 63. 10. 2. The balance of power then turned against them of course. Whoever would, might spoil them; whoever would, might oppress them; God sold them into the hands of their enemies; not only he deliver ed them up freely, as we do that which we have sold, but he did it upon a valuable consideration, that he might get himself honour as a jealous God, who would not spare even his own peculiar people when they provoked him. He sold them as insol vent debtors are sold, (Matth. 18. 23.) by their sufferings to make some sort of reparation to his glory for the injury it sustained by their apostasy. Observe how their punishment, (1.) Answered what they had done; they suffered more, provoked the nations that were round about them, even the meanest, and God made them serve the princes of the nations that were round about them, even the meanest.

He that is company for every fool, is justly made a fool of by every company. (2.) How it answered what God had spoken. The hand of heaven was thus turned against them, as the Lord had said, and so the Lord was with them, (v. 15.) referring to the curse and death set before them in the covenant, with the blessing and life. Those that have found God true to his promises, may from thence infer that he will be as true to his threatenings.

III. The God of infinite mercy took pity on them, in their distresses, though they had brought themselves into their own sin and folly, and wrought deliverance for them. Nevertheless, they had not turned from the worship of the name of God, and the accomplishment of God's word, yet they were in process of time saved out of their troubles, v. 16-18. Where observe, 1. The inducement of their deliverance. It came purely from God's pity and tender compassion, the reason was fetched from within himself. It is not said, It repented him because of their iniquities, (for it appears, v. 17. that many of them continued unreformed,) but, It repented the Lord because of their groanings; though it is not so much the burden of sin, as the burden of affliction, that they are said to groan under. It was true, they desired to perish for ever under his curse, yet this being the day of his patience and our probation, he does not stir up all his wrath. He might in justice have abandoned them, but he could not for pity do it. 2. The instruments of their deliverance; God did not send angels from heaven to do it, or bring in any foreign power for their rescue, but raised up judges from among themselves, as there was occasion, men to whom God gave extraordinary qualifications for, and calls to, that special service for which they were designed, which was to reform and deliver Israel, and whose great attempts he crowned with wonderful success; the Lord was with the judges when he raised them up; and they became famous. Observe, (1.) In the days of great degeneracy and distress of the church, there shall be some whom God will either find or make fit to redress its grievances, and set things to rights. (2.) God must be acknowledged in the seasonable rising up of useful men for public service. He endues men with wisdom and courage, gives them hearts to act and venture. All that are in any way saved from sin and destruction are the instruments as the gifts of God. (3.) Whom God calls, he will own, and give them his presence; whom he raises up, he will be with. (4.) The judges of a land are its saviours.

IV. The degenerate Israelites were not effectually and thoroughly reformed, no not by their judges, v. 17-19. I. Even while their judges were with them, and active in their work, there were those that would not hearken to their judges, but at that very time went a whoring after other gods; so mad were they upon their idols, and so obstinately bent to backslide. They had been espoused to God, but broke the marriage-covenant, and went a whoring after false gods. Idolatry is spiritual adultery; so vile and base and pernicious a thing is it, and so hardly are those reclaimed, that are addicted to it. 2. Those that in the times of revers-
In this chapter. 1. A general account of Israel's enemies is premised, and of the mischief they did them, v. 1-7. II. A particular account of the brave exploits done by the three first of the judges. 1. Othniel, whom God raised up to fight Israel's battles, and plead their cause against the king of Mesopotamia, v. 8-11. 2. Ehud, who was employed in rescuing Israel out of the hands of the Moabites, and did it by stabbing the king of Moab, v. 12-30. 3. Shamgar, who signalized himself in an encounter with the Philistines, v. 31.

1. NOW these are the nations which the Lord left, to prove Israel by them, (even as many of Israel as had not known all the wars of Canaan;) 2. Only that the generations of the children of Israel might know to teach them war, at the least such as before knew nothing (thereof;) 3. Namely, five lords of the Philistines, and all the Canaanites, and the Sidonians, and the Hitites that dwelt in mount Lebanon, from mount Baal-hermon unto the entering in of Hamath. 4. And they were to prove Israel by them, to know whether they would hearken unto the commandments of the Lord, which he commanded their fathers by the hand of Moses. 5. And the children of Israel dwelt among the Canaanites, Hittites, and Amorites, and Perizzites, and Hitites, and Jebusites: 6. And they took their daughters to be their wives, and gave their daughters to their sons, and served their gods. 7. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and forgot the Lord their God, and served Baalim and the groves.

We are here told what remained of the old inhabitants of Canaan. 1. There were some of them that kept together in united bodies, unbroken; (v. 3.) The five lords of the Philistines, namely, Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron, 1 Sam. 6. 17. Three of these cities had been in part reduced, (ch. 1. 18.) yet it seems, the Philistines (probably with the help of the other two, which strengthened their confederacy with each other from thenceforward) recovered the possession of them. These gave the greatest disturbance to Israel of any of the natives, especially in the latter times of the Judges, and they were never quite reduced until David did it. There was a particular nation called Canaanites, that kept their ground with the Sidonians, upon the coast of the great sea; And in the north the Hitivites held much of mount Lebanon, it being a remote corner, in which perhaps they were supported by some of the neighbouring states. But beside these, 2. There were everywhere in all parts of the country some scatterings of the nations; (v. 5.) Hittites, Amorites, &c. which by Israel's foolish connivance and indulgence, were so set on foot, and so increased, that the children of Israel are said to dwell among them, as if the right had still remained in the Canaanites, and the Israelites had been taken in by their permission, and only as tenants at will.

Now concerning these remnants of the natives, observe,

1. How wisely God permitted them to remain. It had been mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter, as an act of God's justice, that he let them remain for Israel's correction. But here another conclusion is put upon it, and it appears to have been an act of God's wisdom, that he let them remain for Israel's real advantage, that those who had not known the wars of Canaan, might learn war, v. 1. 2. It was the will of God that the people of Israel should be inured to war, 1. Because their country was exceeding rich and fruitful, and abounded with dainties of all sorts, which, if they were not sometimes made to know hardship, would be in danger of sinking them into the utmost degree of luxury and effeminacy. They must sometimes wade in blood, and not always in milk and honey, lest even their men of war, by the long disuse of arms, should become as soft and nice as the tender and delicate woman, that would not set so much as the sole of her foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy; a temper as destructive to everything that is good, as it is to everything that is great, and them least to be carefully watched by all God's Israel. 2. Because their country lay very much in the midst of enemies, by whom they must expect to be insulted; for God's heritage was as a speckled bird, the birds round about were against her, Jer. 12. 9. It was therefore necessary they should be well disciplined, that they might defend their coasts when invaded, and might hereafter enlarge their coast as God had promised them. They must learn by experience, which not only acquaints men with martial discipline, but (which is no less necessary) inspires them with a martial disposition. It was for the interest of Israel to breed soldiers, as it is the interest of an island to breed seamen, and therefore God left Canaanites among them, that, by the lesser difficulties and hardships they met with in encountering them, they might be prepared for greater; and, by prudent Bishop Patrick offers an another sense of ch. 2, that they might know to teach them war, that is, they shall know what it is to be left to themselves. Their fathers fought by a divine power, God taught their hands to war and their fingers to fight; but now that they have forfeited his favour, let them learn what it is to fight like other men.

II. How wickedly Israel mingled themselves with those that did remain. One thing God intended among them, was to prepare Israel, (v. 4,) that those who were faithful to the God of Israel, might have the honour of resisting the Canaanites' allurements to idolatry, and that those who were false and insincere, might be discovered, and might fall under the shame of yielding to these allurements. Thus in the christian churches there must needs be heresies, that they which are perfect may be made manifest, 1 Cor. 11. 19. Israel, up to that, proved bad. 1. They joined in marriage with the Canaanites, (v. 6,) though they could not advance either their honour or estate by marrying with them. They would mar their blood instead of mending it, and sink their estates instead of raising them, by such marriages. 2. Thus they were brought to join in worship with them; they served their gods, (v. 6.) Baalim and the groves; (v. 7.) that is, the images that were worshiped in groves of the high places, in a sort of noctrine temples. In such unequal matches there is more reason to fear that the bad will corrupt the good, than to hope that the good will reform the bad; as it is in laying two pears together, the one rotten, and the other sound. When they inclined to worship other gods, they forgot the Lord their God. In complaisance to their new relations, they talked of nothing but Baalim and the groves; so that by degrees they lost the remembrance of the true God, and forgot there was such a Being, and what obligations they lay under to him. In nothing is the corrupt memory of man more treacherous than in this, that it is apt to forget the instance, out of sight, but out of mind; and here begins all the wickedness that is in the world; they have perverted their way, for they have forgotten the Lord their God.

8. Therefore the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hand of Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia; and the children of Israel served Chushan-rishathaim eight years. 9. And when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, the Lord raised up a deliverer to the children of Israel, who delivered them, even Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. 10. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he judged Israel, and went out to war; and the Lord delivered Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia into his hand; and his hand prevailed against Chushan-rishathaim. 11. And the land had rest forty years: and Othniel the son of Kenaz died.

We now come to the records of the government of the particular judges, the first of which was Othniel, in whom the story of this book is knit to that of Joshua, for even in Joshua's time, Othniel began to be famous; by which it appears that it was not long after Israel's settlement in Canaan, before their purity began to be corrupted, and their peace (by consequence) disturbed. And these who have had much to do in the sacred chronology, are generally agreed, that the Danites' idolatry and the war with the Benjamites for abusing the Levite's concubine, though related in the latter end of this book, happened about this time, under or before Othniel's government, who, though a judge, was not such a king in Israel, as would keep men from doing what was right in their own eyes.

In this short narrative of Othniel's government, we have,

I. The distress that Israel was brought into for their sin, v. 8. God, being justly displeased with them for plucking up the hedge of their peculiarity, and laying themselves in common with the nations, plucked up the hedge of their protection, and laid them open to the nations; set them to sale as goods he would part with, and the first that laid hands on them was Chushan-rishathaim, king of that Syria which lay between the two great rivers of Tigris and Euphrates, thence called Mesopotamia; which signifies the midst of rivers. It is probable that this was a warlike prince, and, aiming to enlarge his dominions, invaded the two tribes first on the other side Jordan that lay next him, and afterward, perhaps by degrees, penetrated in the heart of the country, and, as far as he went, put them under contribution, exacting it with rigour, and perhaps even robbing upon them. Laban was of this country, who oppressed Jacob with a hard service; but it lay at such a distance, that one could not but have thought Israel's trouble should have come from such a far country, which shows so much the more of the hand of God in it.
II. Their return to God in this distress. When he slew them, then they sought him whom before they had slighted. The children of Israel, even the generality of them, cried unto the Lord, v. 9. At first, they made light of their trouble, and thought they could easily shake off the yoke of a prince at such a distance; but when it continued eight years, they began to feel the smart of it, and then they cried under it, who before had laughed at it. They who in the day of their mirth had cried to Baalim and Ashtaroth, that they were in trouble, cry to the Lord from whom they had revolted, whose justice brought them into this trouble, and whose power and favour alone could help them out of it. Affliction makes those cry to God with importunity, who before would scarcely speak to him.

III. God's return in mercy to them for their deliverance. Though need drove them to him, he did not give them, though peradventure he might have, as it were, a deliverer, or saviour, as the word is. Observe, 1. Who the deliverer was; it was Othniel, who married Caleb's daughter; one of the old stock that had seen the works of the Lord, and had himself, no question, kept his integrity, and secretly lamented the apostasy of his people, but waited for a divine call to appear publicly for the redress of their grievances. He was now, we may suppose, far advanced in years, when God raised him up to his office of an apostle to them.

1. The Spirit of prophecy remained on him. 3. What method he took; he first judged Israel, reproved them, called them to an account for their sins, and reformed them, and then went out to war; that was the right method. Let sin at home be conquered, that worst of enemies, and then enemies abroad will be more easily dealt with. Thus let Christ be our Judge and Law-giver, and then he will save us and on no other terms, Isa. 33. 22. 4. What good success he had. He prevailed to break the yoke of the oppression, and, as it should seem, to break the neck of the oppressor; for it is said, The Lord delivered Chushan-rishathaim into his hands. Now was Judah, of which tribe Othniel was, as a lion's whelp gone up from the cubs. 5. The happy consequence of Othniel's good services. The land, though getting ground, yet had rest, and some fruits of the reformation, forty years; and it had been perpetual, if they had kept close to God and their duty.

12. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord: and the Lord strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against Israel, because they had done evil in the sight of the Lord. 13. And he gathered unto him the children of Ammon and Amalek, and went and smote Israel, and possessed the city of palm-trees. 14. So the children of Israel served Eglon the king of Moab eighteen years. 15. But when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, the Lord raised them up a deliverer, Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man lefthanded: and by him the children of Israel sent a present unto Eglon the king of Moab.

16. But Ehud made him a dagger, which had two edges, of a cubit length; and he did gird it under his raiment upon his right thigh. 17. And he brought the present unto Eglon king of Moab; and Eglon was a very fat man. 18. And when he had made an end to offer the present, he sent away the people that bare the present. 19. But he himself turned again from the quaries that were by Gilgal, and said, I have a secret errand unto thee, O king; who said, Keep silence. And all that stood by him went out from him. 20. And Ehud came unto him; and he was sitting in a summer parlour, which he had for himself, alone: and Ehud said, I have a message from God unto thee. And he arose out of his seat. 21. And Ehud put forth his left hand, and took the dagger from his right thigh, and thrust it into his belly. 22. And the haft also went in after the blade; and the fat closed upon the blade, so that he could not draw the dagger out of his belly; and the dirt came out. 23. Then Ehud went forth through the porch, and shut the doors of the parlour upon him, and locked them. 24. When he was gone out, his servants came; and when they saw that, behold, the doors of the parlour were locked, they said, Surely he covereth his feet in his summer chamber. 25. And they tarried till they were ashamed; and, behold, he opened not the doors of the parlour: therefore they took a key and opened them: and, behold, their lord was fallen down dead on the earth. 26. And Ehud escaped while they tarried, and passed beyond the quaries, and escaped unto Seirath. 27. And it came to pass, when he was come, that he blew a trumpet in the mountain of Ephraim, and the children of Israel went down with him from the mount, and be before them. 28. And he said unto them, Follow after me; for the Lord hath delivered your enemies the Moabites into your hand. And they went down after him, and took the lords of Jordan toward Moab, and suffered not a man to pass over. 29. And they slew of Moab at that time about ten thousand men, all lusty, and all men of valour; and there escaped not a man. 30. So Moab was subdued that day under the hand of Israel. And the land had rest fourscore years.

Ehud is the next of the judges whose achievements are related in this history, and here is an account of his actions.

1. When Israel sins again, God raises up a new oppressor, v. 12...14. It was an aggravation of their wickedness, that they did evil again, after they had smarted so long for their former iniquities, promised so fair when Othniel judged them, and received so much mercy from God in their deliverance. What, and after all this, again to break his commandments? Was the disease obstinate to all the methods of cure, both corrosive and salutary? It seems it was. Perhaps they thought they might make the more bold with their own sins, because they saw themselves in no danger from their old oppressor, the powers of that kingdom were weakened and brought low; but God made them know that he had a variety of rods wherewith to chastise them, he strengthened Eglon king of Moab against the former, the former, and therefore would be the more mischievous to them; God's judgments thus approached them gradually, to bring them to repentance. When Israel dwelt in tents, but kept their integrity, Balaam, king of Moab, that would have strengthened himself against them, was baffled; but now that they had forsaken God, and worshipped the gods of the nations round about them, (and perhaps those of the Moabites among the rest,) here was another king of Moab whom God strengthened against them, put power into his hands, though a wicked man, that he might be a scourge of Israel; the staff in his hand, with which he beat Israel, was, God's indignation; howbeit he meant not so, neither did his heart think so, Isa. 10. 6. 7. Israelites did ill, and, we may suppose, Moabites did worse; yet because God punishes the sins of his people, but will not destroy them all at once, (Deut. 28. 59.) this king, Eglon, on the death of the former, the former, and the Moabites being destroyed, the spirit may be saved, Israel is weakened, and Moab strengthened against them. God would not suffer the Israelites, when they were the stronger, to distress the Moabites, nor give them any disturbance though they were idolaters; (Deut. 2. 8.) yet now he suffered the Moabites to distress Israel, and strengthened them on purpose that they might: Thy judgments, O God, are a great sea, (Psa. 119. 99.) to his assistance the Ammonites and Amalekites, (v. 13.) and that strengthened him; and we are here told how they prevailed.

1. They hem them in the field, they went and smote Israel, (v. 13.) not only these tribes that lay next them on the other side of Jordan, who, though first settled, being frontier-tribes, were most disturbed; but those also who, their hands being full in the city of palm-trees, which, it is probable, was a strong-hold erected near the place where Jericho had stood, for that was so called. (Deut. 34. 3.) into which the Moabites put a garrison, to be a bridle upon Israel, and to secure the passes of Jordan, for the preservation of the communication with their own country. It was well for the Kenites that they had left this city, (ch. 1. 16.) before it fell into the hands of the enemy, in order to the safety of the Israelites. (v. 17.) They quickly lost that by their own sin, which they had gained by miracles of divine mercy.

2. They made them to serve, (v. 14.) that is, exacted tribute from them, either the fruits of the earth in kind, or money in lieu of them. They neglected the service of God, and did not pay him his tribute; thus therefore did God recover from them that which he had bestowed on them, and reduce them to the same poverty and misery as they were reduced for Baal, Hos. 2. 8. What should have been paid to the divine grace, and was not, was distrained for, and paid to the divine justice. The former servitude (v. 8.) lasted but eight years, this eighteen; for if lesser troubles do not do the work, God will send greater.

11. When Israel prays again, God raises up a new deliverer, (v. 15.) his name Ehud. We are here told, 1. It was Benjamite. The city of palm-trees lay within the lot of this tribe, by which, it is probable, they suffered the most, and therefore stirred first to shake off the yoke. It is supposed by the chronolger, that the Israelites' war with Benjamin for the wickedness of Gibeah, by which that city was polluted, was reduced to six hundred years, for it had been so long, at a period when the wars of ancient monuments had been hushed, or so far changed, that the events of this period were not remembered, (ch. 15. 8.) and thereby was left in suspense before this, so that we may well think that tribe to be now the weakest of all the tribes; yet out of it God raised up this deliverer, in token of his being perfectly reconciled to them, to manifest his own power in ordaining strength out of weakness, and that he might bestow more abundant honor upon that part which lacked, 1 Cor. 12. 24. 2. That he was left-handed, as it seems, many of that kind have been, was no hindrance to his being fitted for the service. It is probable, they were fitted for the hand, and yet multitudes of them were left-handed; for men's natures do not always answer their names. The LXX. say, he was an ambidex-ter, one that could use both hands alike, supposing that this was an advantage to him in the action he was called to; but the Hebrew phrase, that he was shut of his right hand, intimates that either through disease or disuse, he made little or no use of that, of his left hand only: and so was the less fit for war, because he must needs handle his sword but awkwardly; yet God chose this left-handed man to be the man of his right hand, whom he would make strong for himself, Ps. 80. 17. It was God's right hand that gained Israel the victory, (Ps. 44. 3.) not the right of the instruments he employed.

We are here told what Ehud did for the delicence of Israel out of the hands of the Moabites. He saved the king, he that was delivering the oppresors, when the measure of their iniquity was full, and the set time to favour Israel was come.

1. He put to death Eglon the king of Moab; I say, put him to death; not he murdered or assassinated him, but, as a judge, or minister of divine justice, executed the judgments of God upon him, as an implacable enemy to God and Israel. This story is particularly remarkable in the authenticity of the facts.

[1.] He had a fair occasion of access to him; being an ingenious active man, and fit to stand before kings, his people chose him to carry a present in the name of all Israel, over and above their tribute, to their great lord the king of Moab, that they might find favour in his eyes, v. 15. The present is called mincha in the original, which is the word used in the law for the offerings that were present-ted to God. It would seem, that the Moabites generally, or all Israel had not offered in their season, to the God that loved them; and now, to punish them for their neglect, they are laid under a necessity of bringing their offerings to a heathen prince that hated them. Ehud went in his errand to Eglon, offered his present with the usual ceremony, and expressions of dutiful respect, the better to colour what he intended, and to prevent suspicion.

[2.] It should seem, from the first, he designed to be the death of him, God putting it into his heart, and letting him know also that the motion was from himself, by the Spirit that came upon him, the impulses of which carried with them their own evidence, and so gave him full satisfaction both as to the lawfulness and the success of this daring attempt, of both which he would have had reason to doubt. If he be supposed to have advised the king to do it, he is sure both that he may do it, and that he shall do it; for a command from God is sufficient to bear us out, and bring us off, both against our conscience, and against all the world. That he com-passed and imagined the death of this tyrant, appears by the preparation he made of a weapon for the purpose; a short dagger, but half a yard long, like a bayonet, which might easily be concealed under his clothes, (v. 16.) perhaps, because they were suffered to come near the king with their swords by their sides. This he wore on his right thigh, that it might be the more ready to his left hand, and might be the less suspected.
[3.] He contrived how to be alone with him; which he might the more easily be, now that he had not only made himself known to him, but ingratiated himself by the present, and the compliments, which, perhaps, on that occasion, he had passed upon him. Observe how he laid his plot. First, He concealed his design even from his own attendants; brought them part of the way, and then told them of it, and distracted him towards his goal, while he himself, as if he had forgot something behind him, went back to the king of Moab’s court, v. 18. There needed but one hand to do the execution; had more been engaged they could not so safely have kept counsel, nor so easily have made an escape. Secondly, He returned from the quarries by Gilgil (v. 16.) from the groved images (so it is in the margin) which were, and what he disdained to the Moabites with the twelve stones which Joshua had set up there. Some suggest that the sight of these idols stirred up in him such an indignation against the king of Moab, as put him upon the execution of that design, which otherwise he had thought to have let fall for the present. Or, perhaps, he came so far as to these images, that telling from what place he returned, the king of Moab might, by the tidings, still in some measure become known to God. Thirdly, He begged a private audience, and obtained it in a withdrawing room, here called a summer parlour. He told the king he had a secret errand to him, who, thereupon, ordered all his attendants to withdraw, v. 19. Whether he expected to receive some private instructions from an oracle, or some private information concerning the present state of Israel, as if Ehud would betray his country, or do that most offensive thing for him, he did it alone with a stranger, and whom he had reason to look upon as an enemy; but those that are marked for ruin, are infuriated, and their hearts hid from understanding; God deprives them of discretion.

[4.] When he had him alone, he soon despatched him. His summer parlour, where he used to indulge himself in ease and luxury, was the place of his execution. First, Ehud demands his attention to his presence; it is God, (v. 20.) and that against your will, you have been a betrayer of God. Thus, a dagger; God sends to us by the judgment of his hand, as well as by the judgment of his mouth. Secondly, Ehud pays respect to a message from God. Though a king; though a heathen king; though rich and powerful; though now tyrannizing over the people of God; though a fat uncleanly man, that could not easily rise, nor stand long, though drowsy, hoarse, little, short of breath; yet, when he expected to receive orders from heaven, he rose out of his seat; whether it was low and easy, or whether it was high and stately, he quitted it, and stood up when God was about to speak to him, thereby owning God his Superior. This shames the irreverence of many who are called Christians, and yet when a message from God is delivered to them, study to show, by all the means of commerce, how little they regard it. Ehud, in calling what he had to do, a message from God, plainly avouches a divine commission for it; and God’s inclining Ehud to stand up to it, did both confirm the commission, and facilitate the execution. Thirdly, The message was delivered, not to his ear, but immediately, and literally, to his heart, into which the fatal knife was thrust, and was left there. This instant execution, made him unable to resist, or to help himself; but by the force of his luxury and excess; and when the fat closed up the blade, God would by that circumstance show how those that tamper the body, do but prepare for their own misery. However, it was an emblem of his carnal security and senselessness. His heart was as fat as greasewood, and in that he thought himself enclosed. See Ps. 119. 70—17. 10. Ehud signifies a calf, and he felt like a fattened calf, by the knife, an acceptable sacrifice to divine justice. Notice is taken of the coming out of the dirt or dung, that the death of this proud tyrant may appear the more ignominious and shameful. He that had been so very nice and curious about his own body, to keep it easy and clean, shall now be found wallowing in his own blood and excrement. Thus does God prove tender towards us enemies. Now this act of Ehud’s, 1. May justify itself, because he had special direction from God to do it, and it was agreeable to the usual method, which, under that dispensation, God took to avenge his people of their enemies, and to manifest to the world his own justice. But, 2. It will by no means justify any now in doing the like. No such commissions are now length, opened the door and found their master in deep sleep indeed his long sleep, v. 25. The horror of this tragical spectacle, and the confusion it must needs put them into, to reflect upon their own inconsideration in not opening the door sooner, quite put by the thoughts of sending pursuers after him that had done it, whom now they despaired of over-taking. Lastly, Ehud by this means made his escape to Sichem, a thick wood; so some, v. 26. It is not said anywhere in this story, what was the place in which Ehud lived now; but there being no mention of Ehud’s passing and repassing Jordan, I am inclined to think that Ehud had left his own country of Moab, on the other side Jordan, and made his principal residence at this time in the city of palm-trees, within the land of Canaan, a richer country than his own, and that there he was slain, and then the quarries by Gilgal were not far off from him. There he sat down by himself, and thought he had sufficiently fortified himself to lord it over the people of God, there he was cut off, and proved to be fed for the slaughter like a lamb in a larger place. 2.) Ehud having slain the king of Moab, gave a total rout to the forces of the Moabites that were among them, and so effectually shook off the yoke.
of their oppression. [1.] He raised an army immediately in mount Ephraim, at some distance from the head-quarters of the Moabites, and headed them himself, v. 27. The trumpet he blew was indeed a jubilee-trumpet, proclaiming liberty, and a joyful sound it was to the oppressed Israelites, who for a long time had been afraid and expected that some of their enemies. [2.] Like a pious man, and as one that did all this in faith, he took encouragement himself, and gave encouragement to his soldiers, from the power of God engaged for them; (v. 28.) "Follow me, for the Lord hath delivered your enemies into your hands; we are sure to have God with us, and therefore may go boldly, and shall go on triumphantly." [3.] Like a politic general, he first secured the fords of Jordan, set strong guards upon all those passes, to cut off communications between the Moabites that were in the land of Israel, (for upon them only his design was,) and their own country on the other side Jordan; that if, upon the alarm given them, they resolved to fly, they might not escape thither, and if they resolved to fight, they might not have assistance thence. Thus he shut them up in that land as their prison, in which they were, laying them themselves as their palace and paradise. [4.] He then fell upon them, and put them all to the sword, ten thousand of them, which, it seems, was the number appointed to keep Israel in subjection; (v. 29.) There escaped not a man of them. And they were the best and choicest of all the king of Moab's forces; all lusty men of bulk and stature, and not only able bodied, but high spirited too, and men of valour, v. 29. But neither their strength nor their courage stood them in any stead, when the set time was come for God to deliver them into the hand of Israel. [5.] The consequence of this victory was, that the power of the Moabites was wholly broken in the land of Israel; the country was cleared of these oppressors, and the land had rest eighty years, v. 30. We may hope that there was likewise a formation among them, and a check given to idolatry, by the influence of Ehud, which continued a good part of this time. It was a great while for the land to rest, fourscore years; yet what is that to the saints' everlasting rest in the heavenly Canaan? 31. And after him was Shamgar, the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad: and he also delivered Israel.

When it was said the land had rest eighty years, some think it is meant chiefly of that part of the land which lay eastward on the banks of Jordan, which had been oppressed by the Moabites; but it seems, by this passage here, that the other side of the country which lay south-west, was in that time infested by the Philistines, against whom Shamgar made head. 1. It seems Israel needed deliverance, for he delivered Israel; how great the distress was, Deborah afterward related in her song, (ch. 5, 6.) that in the days of Shamgar the highways were unoccupied, &c. That part of the country which lay next to the Philistines was so infested with plunderers, that the people could not travel the roads in safety, but were in danger, both by sea and by land; nor was such safety preserved to those who dwelt in the unguarded villages, but were forced to take shelter in the fortified cities.

2. God raised him up to deliver them, as it should seem, while Ehud was yet living, but superannuated. So incomparable were the enemies for number, that it seems the killing of six hundred of them amounted to a deliverance of Israel, and so many he slew with an ox-goad, or, as some read it, a flough-share. It is probable that he was himself following the plough, when the Philistines made an inroad upon the country to ravage it, and God put into his heart to oppose them: the impulse being sudden and strong, and having neither sword nor spear to do execution with, he was the instrument that was next at hand, some of the tools of his plough, and with that killed so many hundred men, and came off unharmed. See here (1.) That God can make those eminently serviceable to his glory and his church's good, whose extraction, education, and employment, are very mean and obscur. He that has the residue of the Spirit, could, when he pleased, make ploughmen judges and generals, and fishermen apostles. (2.) It is no matter how weak the weapon is, if God direct and strengthen the arm. An ox-goad, when God pleases, shall do more than Goliath's sword. And sometimes he chooses to work by such unlikely means, that the excellency of the power may appear to be of God.

CHAP. IV.

The method of the history of Deborah and Barak, (he hero's in this chapter,) is the same with that before. Here is, 1. Israel revolted from God, v. 1. II. Israel oppressed by Jabin, v. 2, 3. III. Israel judged by Deborah, v. 4, 5. IV. Israel rescued out of the hands of Jabin. 1. Their design was concerted between Deborah and Barak, v. 6, 7, 8. It is accomplished by their joint agency. Barak takes the field; (v. 10.) Sisera, Jabin's general, meets him; (v. 12, 13.) Deborah encourages him, (v. 14.) and God gives him a complete victory. The army routed, v. 15, 16. The general forced to fly; (v. 17.) and there where he expected shelter, had his life stolen from him by Jael while he was asleep, (v. 18, 21.) which completes Barak's triumph, (v. 22.) and Israel's deliverance, v. 23, 24.

1. And the children of Israel again did evil in the sight of the Lord, when Ehud was dead. 2. And the Lord sold them into the hand of Jabin king of Canaan, that reigned in Hazor; the captain of whose host was Sisera, which dwelt in Haroshet of the Gentiles. 3. And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord; for he had nine hundred chariots of iron: and twenty years he mightily oppressed the children of Israel.

Here is,

I. Israel backsliding from God; They again did evil in his sight, forsook his service, and worshiped idols; for that was the sin which now most easily beset them, v. 1. See in this, 1. The strange strength of corruption, which hurries men into sin, notwithstanding the most frequent instances of its fatal consequences. The bent to backslide is very hardly restrained. 2. The common ill effects of a long period of land and rest eighty years, which they should have confirmed them in their religion; but, on the contrary, it made them secure and wanton, and indulgent of those lusts which the worship of the false gods was calculated for the gratification of. Thus the prosperity of fools destroys them. Jeshurun waxeth fat and kicketh. 3. The great loss which the people sustain by the death of good governors, They did evil, because Ehud was dead. 4. He kept the strong, restrained and punished every thing that looked towards idolatry, and kept them close to God's service. But when he was gone, they revolted, fearing him more than God.

II. Israel oppressed by their enemies. When they forsook God, he forsook them; and then they became an easy prey to every spoiler. They alienated themselves from God, as if he were none of their's; and then God alienated them as none of his.
They that threw themselves out of God's service, threw themselves out of his protection. What has my beloved do in my house, when she has thus played the harlot? Jer. 11. 15. He told them unto the hands of Jabin, v. 2. This Jabin reigned in Hazor, as another of the same name, and perhaps his ancestor, had done before him, whom Joshua routed, slew, and burnt his city, Josh. 11. 1, 10. But it seems, in process of time, the city was rebuilt, the power regained, the loss retrieved, and by degrees, the king of Hazor becomes able to tyrannize over Israel, who by sin had lost all their advantage against the Canaanites. This servitude was lighter than either of that former, and much more grievous. Jabin, and his general Sisera, did mightily oppress Israel. That which aggravated the oppression was, 1. That this enemy was nearer them than any of the former, in their borders, in their bowels; and by that means, had the more opportunity to do them a mischief. 2. That they were the natives of the country, who bore an incalculable enmity to them, for invading and dispossessing them; and when they had them in their power, would be so much the more cruel and mischievous toward them in revenge of the old quarrel. 3. That these Canaanites had, when time was, been conquered and subdued by Israel, were of old sentenced to be their servants, (Gen. 9. 23.) and might now have been under their feet, and utterly incapable of giving them any disturbance, if their slothfulness, cowardice, and unbelief, had not suffered them thus to get head. To be oppressed by those whom their fathers had conquered, and whom they themselves had foolishly spared, could not but be very grievous.

III. Israel returning to their God; They cried unto the Lord, when distress drove them to him; and they saw no other way of relief. Those that slight God in their prosperity, will find themselves under a necessity of seeking him when they are in trouble.

4. And Deborah a prophetess, the wife of Lapidoth, she judged Israel at that time. 5. And she dwelt under the palm-tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Beth-el in mount Ephraim; and the children of Israel came up to her for judgment. 6. And she sent and called Barak, the son of Abinoam, out of Kedesh-naphtali, and said unto him, Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded, saying, Go, and draw toward mount Tabor, and take with thee ten thousand men of the children of Naphtali and of the children of Zebulun? 7. And I will draw unto thee, to the river Kishon, Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army, with his chariots and his multitude; and I will deliver him into thine hand. 8. And Barak said unto her, If thou wilt go with me, then I will go; but if thou wilt not go with me, then I will not go. 9. And she said, I will surely go with thee: notwithstanding the journey that thou takest shall not be for thine honour; for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman. And Deborah arose, and went with Barak to Kedesh.

The year of the redeemed is at length come, when Israel was to be delivered out of the hands of Jabin, and restored again to their liberty; which, we may suppose, the northern tribes, that lay nearest the oppressor, and felt most the distress, did cry to God for. For the oppression of the poor, and the sighing of the needy, now will God arise. Now here we have,

I. The preparation of the people for their deliverance, by the prophetic conduct and government of Deborah, v. 4, 5. Her name signifies a bee; and she answered her name by her industry, sagacity, and great usefulness to the public, her sweetness to her friends, and a particular manner how. It is said to be the wife of Lapidoth: the termination is not commonly found in the name of a man; therefore some make it the name of a place, she was a woman of Lapidoth. Others take it apppellatively; Lapidoth signifies lamps. The rabbins say, she had employed herself in making wicks for the lamps of the tabernacle; and having stooped to that mean office for God, she was afterwards thus preferred. Or, she was a woman of illuminations, or of splendors: one that was extraordinary knowing and wise, and so came to be very eminent and illustrious. Concerning her we are here told, 1. That she was intimately acquainted with God: she was a prophetess; one that was instructed in divine knowledge by the immediate inspiration of the Spirit of God, and had gifts of wisdom, which she attained to not in an ordinary way; she had the word of God, that is, commands, revelations, or judgments of the Almighty. 2. That she was entirely devoted to the services of Israel. She judged Israel at the time that Jabin oppressed them; and perhaps, for being a woman, she was the more easily permitted by the oppressor to do it. She judged, not as a princess, by any civil authority conferred upon her, but as a prophetess, and as God's mouth to them, in directing subduing, and restraining the nations, especially those which related to the worship of God. The children of Israel came up to her from all parts for judgment, not so much for the deciding of controversies between man and man, as for advice in the reformation of what was amiss in things pertaining to God. Those among them, who before had secretly lamented the impieties and idolatries of their neighbours, but knew not where to apply themselves, and did the utmost to comfort themselves, now told their complaints to Deborah; who, by the sword of the Spirit, showing them the judgment of God, reduced and reclaimed many, and excited and animated the magistrates in their respective districts to put the laws in execution. It is said she dwelt, or, as some read it, sat under a palm-tree, called ever after, from her, the palm-tree of Deborah. Either she had her house under a tree, a mean habitation which would cover under a tree; or she had her judgment-seat in the open air, under the shadow of that tree; which was an emblem of the justice she sat there to administer, which will thrive and grow against opposition, as palms under pressure. Josephus says, that the children of Israel came to Deborah to desire her to pray to God for them, that they might be delivered out of the hand of Jabin: and Samuel is said at one particular time, when he judged Israel in Mizpeh, that is, to bring them back again to God, when they made the same address to him upon a like occasion, 1 Sam. 7. 6, 8.

II. The project laid for their deliverance. When the children of Israel came to her for judgment, with her they found salvation. So they that seek to God for grace, shall have grace and peace; grace and comfort, grace and glory. She was not herself to come, in person, being a woman, but she nomination one that was fit, Barak of Naphtali, who, it is probable, had already signalized himself in some encounters with the forces of the oppressor, living near him, (for Hazor and Harosheth lay within the lot of that tribe;) and thereby had gained a reputation and interest among his people. Some struggles, we may suppose, that brave man had used toward the shaking off of the yoke, but could not effect it till he had his commission and in strength from Deborah. He could do nothing without her head, nor she without his hands; but both together made a complete deliverer, and effected a complete deliverance. The greatest and best army in the world, in one situation, but nothing, but nothing, but nothing. By God's direction, she orders Barak to raise an army, and engage Jabin's forces, that were under Sisera's command, v. 6, 7. Barak, it may be, had been meditating some great attempt against the common enemy; a spark of generous fire was glowing in his breast, and fan he would do something to the purpose for his people, and for the cities of his God. But two things discouraged him: (1.) He wanted a commission to levy forces; therefore Deborah here gives him under the broad seal of heaven; which, as a prophetess, she had a warrant to affix to it. "Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded it? Yes, cert inly he has, take my word for it." Some think she intends this as an appeal to Barak's own heart: "Has not God, by a secret whisper to thyself, given thee some intimation of his purpose, to make use of thee as an instrument in his hand to save Israel? Hath thou for some reason kept it back and upon thyself?" If so, the spirit of prophecy in Deborah confirms the spirit of a soldier in Barak; Go and draw toward mount Tabor. [1.] She directs him what number of men to raise, ten thousand; and let him not fear that those will be too few, when God hath said, he will by them save Israel. [2.] Whence he should raise them: only out of his own tribe, and that of Zebulun, next adjoining; those two counties shared the privilege of yielding an army to God, I and they had not to stay to go further. And, lastly, She orders him where to make his rendezvous; at mount Tabor, in his own neighbourhood. [2.] When he had an army raised, he knew not how he should have an opportunity of engaging the enemy, who, perhaps, declined fighting, having heard that Israel, if they had but courage enough to make head against the enemy, seldom failed of success. Well, says Deborah to him, "Be not afraid, the Lord will give Sisera and his army into thy hand." She assures him that the matter should be determined by one pitched battle, and should not be long in the doing. [1.] In mentioning the power of the enemy, Sisera, a celebrated General, bold and experienced, his chariots, his iron chariots, and his multitude of soldiers, she obliges Barak to fortify himself with the utmost degree of resolution; for the enemy he was to engage was a very formidable one. It is good to know the worst, that we may provide accordingly. But, [2.] In fixing the very place to which Sisera would draw his army, she gave him a sign, which might help to confirm his faith when he came to engage. It was a contingent thing, and depended upon Sisera's own will: but when afterward he should see that falling out just as Deborah had foretold, he might thence infer, that certainly in the rest she said she spoke under a divine direction, which would be a great encouragement to him, especially because with this, [3.] She gave him an express promise of success: I will (that is, God will, in whose name I speak) deliver them into thy hand. So when he saw them draw up against him, according to Deborah's word, he might be confident, that, according to her word, he should soon see them fallen before him. Observe, God draws them to him only that he might deliver them into his hand. When Sisera drew his forces together, he designed the destruction of Israel; but God gathered them as sheaves into the floor, for their own destruction, Mic. 4. 11, 12. Assemble yourselves, and ye shall be broken to pieces, Isa. 8. 9. See Rev. 19. 17, 18.

2. At Barak's request, she promises to go along with him to the field of battle. (1.) Barak insists much upon the necessity of her presence, which would be better to him than a concert of war; (v. 6.) "If thou wilt go with me to direct and advise me, and in every difficult case to let me know God's mind, then I will go with all my heart, and not fear the chariots of iron: neither will I be afraid." So admirably does this to be the language of a weak faith; he could not take her word, unless he had her with him in pawn, as it were, for performance. It seems rather to arise from a conviction of the necessity of God's presence and continual conduct, a pledge and earnest of which he would reckon Deborah's presence to be; and therefore begged thus earnestly for it. "If thou go not with me, in token of God's going with me, I will not go up hence." Nothing would be a greater satisfaction to him, than to have the prophetess with him to animate the soldiers, and to be consulted as an oracle upon all occasions. (2.) Deborah promised to go with him, v. 9. No toil nor peril shall discourage her from doing the utmost that becomes her to do for the service of her country. She would not send him where she would not go herself. Those that in God's name call others to their duty, should be very ready to assist them in it. Deborah was the weaker vessel, yet had the stronger faith. But though she agrees to go with Barak, if he insist upon it, she gives him a hint proper enough to move a soldier not to insist upon it. The journey thou undertakest (so confident was she of the success, that she calls his engaging in war but the undertaking of a journey) shall not be for thine honour; not so much for thine honour as if thou hadst gone alone, and without her; she would tell him, thou shalt not go further. And, lastly, She orders him where to make his rendezvous; at mount Tabor, in his own neighbourhood. (2.) When he had an army raised, he knew not how he should have an opportunity of engaging the enemy, who, perhaps, declined fighting, having heard that Israel, if they had but courage enough to make head against the enemy, seldom failed of success. Well, says Deborah, Be not afraid, the Lord will give Sisera and his army into thy hand." She assures him that the matter should be determined by one pitched battle, and should not be long in the doing. [1.] In mentioning the power of the enemy, Sisera, a celebrated General, bold and experienced, his chariots, his iron chariots, and his multitude of soldiers, she obliges Barak to fortify himself with the utmost degree of resolution; for the enemy he was to engage was a very formidable one. It is good to know the worst, that we may provide accordingly. But, [2.] In fixing the very place to which Sisera would draw his army, she gave him a sign, which might help to confirm his faith when he came to engage. It was a contingent thing, and depended upon Sisera's own will: but when afterward he should see that falling out just as Deborah had foretold, he might thence infer, that certainly in the rest she said she spoke under a divine direction, which would be a great encouragement to him, especially because with this, [3.] She gave him an express promise of success: I will (that is, God will, in whose name I speak) deliver them into thy hand. 10. And Barak called Zebulun and Naphtali to Kedesh; and he went up with ten thousand men at his feet: and Deborah went up with him. 11. Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, had severed himself from the Kenites, and pitched his tent unto the plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh. 12. And they showed Sisera that Barak, the son of Abinoam, was gone up to mount Tabor. 13. And Sisera gathered together all his chariots, even nine hundred chariots of iron, and all the people that were with him, from Harosheth of the Gentiles unto the river of Kishon. 14. And Deborah said unto Barak, Up; for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hand: is not the Lord gone out before thee? So Barak went down from mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him. 15. And the Lord discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host, with the edge of the sword, before Barak; so that Sisera lighted down off his chariot, and fled away on his feet. 16. But Barak pursued after the chariots, and after the host, unto Harosheth of the Gentiles: and all the host of Sisera fell upon the edge of the sword; and there was not a man left.

1. Barak beats up for volunteers, and soon has his quota of men ready, v. 10. Deborah had appointed him to raise an army of ten thousand men, (v. 6.) and so many he has presently at his feet, following him, and subject to his command. God is said to call us to his feet, (Isa. 41. 2.) that is into obedience to him. Some think it intimates that they were all footmen, and so the armies of the Jews generally were; which made the disproportion of strength between them and the enemy (who had horses and chariots) very great, and the victory still more illustrious; but the presence of God and his prophetess was abundantly sufficient to balance that disproportion. Barak had his men at his feet, which intimates their cheerfulness, and readiness to attend him, whithersoever he went, Rev. 14. 4. Though the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali were chiefly depended on, yet it appears, by Deborah's song, that there were some come in to him from other tribes, Manasseh and Issachar; and deserters expected that came not, from Reuben, Dan, and Asher, ch. 5. 14. 17. But these are overlooked here: and we are only told, that to make his ten thousand effective men indeed, Deborah went up with him. The 11th verse, concerning the remove of Heber, one of the families of the Kenites, out of the wilderness of Judah, in the south, where those families had fixed themselves, (ch. 1. 16.) into the northern country, comes in for the sake of what was to follow concerning the exploit of Jael, a wife of that family.

II. Sisera, upon the notice of Barak's motions, takes the field with a very numerous and powerful army, v. 12. 13. They showed Sisera, that is, it was showed him. Yet some think it refers to the Kenites, mentioned immediately before, v. 11. They gave Sisera notice of Barak's rendezvous, there being peace at this time between Jabin and that family, v. 17. Whether they intended it as a kindness to him or no, it served to accomplish what God had said by Deborah, (v. 7.) I will draw unto thee Sisera. Sisera's confidence was chiefly in his chariots; therefore particular notice is taken of them, nine hundred chariots of iron, which, with the scythes fastened to their axle-axes, when they were driven into an army of footmen, did terrible execution. So ingenious have men been in inventing methods of destroying one another, to gratify those lusts from which come wars and fightings.

III. Deborah gives orders to engage the enemy, v. 14. Josephus says, that when Barak saw Sisa-ra's army drawn up, and attempting to surround the mountain, on the top of which he and his forces lay encamped, his heart quite failed him, and he determined to retire to a place of greater safety; but Deborah animated him to maintain his ground, assuring him that this was the day marked out in the divine counsels for his defeat. Now they appear most threatening, they are ripe for ruin. The thing is as sure to be done, as if it were done already: The Lord hath delivered Sisera into thy hand. See how the work and honour of this great action are divided between Deborah and Barak; she, as the head, gives the word, he, as the hand, does the work. Thus doth God dispense his gifts variously, 1 Cor. 12. 4, &c. But though ordinarily the head of the woman is the man, (1 Cor. 11. 2.) he that has the residue of the Spirit was pleased to cross hands, and to put the head upon the woman's shoulders, choosing to withdraw the things of the world to shame the mighty, that no flesh might glory in his presence. It was well for Barak that he had Deborah with him; for she made up what was defective, 1. In his conduct, by telling him, This is the day. 2. In his courage, by assuring him of God's presence; Is not the Lord gone out before thee? Darest not thou follow, when thou hast God himself for thy Leader? Note, (1.) In every undertaking it is good to be sensible that God goes before us, that we are in the way of our duty, and in his direction. (2.) If we have ground to hope that God goes before us, we ought to go on with courage and cheerfulness. Be not dismayed at the difficulties thou meetest with in resisting Satan, in serving God, or suffering for him; for is not the Lord gone out before thee? Follow him fully then.

IV. God himself routs the enemy's army, v. 15. Barak, in obedience to Deborah's orders, went down into the valley, though there upon their way the iron chariots would have so much the more advantage against him, quitting his fastness upon the mountain in dependence upon the divine power: for in vain is salvation hoped for from hills and mountains; in the Lord alone is the salvation of his people, Jer. 3. 23. And he was not deceived in his confidence; The Lord discomfited Sisera. It was not so much the bold and surprising alarm which Barak gave their camp, that dispirited and dispersed them, but God's terror seized their spirits, and put them into an unaccountable confusion. The stars, it seems, fought against them, ch. 5. 20. Josephus says, that a violent storm of hail, which beat in their faces, gave them this rout, disabled them and drove them back; so that they became a very easy prey to the army of Israel: and Deborah's words were made good; "The Lord has delivered them into thy hand; it is now in thy power to do what thou wilt with them."

V. Barak bravely improves his advantage, follows the blow with an undaunted resolution and an unwearied diligence, prosecutes the victory, and pursues the scattered forces, even to their general's head quarters at Harosheth, (v. 16.) and spares none whom God had delivered into his hand to be destroyed; There was not a more left. When God goes before us in our spiritual conflicts we must be stir ourselves; and when by his grace he gives us some success against the enemies of our souls, we must improve it by watchfulness and resolution, and carry on the holy war with vigour.

17. Howbeit, Sisera fled away on his feet to the tent of Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite: for there was peace between Jabin the king of Hazor and the house of Heber the Kenite. 18. And Jael went out to meet Sisera, and said unto him, Turn in my lord, turn in to me; fear not: and when he had turned in unto her the tent, she covered him with a mantle. 19. And he said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink; for I am thirsty: and she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink, and covered him. 20. Again he said unto her, Stand in the door of the tent; and it shall be, when any man doth come and inquire of thee, and say, Is there any man here that thou shalt say, No. 21. Then Jael, Heber's wife, took a nail of the tent, and took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples, and fastened it into the ground; (for he was fast asleep, and weary:) so he died. 22. And, behold, as Barak pursued Sisera, Jael came out to meet him, and said unto him, Come, and I will show thee the man whom thou seest. And when he came into her tent, behold, Sisera lay dead, and the nail was in his temples. 23. So God subdued on that day Jabin the king of Canaan before the children of Israel. 24. And the hand of the children of Israel prospered, and prevailed against Jabin the king of Canaan, until they had destroyed Jabin king of Canaan.

We have seen the army of the Canaanites totally routed. It is said, Ps. 83. 9, 10. (where the defeat of this army is pleaded as a precedent for God's doing the like in aftertimes,) that they became as dung for the earth. Now here we have,

1. The fall of their general, Sisera, captain of the host, in whom it is likely, Jabin their king put an entire confidence, and therefore was not himself present in the action. Let us trace the steps of this mighty man's fall.

1. He quitted his chariot, and took to his feet, v. 15, 17. His chariots had been his pride and his confidence; and we may suppose he had therefore left them in the charge of the soldiers, because they were all on foot, and had neither chariot nor horse, as he had; justly therefore is he thus made ashamed of his confidence, and forced to quit it, and thinks himself then most safe and easy, when he is got clear of his chariot, though we may well suppose it the best made, and best drawn, of any of them. Thus are they disappointed who rest on the creature; like a broken reed, it not only breaks under them, but runs into their hand, and pierces them more than before. The idol may quickly become a burthen; (Isa. 46. 1.) and what we were for God, can make us sick of. How sneakingly doth Sisera look, now he is dismayed. It is hard to say whether he blusters or trembles more. Put not your trust in princes, if they may so soon be brought to this; if he who but lately trusted to his arms with so much assurance, must now trust to his heels only with so little.

2. He fled for shelter in the tents of the Kenites, having no strong hold, nor any place of his own in reach to retire to. The mean and solitary way of the Kenites' living perhaps, he had formerly despised and ridiculed, and the more, because religion was kept up among them; yet now he is glad to put himself under the protection of one of these tents: well he chooses the wife's tent or apartment, either because his fear and distress occasioned it, or because it happened to be next to him, and the first he came to, v. 17. And that which encouraged him to go thither, was, that at this time there was peace between his master and the house of Heber: not that there was any league offensive and defensive between them, only at present there was no indications of hostility. Jabin did them no harm, did not oppress them as he did the Israelites; their plain, quiet harmless way of living, making them not suspected or feared: and perhaps God so ordering it, as a recompense for their constant adherence to the true religion. Sisera thought he might therefore be safe among them; not considering, that though they themselves suffered not by Jabin's power, they heartily sympathized with the Israel of God that did.

3. Jael invited him in, and bid him very welcome. Probably she stood at the tent door, to inquire what news from the army, and what the success of the battle was, which was fought not far off. (1.) She invited him in. Perhaps she stood waiting for an opportunity to show kindness to any distressed Israelites, since there should have been occasion for it; but seeing Sisera come in great haste, panting and out of breath, she invited him to come and repose himself in her tent; in which, while she seemed to design the relieving of his fatigue, perhaps she really intended the retarding of his flight that he might fall into the hands of Barak, who was now in a hot haste of him; (v. 18.) and it may well be questioned, whether she had at first any thought of taking away his life, but rather God afterwards put it into her heart. (2.) She made very much of him, and seemed mighty careful to have him easy, as her invited guest. Was he weary? she finds him a very convenient place to repose himself in, and recruit his strength. Was he thirsty? well he might. Did he want a little water to cool his tongue? the best liquors the tent afforded was at his service, and that was milk, (v. 18.) which we may suppose, he drank heartily of, with his repose, because he was now so far better disposed to sleep. Was he cold or afraid of catching cold; or did he desire to be hid from the pursuers, if they should search that tent? she covered him with a mantle, v. 18. * All expressions of care for his safety. Only, when he desired her to tell a lie for him, and to say he was not there, she declined making any such promise, v. 20. We must not sin against God, no not to oblige those we would save. We may have another interest, but we must not prostitute our friendship. We must suppose she kept her tent as quiet as she could, and free from noise, that he might sleep the sooner and the faster. And how was Sisera least safe, when he was most secure. How uncertain and precarious is human life! and what assurance can we have of it, when it may so easily be betrayed by those with whom it is trusted; and they may prove its destroyers, who we hoped would have been its protectors! It is best making God our Friend, for he will not sell out on us.

4. When he lay fast asleep, she drove a long nail through his temple; so fastened his head to the ground, and killed him, v. 21. And though this was enough to do his business, yet to make sure work, (if we translate it right, ch. 5. 26.) she cut off his head, and left it nailed there. Whether she designed this or no when she invited him into her tent, does not appear; probably the thought was darted into her mind when she saw him lie so fair to receive such a fatal blow; and, doubtless, the thought brought with it evidence sufficient that it came not from Satan, as a murderer and destroyer, but from God, as righteous Judge and Avenger; so much of brightness and heavenly light did she perceive in the inducements to it that offered themselves, the honour of God, and the deliverance of Israel, and nothing more to her weakness, or her moral reverses. (1.) It was a divine power that enabled her to do it, and inspired her with a more than manly courage. What if her hand should shake, and she should miss her blow? What if he should awake when she was attempting it? Or suppose some of his own attendants should follow him, and surprise her in the fact, how dearly would she and all her's be made to pay for it. Yet, obtaining help of God, she does it effectually. [2.] It was a divine warrant that justified her in the doing of it; and therefore, since no such extraordinary commissions... can now be pretended, it ought not in any case to be imitated. The laws of friendship and hospitality must be religiously observed, and we must abhor the thought of betraying any where we have invited and encouraged to put a confidence in us. And as to this act of Jael's, (like that of Ehud's in the chapter before,) we have reason to think she was conscious of such a divine impulse upon her spirit to do it, as did abundantly satisfy herself (and it ought therefore to satisfy us) that it was well done. God's judgments are a great deep. The instrument of this execution was a nail of the tent, that is, one of the great pins with which the tent, or the stakes of it, were fastened. They often removed their tents; she had been used to drive these nails, and therefore knew how to do it the more dexterously on this great occasion. He that had thought to have destroyed Israel with his many iron chariots, is himself destroyed with one iron nail. Thus do the weak things of the world confound the mighty. See in the glory of Orr, and Sisera's shame. The great commander dies, (1.) In his sleep, fast asleep, and weary. It comes in as a reason why he stirred not to make any resistance. So fettered was he in the chains of sleep, that he could not find his hands. Thus the stout-hearted are spoiled at thy rebuke, O God of Jacob; they are cast into a deep sleep, and so are made to sleep their last, Ps. 76. 5, 6. Let not the strong man then glory in his strength; for when he sleepeth, how shall he think? It is weak, a child may insult him then, and steal his life from him; and yet if he sleep not, he is soon spent and weary, and can do nothing neither. These words which we here put in a parenthesis, (for he was weary,) all the ancient versions read otherwise: he struggled, (or started as we say,) and died; so the Syriac and Arabic Exiguntius seen mortua mentem et dedit; Herodotus. He was darkened and died; so the LXX. Cono- ciana morte soforem, so the vulgar Latin, joining sleep and death together, seeing they are so near akin. He fainted and died. He dies, [2.] With his head nailed to the ground, an emblem of his earthly-mindedness. O curve in terram animae! His car (says Bishop Hall) was fastened so close to the earth, as if his body had been listening what was bowing his head. His voice heeds not the laments of a woman. This added to the shame of his defeat before men; and had he but known it as Abimelech did, (ch. 9. 54.) we may well imagine how much it would have added to the vexation of his own heart.

II. Here is the glory and joy of Israel hereupon.

1. Barak their leader finds his enemy dead; (v. 22.) and very well pleased, no doubt, he was to find his work done so well to his hand, and so much to the glory of Orr, and the confusion of his enemies. Had he stood too nice upon a point of honour, he would have resented it as an affront to have the general slain by any hand but his; but now he remembered, that this diminution of his honour he was sentenced to undergo, for insisting on Debo- rah's going with them; The Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman; though then it was little thought the prediction would have been fulfilled in such a way as this.

2. Israel is completely delivered out of the hands of Jabin king of Canaan, v. 23, 24. They not only shook off his yoke by this day's victory, but they afterward prosecuted the war against him, till they had destroyed him, he and his nation being by divine appointment devoted to ruin, and not to be spared. The Israelites having soundly smitten for their sin, and doing it as far as it was in their power, to indulge them no longer, but to make a thorough riddance of them, as a people to whom to show mercy was as contrary to their own interest as it was to God's command; and prob-composing the song; and the strain throughout is very fine and lofty, the images lively, the expressions elegant, and an admirable spirit of seriousness and majesty. No poetry is comparable to the sacred poetry. And we may suppose she used her power as a princess, in obliging the conquering army of Israel to learn and sing this song. She expects not that they should, by their poems, celebrate her praises, and magnify her; but requires, that in that poem they should join with her in celebrating God's praises, and magnifying him. She had been the first wheel in the action, and now is so in the thanksgiving.

II. It was sung on that day, not the very day that the fight was, but on that occasion, and soon after, as soon as a thanksgiving day could conveniently be appointed. When we have received mercy from God, we ought to be speedily in our returns of praise, while the impressions of the mercy are fresh. It is rent to be paid at the day.

1. She begins with a general Hallelujah: Praise (or bless, for that is the word) ye the Lord, v. 2. The design of the song is to give glory to God; that therefore is put first, to explain and direct all that follows, like the first petition of the Lord's prayer, Hallowed be thy name. Two things God is here praised for; (1.) The vengeance he took on Israel's enemies, for the avenging of Israel upon their proud and cruel oppressors, recompensing to the good men injuries they had done to his people. The Lord is known as a righteous God, and the God to whom vengeance belongs, by the judgments which he executeth. (2.) The grace he gave to Israel's friends; when the people willingly offered themselves to serve in this war. God is to have the glory of all the good offices that are at any time done us; and the more willingly they are done, the more is to be observed of that grace, which will be the most effectual. For the things she resolves to leave this song upon record, to the honour of the everlasting God; (v. 3.) I even I will sing unto the Lord, Jehovah, that God of uncontestable sovereignty and irresistible power, even to the Lord God of Israel, who governs all for the good of the church.

2. She calls to the great ones of the world, that sit at the upper end of its table, to attend to her song, and hear her subject: Hear O ye kings, give ear, O ye princes. (1.) She would have them know, that as great and as high as they were, there is One above them with whom it is folly to contend, and to whom it is their interest to submit; that horses and chariots are vain things for safety. (2.) She would have them to join with her in praising the God of Israel, and no longer to praise their counterfeit deities, vs Belshazzar did; (Dan. 5. 4.) He praised the gods of gold and silver. She be-speaks them as the psalmist, (Ps. 2. 10, 11.) Be wise now therefore, O ye kings, serve the Lord with fear. (3.) She would have them take warning by Sisera's fate, and not dare to offer any injury to the people of God, whose cause, sooner or later, God will plead with jealousy.

3. She looks back upon God's former appearances, and compares this with them, the more to magnify the present mercy of God. Author of this great salvation. What God is doing, should bring to our mind what he has done; for he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; (v. 4.) Lord when thou wentest out of Seir. This may be understood, either, (1.) Of the appearances of God's power and justice against the enemies of Israel to subdue and conquer them; and so Hab. 3. 3, 4, &c. is parallel to it, where the destruction of the church's enemies is thus described. When God had led his people Israel from the country of Edom, he brought down under their feet Sihon and Og, striking them and their armies with such terror and amazement, that they seemed apprehensive that heaven and earth were coming together. Their hearts melted, as if all the world had been melting round about them. Or it denotes the glorious displays of the Divine Majesty, and the surprising efforts of the divine power, enough to make the earth tremble, the heavens drop like snow before the sun, and the mountains to melt. Compare Ps. 18. 7. God's counsels are so far from being hindered by any creature, that when the time of their accomplishment comes, that which seemed to stand in their way will not only yield before them, but be made to serve them. See Is. 64. 1, 2. Or, (2.) It is meant of the appearances of God's glory and majesty in Israel, when he gave them his law at mount Sinai. It was then literally true, the earth trembled, and the heavens dropped, &c. Compare Dext. 33. 2. Ps. 68. 7, 8. Let all the kings and princes know that this is the God whom Deborah praises, and not such mean and inpotent deities as they paid their homage to. The Chaldee par. phrase applies it to the giving of the law, but has a strange descent on these words, The mountains melted. Tabor, Heron, and Carmel, contended among themselves: one said, Let the divine majesty dwell upon me; the other said, Let it dwell upon me; but God made it to dwell upon mount Sinai, the meanest and least of all the mountains. I suppose it means the least valuable, because barren and rocky.

6. In the days of Shamgar the son of Anath, in the days of Jael, the highways were unoccupied, and the travellers walked through by-ways. 7. The inhabitants of the villages ceased, they ceased in Israel, until that I Deborah arose, that I arose a mother in Israel. 8. They chose new gods; then was war in the gates: was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand in Israel? 9. My heart is toward the governors of Israel, that offered themselves willingly among the people. Bless ye the Lord. 10. Speak, ye that ride on white asses, ye that sit in judgment, and walk by the way. 11. They that are delivered from the noise of archers in the places of drawing water, there shall they rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord, even the righteous acts toward the inhabitants of his villages in Israel: then shall the people of the Lord go down to the gates.

Here,

I. Deborah describes the distressed state of Israel under the tyranny of Jabin, that the greatness of their trouble might make their salvation appear the more illustrious, and the more gracious, v. 6. "From the days of Shamgar, who did nothing toward the deliverance of Israel from the Philistines, to the days of Jael, the present day, in which Jael has so signalized herself, the country has been in a manner desolate." 1. No trade. For want of soldiers to protect men of business in their business from the incursions of the enemy, and for want of magistrates to restrain and punish thieves and robbers among them, (men of broken fortunes and desperate spirits, that, having no employment, took to the high-road,) all commerce ceased, and the highways were unoccupied; no caravans of merchants, as formerly. 2. No travelling. Where in times when there was some order and govern ment, the travellers might be safe in the open roads, and the robbers were forced to lurk in the by-ways; now, on the contrary, the robbers insulted on the open road without check, and the honest travellers were obliged to sculk, and walk through by-ways, in continual frights. 3. No tillage. The fields must needs be laid waste and unoccupied, when the inhabitants of the villages, the country-farmers, ceased from their employment, quitted their houses which were continually alarmed and plundered, and were obliged to take shelter for themselves and their families in walled and fenced cities. 4. No administration of justice. These was war in the gates where their courts were kept, v. 8. So that it was not till this salvation was wrought, that the people of the Lord durst go down to the gates, v. 11. The continual incursions of the enemy deprived the magistrates of the dignity, and the people of the benefit, of their government. 5. No peace to him that went out, or to him that came in. The gates through which they passed and repassed, were infested by the enemy, so that the places of drawing water were alarmed by the archers—a mighty achievement for terrifying the drawers of water. 6. Neither arms nor spirit to help themselves with, but a shield nor spear among forty thousand, v. 8. Either they were disarmed by their oppressors, or they themselves neglected the art of war; so that though they had spears and shields, they were not to be seen, but when they were enured to the necessity of self-reliance, lost all skill and capacity to use them.

II. She shows in one word what it was that brought all this misery upon them; They chose new gods, v. 8. It was their idolatry that provoked God to give them up thus into the hands of their enemies. The Lord their God was one Lord, but that would not content them, they must have more, many more, still more. Their God was the God of our fathers, in these olden days, still the same, and therefore they grew weary of him, and must needs have new gods, which they were fond of as children of new clothes; names newly invented, heroes newly canonized. Their fathers, when put to their choice, chose the Lord for their God, (Josh. 24. 21.) but they would not abide by that choice, they must have gods of their own choosing.

III. She takes notice of God's great goodness to Israel, in raising up such as should redress their grievances. Herself first; (v. 7.) Till that I Debo-arah arose, to restrain and punish those who disturbed the public peace, and protect men in their business; and then the face of things was changed for the better quickly; those beasts of prey retired upon the breaking forth of this joyful light, and man went forth again to his work and labour, Ps. 104. 22, 23. Thus she became a mother in Israel, and no doubt exerted the utmost influence she could to her people, and such the care and pains she took for the public welfare. Under her there were other governors of Israel, (v. 9.) who, like her, had done their part as governors to reform the people, and then, like her, offered themselves willingly to serve in the war, not insisting upon the exemption which their dignity and office entitled them to; nor seeking to appear as men from another class, appearing in their country's cause; and, no doubt, the example of the governors influenced the people in like manner, willing to offer themselves, v. 2. Of these governors she says, My heart is toward them; that is, 'I truly love and honour them, they have won my heart for ever, I shall never forget them. Note, Those are worthy of double honour, that receive voluntarily from the demands of their honour to serve God and his church.

IV. She calls upon those who had a particular share in the advantages of this great salvation, to offer up particular thanks to God for it, v. 10, 11. Let every man speak as he found the goodness of God in this happy change of the posture of public affairs. 1. Ye that ride on white asses, that is, the nobility and gentry. Horses were little used in that country, they had, it is probable, a much better breed of asses than we have; but persons of quality, it seems, were distinguished by the colour of the asses they rode on, the white being more rare, were therefore more valued. Notice is taken of Abdon's sons and grandsons riding on ass-carts, as indicating them to be men of distinction, ch. 12. 2. Let such as arc by this salvation restored, not only to their liberty as other, but to their dignity, speak God's praises. 2. Let them that sit in judgment be sensible of it, and thankful for it as a very great mercy, that they may sit safely there; that the sword of justice is not struck out of their hand by the sword of war. 3. Let them that walk by the way, and meet with none there to make them afraid, speak to themselves in pious meditations, and to their fellow-travellers in religious discourses of the goodness of God in ridding the roads of these banditti that had so long infested them. 4. Let them that draw water in peace and have not their well taken from them, or stopped up, nor are in danger of being caught by the enemy when they go forth to draw there where they find themselves so much more safe and easy than they have been, therefore let them set the example of peace to all those Abdon's acts, or Barak's, but the Lord's, taking notice of his hand making peace in our borders, and creating a defence upon all the glory. This is the Lord's doing. Observe in these acts of his, (1.) Justice executed on his daring enemies. They are the righteous acts of the Lord. See him pleading a righteous cause, and in the throne judging aright, and give him glory as the Judge of all the earth. (2.) Kindness showed to his trembling people; the inhabitants of the villages, who lay most open to the enemy, had suffered most, and were in most danger, Ezek. 38. 11. It is the glory of God to protect those that are most exposed, and to help the weakest. Let us all take notice of the share we in particular have in the public peace and tranquillity, the inhabitants of the villages especially, and give God the praise of it.

12. Awake, awake, Deborah; awake, awake; utter a song: arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam.

13. Then he made him that remaineth have dominion over the nobles among the people: the Lord made me have dominion over the mighty. 14. Out of Ephraim was there a root of them against Amalek; after thee, Benjamin, among thy people: out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that handled the pen of the writer. 15. And the princes of Issachar were with Deborah; even Issachar, and also Barak: he was sent on foot into the valley. For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart. 16. Why abdost thou among the sheep-folds, to hear the bleatings of the flocks? For the divisions of Reuben there were great searchings of heart. 17. Gilead abode beyond Jordan: and why did Dan remain in ships? Asher continued on the sea-shore, and abode in his breaches. 18. Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that jeopardized their lives unto the death in the high places of the field. 19. The kings came and fought; then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo; they took no gain of money. 20. They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera. 21. The river of Kishon swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon. O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength. 22. Then were the horse-hoofs broken by the means of the prancings, the prancings of their mighty ones. 23. Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the Lord; curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

Here, I. Deborah stirs up herself and Barak to celebrate this victory in the most solemn manner, to the glory of God and the honour of Israel, for the crown, and in-crease of his kingdom, and the utter destruction of their enemies. v. 12. Deborah, as a prophetess, must do it by a song, to compose and sing which, she excites herself, Awake, awake; and again, Awake, awake. Which intimates the sense she had of the excellency and difficulty of the work: it needed and well deserved the utmost liveliness and vigour of soul in the performance of it; all the powers and faculties of the soul in their closest attention and application ought to be employed in it. Thus too she expresses the sense she had of her own infirmity, and aptness to flag, and renit in her zeal in this work. Note, Praising God is work that we should awake to, and awake ourselves to, Ps. 108. 2. 2. Barak, as a general, must do it by a triumph; Lead thy captivity captive. Though the army of Sisera was cut off in the field, and no quarter given, yet we may suppose in the prosecution of the victory, when the war was carried into the enemy's country, many not found in arms were seized and made prisoners of war; these she would have led in chains after Barak, when he made his public entry into his own city to grace his triumphs; not as if it should be any pleasure to him to trample upon his fellow-creatures, but thus he must give glory to God, and serve that good purpose of his government, which is to look upon those that are proud, and to abase them. II. She gives good reason for this praise and triumph, v. 13. This glorious victory had made the remnant of Israel, and Deborah in particular, look very great; a circumstance which they owed entirely to God. 1. The Israelites became few and inconsiderable, and yet to them God gave dominion over nobles. Many of them were cut off by the enemy, many died of grief, and perhaps some had removed their families and effects into foreign parts; yet those few that remained, by divine assistance, with one brave and generous effort, not only shook off the yoke of oppression from their own neck, but got power over their oppressors. As long as any of God's Israel remain, (and a remnant God will have in the worst of times,) there is hope, be it ever so small a remnant, for God can make him that remains, though it should be but one single person, triumph over the most proud and potent. 2. Deborah was herself of the weaker sex, and the sex that from the fall had been sentenced to subjection, and yet the Lord that is himself higher than the highest, authorized her to rule over the mighty men of Israel, who willingly submitted to her conduct: and enabled her to triumph over the mighty men of Canaan, who fell before the army she commanded; so wonderfully did he advance the low estate of his handmaid, "The Lord made me, a woman, have dominion over mighty men." A despised stone is made head of the 12. Israel had no king, their enemies had many, whose power and influence, especially acting in confederacy, made them very formidable; and yet Israel, having the Lord for their Kings, was too hard for them all. It is said of these Kings, They took no gain of money; they were not necessary troops hired into the service of Jabin, (such often fail in an extremity,) but they were all volunteers, and hearty in the cause against Israel: they desired the spoils of victory, and were satisfied with the sinner's satisfaction of helping to ruin Israel. Acting upon this principle, they were the more formidable, and would be the more cruel. 2. Who fought for them. The several tribes that assisted in this great exploit, here are spoken of with honour; for though God is chiefly to be glorified, instruments must have their due praise, for the encouragement of others: but, after all, it was heaven that turned the scale. (1.) Ephraim and Benjamin, those tribes among whom Deborah herself lived, bestowed themselves, and did bravely, by her influence upon them; for her palm-tree was in the tribe of Ephraim, and very near to that of Benjamin, v. 14. Out of Ephraim, was there a root, and life in the root, against Amalek. There was in Ephraim a mountain called the mount of Amalek, (mentioned, ch. 12. 13.) and some think this is here meant, and the Chaldee is done in appearing for the common cause. If we be not so bold as to lead, yet we must not be so proud and sullen as not to follow even our inferiors in a good work. Ephraim was at a distance from the place of action, and therefore could not send forth many of its boughs to the service; but Deborah, who was one of them, knew there was a root of them, that they were hearty well-wishers to the cause. Dr. Lightfoot gives quite another sense of this; Joshua of Ephraim, had been a root of such victories against Amalek, (Exod. 17.) and Ehud of Benjamin lately against Amalek and Moab.

(2.) The ice being broken by Ephraim and Benjamin, Machir (the half tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan) and Zebulun sent in men that were very serviceable to this great design. When an army is to be raised, especially under such disadvantages as were occasioned by the long absence of arms, and the dispiritedness of the people, it is of great consequence to be furnished, [1.] With men of courage for officers, and such the family of Machir furnished them with; for thence came down governors. The children of Machir were particularly famous for their valour in Moses's time, (Numb. 32. 89.) and, it seems, it continued in their family, the more because they were sent in the forefront. [2.] With men of learning and ingenuity to serve as secretaries of war, and with such they were supplied out of Zebulun; thence came men that handle the pen of the writer, clerks that issued out orders, wrote circular letters, drew commissions, mustered their men, and kept their accounts. Thus must every man, according as he has received the gift, minister the same, for the public good, 1 Pet. 4. 10. The eyes see, and the mouth delivereth him his food. He that is generally understood of the forwardness even of the scholars of this tribe, who studied the law and expounded it, to take up arms in this cause, though they were better skilful in books than in the art of war, so Sir Richard Blackmore paraphrases it,

The scribes of Zebulun and learned men, To wield the sword, laid down the pen.

(3.) Issachar did good service too; though he saw that rest was good, and therefore bowed his shoulder to bear, which is the character of that tribe, (Gen. 49. 15.) yet they disdained to bear the yoke of Jabin's tribute, and now preferred the generous toils of war a servile rest. Though it should seem there were no armies, yet they came out upon occasion, and the princes of Issachar were with Deborah and Barak, (v. 15.) probably, as a great council of war to advise upon emergencies. And it should seem, these princes of Issachar did in person accompany Barak into the field of battle. Did he go on foot? They footed it with him, not consulting their honour or ease. Did he go into the valley, the place of most danger? They exposed themselves with him, and were still at his right hand to advise him; for the men of Issachar were men that had understanding of the times, 1 Chron. 12. 32.

(4.) Zebulun and Naphtali were the most bold and active of all the tribes, not only out of a particular affection to Barak, their countryman, but because they lying nearest to Jabin, the yoke of oppression lay heavier on their necks than on any other tribe. But in the event of the campaign, therefore in a pious zeal for God and their country, they jeopardized their lives unto the death in the high places of the field, v. 18. With what heroic bravery did they charge and push on, even upon the chariots of iron, despising danger, and setting death itself at defiance in so good a cause.

(5.) The stars from heaven appeared, or acted as leaders, on Israel's side; (v. 20.) The stars in their courses, according to the order and direction of him who is the great Lord of their hosts, fought against Sisera, by their malignant influences; or by causing the storms of hail and thunder, which contributed so much to the rout of Sisera's army. The Chaldees reads it, From heaven, from the place where the stars go forth, war was waged against Sisera; that is, the power of the God of heaven was engaged against him, making use of the ministration of the angels of heaven. Some way or other, the heavenly bodies (not arrested, as when the sun stood still at Joshua's word, but going on in their courses) fought against Sisera. Those whom God is an enemy to, the whole creation is at war with. Perhaps the flashes of lightening by which the stars fought, was that which struck and vanquished Sisera, as that they pranced till their very hors were broken; (v. 22.) and, probably, overturned the chariots of iron which they drew, or turned them back upon their owners.

(6.) The river of Kishon fought against their enemies. It swept them away, and abundance of them that hoped to make their escape through it, v. 21. Ordinarily, it was but a shallow river, but being in their own country, we may suppose they well knew its fors and safest passages, and yet, now, probably by the great rain that fell, it was so swollen, and the stream so deep and strong, that those that attempted to pass it, were drowned, being feeble and faint, and unable to make their way through it. And then were the horse hoofs broken by means of the pittugings. So it is in the margin, v. 22. The river of Kishon fought against Sisera, was described or celebrated by ancient historians or poets; or rather, because it was designed of old, in the council of God, to serve his purposes against Sisera at this time, and did so, as if it had been made on purpose; thus the water of the old pool, God is said to have fashioned long ago, for that use to which it was put, Isa. 22. 11.

(7.) Deborah's own soul fought against them; she speaks of it down, however, not as a sign of weakness, (v. 22.) Say, thou hast trodden down strength. She did it by exciting others to do it, and assisting them, which she did with all her heart; also by her prayers. As Moses conquered Amalek by lifting up his hand, so Deborah vanquished Sisera by lifting up her heart. And when the soul is employed in holy exercises, and heart-work is made of them, through the grace of God, the strength of our spiritual enemies will be broken, v. 32. 3. In this great engagement, she observes who stood neuter, and did not side with Israel, as might have been expected. It is strange to find how many, even of those who were called Israelites, basely deserted this glorious cause, and declined to appear. No mention is made of Judah or Simeon among the tribes concerned, because they lying so very remote from the scene of action, had not an opportunity, therefore it was not expected from them; but for those that lay near, and yet would not venture, indelible marks of disgrace are here put upon them, and they deserved it.

(1.) Reuben basely declined the service, v. 15. 16. Justly had he long ago been deprived of the privileges of the birth-right, and still does his dying father's doom stick by him, unstable as water, he shall not exalt himself; (v. 16.) Two things hindered them from entering in: [1.] Their divisions. This jarring-string she twice strikes upon to their shame. For the divisions of Reuben (or in these divisions) there were great thoughts, impressions, and searchings of heart. Not only for their division from Canaan by the river Jordan, that needed not have hindered them, had they been hearty in the cause; for Gilead abode beyond Jordan, and yet from Machir of Gilgal they came, without the least difficulty. Yet this means, either that they were divided among themselves, could not agree who should go, or who should lead; each striving to gain the post of honour, and shun that of danger; some unhappy contests in their tribe kept them from uniting together, and with their brethren.
This city of Meroz seems to have been at this time a considerable place, since something great was expected from it; but, probably, after the Angel of the Lord had pronounced this curse upon it, it dwindled, and like the fig-tree which Christ cursed, withered away, so that we never read of it after this in the scripture.

24. Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent. 25. He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish. 26. She put her hand to the nail, and her right hand to the workman's hammer; and with the hammer she smote Sisera; she smote off his head, when she had pierced and stricken through his temples. 27. At her feet he bowed, he fell; he lay down: at her feet he bowed, he fell; where he bowed, there he fell down dead. 28. The mother of Sisera looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming? why tarry the wheels of his chariots? 29. Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she returned answer to herself, Have they not sped? have they not divided the prey; to every man a daughter of two to Sisera a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needle-work, of divers colours of needle-work on both sides, meet for the necks of them that take the spoil? 30. So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord: but let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might. And the land had rest forty years.

I. With the praise of Jael, her sister- heroine, whose valiant act had completed and crowned the victory. She had mentioned her before, (v. 6,) as one that would have served her country if it had been in her power; now she applauds her as one that did serve it admirably well when it was in her power.

Her poetry is finest and most florid here in the latter end of the song. How honorably does she speak of Jael, (v. 24,) who preferred her peace with the God of Israel, before her peace with the king of Canaan; and though not a native of Israel, (for aught that appears,) yet heartily espoused the cause of Israel in this critical juncture, jeopardized her life as truly as if she had been in the high places of the field, and bravely fought for those whom she saw God fought for! 24. Blessed shall she be above women in the tent. Note, Those whose lot is cast in the tent, in a very low and narrow sphere of activity, if they serve God in that according to their capacity, shall in no wise lose their reward. Jael in the tent wins as rich a blessing as Barak in the field.

Nothing is more confounding, grievous, and shameful, than disappointment; and Deborah here does most elegantly describe two great disappointments, the shame of which was typical of sinners' everlasting shame.

1. Sisera found a fatal enemy, where he expected a fast and faithful friend. (1.) Jael showed him the kindness of a friend, and perhaps at that time intended no other than kindness, until God, by an immediate impulse upon her mind, (which impulses then were to be regarded, and carried so much of their own evidence with them, that they might have been relied upon, but cannot now be pretended to,) directed her to do otherwise, v. 25. He asked only for fair water to quench his thirst, but she, not only to show her housewifery and good housekeeping, but to express her regard to him, brought forth butter, and milk, (say some interpreters,) milk which had the butter taken from it; we call it butter-milk. No, (say others,) it was milk that had the butter still in it; we call it cream: whichever it was, it was, probably, the best her house afforded; and, to set it off, she brought it in a lordly dish, such as she called so, the finest she had, and better than she ordinarily used at her own table. This confirmed Sisera's opinion of her friendship, and made him sleep the faster and the more secure. But (2.) She proved her mortal enemy; gave him his death's stroke; it is curiously described, v. 26, 27. [1.] How great does Jacl look hammering Sisera, as it is in the margin, railing that proud man, that had been so long the terror of the mighty, and sending him down slain to the pit with his iniquities upon his bones! Ezek. 32. 27. Sisera, not upon his table, with all the motion of his concern, than if she had been going to nail one of the boards or bars of her tent, so confident was she of divine aid and protection. We read it, she smote off his head, probably with his own sword, which, now that his head was nailed through, she durst take from his side, but not before, for fear of waking him. But because there was no occasion for cutting off his head, nor was it mentioned in the history, many think it should be read, She struck through his head. That head which had been proudly lifted up against God and Israel, and in which had been forged bloody designs for the destruction of God's people, Jacl finds a soft place in and into that with a good will strikes her nail. [2.] How mean does Sisera look, fallen at Jacl's feet? v. 27. At the feet of this female executioner, he bowed, he fell; all his struggles for life availed not; she followed her blow until he fell down dead. There lies extended the deserted carcass of that proud man, not in the bed of honour, not in the high places of the field, not having any glorious wound to show from a glittering sword, or a bow of steel, but in a corner of a tent, at the feet of a woman with a disgraceful wound by a sorrow nail stuck through his head. Thus is shame the fate of proud men. And it is a very lively representation of the ruin of those sinners whose prosperity slavish them, it flatters and caresses them with milk and butter in a lordly dish, as if it would make them easy and happy, but it nails their heads and hearts to the ground in earthy-mindedness, and pierces them through with many sorrows; its flatteries are fatal, and sinks them at last into destruction and perdition, 1 Tim. 6. 9, 10.

2. Sisera's mother and the tidings brought her of her son's fall and ruin, then when she was big with expectation of his glorious and triumphant return, n. 28...30. where we have, (1.) Her fond desire to see her son come back in triumph. Why is his chariot so long in coming? She speaks this, not so much out of a concern for his safety, or any jealousy of his having miscarried, (she had no fear of that, so confident was she of his success,) but out of a longing for his glory, which with a feminine weakness she expresses not only by a desire, but by an exclamation, the lingering chariot, and expostulating concerning the delays of it, little thinking that her unhappy son had been, before this, forced to quit that chariot which they were so proud of, and which she thought came so slowly. The chariots of his glory were now become the shame of his house, Isa. 22. 18. Let us take heed of indulging such desires as these toward any temporal good thing, particularly toward that which cherishes vain glory, for that was it she here doted on. Eagerness and impatience in our desires do us a great deal of prejudice, and make it intolerable to us to be crossed. But toward the spiritual blessings of which we are here shown, the day of our deliverance, and our happiness, our concern should be, not to hasten the day, but to make it stand a little affected: Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly; for here we cannot be disappointed. (2.) Her foolish hope and confidence that he would come at last in so much the greater pomp. Her wise ladies answered her, and thought they gave a very good account of the delay; yea, she (in her wisdom, says the Chaldee) tammingly made answer to herself, "Have they not seed? No doubt they have, (in the sense of John 3. 16,) and that delays them is that they are dividing the prey; which is so much, that it is a work of time to make a distribution of it." In the spoil they please themselves with the thought of, observe, [1.] How impudently, and to the reproach and scandal of their sex, these ladies boast of the multitude of damsels which the soldiers would have the abusing of. [2.] How childishly they please themselves with the hope of seeing Sisera, and making his spoil a thing of ridicule, how charmingly would it look! of divers colours of needle-work, plundered out of the wardrobe of some Israelish lady: it is repeated again, as that which pleased their fancy above any thing, of divers colours of needle-work on both sides, and therefore very rich; such pieces of embroidery they hoped Sisera would have to present his mother and the ladies with. Thus apt are we to deceive ourselves with great expectations, and confident hopes of honor and pleasure, and wealth in this world, by which we prepare for ourselves the shame and grief of a disappointment. And thus does God often bring ruin on his enemies when they are most elevated.

II. She concludes all with a prayer to God, 1. For the destruction of all his foes: "So, so shamefully, so miserably, let all thine enemies perish, O Lord; let all that hope to triumph in Israel's ruin, be thus disappointed and triumphed over; Do to them all as unto Sisera," Ps. 83. 9. Though our enemies are to be prayed for, God's enemies, as such, are to be prayed against; and when we see some of God's enemies remarkably humbled and brought down, that is an encouragement to us to pray for the downfall of all the rest. Deborah was a prophetess, and this prayer was a prediction that in due time all God's enemies shall perish, Ps. 92. 9. None ever hardened his heart and prospered. 2. For the exaltation and comfort of all his friends. "But let them that love him, and, heartily wish well to his kingdom among men, be as the sun when he goeth forth in his strength; let them shine so bright, appear so glorious in the eye of the world, cast such benign influences, be as much out of the reach of their enemies, who curse the rising sun because it scorches them; let them rejoice as a strong man to run a race," Ps. 19. 5. Let them, as burning and shining lights in their places, dispel the mists of darkness, and shine with more and more lustre and power unto the perfect day," Prov. 4. 18. Such shall be the honour, and such the joy, of all that love God in sincerity, and for ever they shall shine as the sun in the firmament of our Father.

The victory here celebrated with this song, was of such happy consequence to Israel, that for the best part of the next century they enjoyed the peace where it opened the way; The land had rest forty years; that is, so long it was from this victory to the raising up of Gideon. And well had it been, if, when the churches and the tribes had rest, they had been edified, and had walked in the fear of the Lord.
CHAP. VI.

Nothing that occurred in the quiet and peacable times of Israel is recorded: the forty years' rest after the conquest of Jabin is passed over in silence, and here begins the story of another distress, and another deliverance by God, of the children of the judges. Here is, 1. The lamentable condition of Israel, by the inroads of the Midianites, v. 1–6. 2. The message God sent them by a prophet, to prepare them for deliverance, v. 7–10. 3. The raising up of Gideon to be their deliverer. 4. A commission which God sent him by the hand of an angel, and confirmed by a sign, v. 11–24. 2. The first-fruits of his government in the reform of his father's house, v. 25–32. 3. The preparations he made for a war with the Midianites and the encouragement given him by a sign, v. 33–40.

1. AND the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and the Lord delivered them into the hand of Midian seven years. 2. And the hand of Midian prevailed against Israel: and because of the Midianites the children of Israel made them the dens which are in the mountains, and caves, and strong holds. 3. And so it was, when Israel had sown, that the Midianites came up, and the Amalekites, and the children of the east, even they came up against them; 4. And they encamped against them, and destroyed the increase of the earth, till thou come unto Gaza; and left no sustenance for Israel, neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass. 5. For they came up with their cattle, and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers for multitude: for both they and their camels were without number; and they entered into the land to destroy it. 6. And Israel was greatly impoverished because of the Midianites; and the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.

We have here,
I. Israel's sin renewed; They did evil in the sight of the Lord, v. 1. The burnt child dreads the fire; yet this perversive unthinking people, that had so often smarled solely for their idolatry, upon a little respite of God's judgments, return to it again. This people hath a revolting, rebellious heart, not kept in by the terror of God's judgments, not engaged in honour and gratitude by the great things he had done for them, to keep themselves in his love. The providence of God will not change the hearts and lives of sinners.
II. Israel's troubles repeated. This would follow of course; let all that sin expect to suffer; with the froward God will show himself froward, (Ps. 18. 26.) and will walk contrary to these that walk contrary to him, Lev. 26. 21, 24. Now as to this trouble,
1. It arose from a very despicable enemy. God delivered them into the hand of Midian; (v. 1.) not Midian in the south where Jethro lived, but Midian in the east that joined to Moab, Numb. 22. 4. A people that all men despised as uncultivated, and unheeded; hence we read not here of any king, lord, general, that they had but the force with which they destroyed Israel, was an undisciplined mob; and, which made it the more grievous, they were a people that Israel had formerly subdued, and in a manner destroyed; (see Numb. 31. 7.) and yet by this time, (near two hundred years after,) the poor remain of them were so multiplied, and so magnified, that they were capable of being made a very severe scourge to Israel. Thus God had them to jealousy with those which were not a people, even a foolish nation, Deut. 32. 21. The meanest creature will serve to chastise those that have made the great Creator their enemy. And when those we are authorised to rule prove rebellious and disobedient to us, it concerns us to inquire whether we have not been so to our sovereign Ruler.
2. It proved to a very formidable height. (v. 2.) The hand of Midian prevailed, purely by their multitude. God had promised to increase Israel as the sand on the sea-shore; but their sin stopped their growth and diminished them, and then their enemies, though otherwise every way inferior to them, overpowered them with numbers. They came upon them as grasshoppers for multitude: (v. 5.) not in a regular army to engage them in the field, but in a confused swarm, to plunder the country, quarter themselves upon it, and enrich themselves with its spoils. Bands of robbers, and no better. And sinful Israel, being separated by sin from God, had not spirit to make head against them. Observe the wrethet havoc that these Midianites made with their bands of plunderers in Israel. Here is,
1. The Israelites imprisoned, or rather imprisoning themselves, in dens and caves, v. 2. This was owing purely to their own timorousness and faint-heartedness, that they would rather fly than fight; it was the effect of a guilty conscience which made them tremble at the shaking of a leaf, and the just punishment of their apostasy from the God who thus fought against them with those very terrors with which he would otherwise have fought for them; had it not been for this, we cannot but think the Israelites would have matched the foe, and been enough to make head against them: but the heart that departs from God is lost, not only to that which is good but to that which is great. Sin dispirits men, and makes them sneak into dens and caves. The day will come when chief captains and mighty men will call in vain to rocks and mountains to hide them.
2. The Israelites impoverished, greatly impoverished, (v. 6.) The Midianites and the other children of the east, that joined with them to live by spoil and rapine, as long as the Sabeans and Chaldeans did that plundered Job, free-booters, these made frequent incursions into the land of Canaan; that fruitful land was a great temptation to them; and that sloth and luxury into which the Israelites were sunk by forty years' rest, made them and their substance an easy prey to them. They came up against them, (v. 3.) pitched their camps among them, (v. 4.) and brought their cattle with them, particularly camels innumerable; (v. 5.) not a flying party, to make a sally upon them, and be gone presently, but they resolved to force their way, and penetrated through the heart of the country as far as Gaza, on the western side: (v. 4.) they let the Israelites alone to saw their ground, but toward harvest they came and seized all, and ate up and destroyed it, both grass and corn; and when they went away, took with them the sheep and oxen; so that, in short, they left no sustenance for Israel, except what was privately taken by the rightful owners into the dens and caves. Now here we may see, [1.] The justice of God in the punishment of their sin. They had neglected to honour God with their substance in tithes, and offerings, and had prepared the way for this evil. But now the grudge is served, and now God justly sends an enemy to take it away in the season thereof, Hos. 2. 8, 9. [2.] The consequence of God's departure from the people; when he goes, all good goes, and all mis-chiefs break in. When Israel kept in with God, they reaped what others sowed; (Jos. 24. 13. Ps. 105. 44.) but now that God had forsaken them, others reaped what they sowed. Let us take occasion from this, to bless God for our national peace and tranquility, that we eat the labour of our hands.

III. Israel's sense of God's hand revived at last. Seven years, a year after year, did the Midianites make these inroads upon them, each, we may suppose, worse than the other, (v. 1.) until, at last, all other succours failing, Israel cried unto the Lord; (v. 6.) for crying to Baal ruined them, and would not help them. When God judges he will overcome; and sinners shall be made either to bend or break before him.

7. And it came to pass, when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord because of the Midianites, 8. That the Lord sent a prophet unto the children of Israel, which said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought you up from Egypt, and brought you forth out of the house of bondage; 9. And I delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all that oppressed you, and drave them out from before you, and gave you their land: 10. And I said unto you, I am the Lord your God; fear not the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but ye have not obeyed my voice.

Observe here, 1. The cognizance God took of the cries of Israel, when at length they were directed toward him. Though in their prosperity they had neglected him, and made court to his rivals, and though they never looked toward him till they were driven to it by extremity, yet, upon their complaint and prayer, he intended relief for them. Thus would he show how ready he is to forgive, how swift he is to show mercy, and how inclinable to hear prayer, that sinners may be encouraged to return and repent, Ps. 103. 4.

II. The method God took of working deliverance for them. Before he sent an angel to raise them up a saviour, he sent a prophet to reprove them for sin, and to bring them to repentance, v. 8. This prophet is not named, but he was a man, a prophet, not an angel, as ch. 2 1. Whether this prophet took an opportunity of delivering his message to the children of Israel, when they were met together in a general assembly, at some solemn feast, or other great occasion, or whether he went from city to city, and from tribe to tribe, preaching to this purpose, is not certain; but his errand was to convince them of sin, that in their crying to the Lord they might confess that with sorrow and shame, and not spend their breath only in complaining of their trouble. They cried to God for a deliverer, and God caused a prophet to instruct them, and to make them ready for deliverance. Not without reason have reason to hope God is designing mercy for us, if we find he is by his grace preparing us for it. If to those that are sick he sends a messenger, an interpreter, by whom he shows unto man his righteousness, then is he gracious, and grants a recovery, Job 33. 23, 24. 2. The sending of prophets to a people, and the furnishing a land with faithful ministers, is a token for good, and an evidence that God has mercy in store for them. He thus turns to us him, and then causes his face to shine, Ps. 80. 19.

We have here the heads of the message which this prophet delivered in to Israel, in the name of the Lord.

(1.) He set before them the great things God had done for them; (v. 8, 9.) Thus saith the Lord God of Israel. They had worshipped the gods of the nations, as if they had no God of their own to worship, and therefore might choose whom they pleased; but they are here reminded of one whom they had forgotten, who was known by the title of the God of Israel, and to him they must return. They had turned to other gods, as if their own had been either incapable or unwilling to protect them, and therefore they are told what he did for their fathers, in whose loins they were, the benefit of which descended and still remained to this their ungrateful seed. [1.] He brought them out of Egypt, where otherwise they would have continued in perpetual poverty and slavery. [2.] He delivered them out of the hands of all that oppressed them; this is mentioned to intimate that the reason why they were not now delivered out of the hands of the oppressing Midianites, was, not for want of any power or good will in God, but because by their iniquity they had sold themselves, and God would not redeem them till they had repented and turned again. [3.] He put them in quiet possession of this good land; this not only aggravated their sin, and affixed the brand of base ingratitude to it, but it justified God, and cleared him from the blame upon the account of the trouble they were now in: they could not say he was unkind, for he had given all possible proofs of his design good for them; if ill befall them notwithstanding, they must thank themselves.

(2.) He shows the easiness and equity of God's demands and expectations from them; (v. 10.) "I am the Lord your God, to whom you lie under the highest obligations; fear not the gods of the Amorites;" that is, "do not worship them, nor show any respect to them; do not worship them for fear of their doing you any hurt, for what hurt can they do you while I am your God? Fear God, and you need not fear them." (3.) He charges them with rebellion against God, who had laid this injunction upon them; But ye have not obeyed my voice. The charge is short, but very comprehensive; this was the malignity of all their sin, it was disobedience to God; and therefore it was that brought these calamities upon them, under which they were now groaning, pursuant to the threatenings annexed to these commands. He intends hereby to bring them to repentance; and our repentance is then right and genuine, when the sinfulness of sin, as disobedience to God, is that in it, which we chiefly lament.

11. And there came an angel of the Lord, and sat under an oak which was in Ophrah, that pertained unto Joash the Abiezrite: and his son Gideon threshed wheat by the wine-press, to hide it from the Midianites. 12. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him, and said unto him, The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor. 13. And Gideon said unto him, Oh, my Lord, if the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? and where be all his miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, Did not the Lord bring us up from Egypt? but now the Lord hath forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites. 14. And the Lord looked upon him, and said, Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites: have not I sent thee? 15. And he said unto him, Oh, my Lord, where-\thwithstanding shall I save Israel? behold, my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house. 16. And the LORD said unto him, Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man. 17. And he said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, then show me a sign that thou talkest with me. 18. Depart not hence, I pray thee, until I come unto thee, and bring forth my present, and set it before thee. And he said, I will tarry until thou come again. 19. And Gideon went in, and made ready a kid, and unleavened cakes of an ephah of flour: the flesh he put in a basket, and he put the broth in a pot, and brought it out unto him under the oak, and presented it. 20. And the angel of God said unto him, Take the flesh and the unleavened cakes, and lay them upon this rock, and pour out the broth. And he did so. 21. Then the angel of the LORD put forth the end of the staff that was in his hand, and touched the flesh and the unleavened cakes; and there rose up fire out of the rock, and consumed the flesh and the unleavened cakes. Then the angel of the Lord departed out of his sight. 22. And when Gideon perceived that he was an angel of the Lord, Gideon said, Alas, O Lord God! for because I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face. 23. And the Lord said unto him, Peace be unto thee; fear not: thou shalt not die. 24. Then Gideon built an altar there unto the Lord, and called it Jnhovah-shalom: unto this day it is yet in Ophrah of the Abiezrites.

It is not said what effect the prophet's sermon had upon the people; but we may hope it had a good effect, and that some of them at least repented and reformed upon it; for here, immediately after, we have the dawning of the day of their deliverance, by the effectual calling of Gideon to take upon him the command of their forces against the Midianites.

I. The person to be commissioned for this service, was Gideon, the son of Joash, v. 11. The father was now living, but he was passed by, and this honour put upon the son; for the father kept up in his own family the worship of Baal, (v. 25.) which we may suppose this son, as far as was in his power, to have resisted. He was of the half tribe of Manasseh that lay in Gilead, of the family of Abiezr; the eldest house of that tribe, Jos. 17. 2. Hither the judges were raised up out of that tribe which suffered most by the oppression, and, probably, it was so here.

II. The person that gave him the commission, was an angel of the Lord: it should seem not a created angel, but the Son of God himself, the eternal Word, the Lord of the angels, who then appeared upon some great occasion in human shape, as a prelude (says the learned Bishop Patrick) to what he intended in the fulness of time, when he would take our nature upon him, as we say, for good and all. This angel is here called Jehovah, the incommunicable name of God, (v. 14, 16.) and he said I am the Lord. This divine person appeared here to Gideon, and it is observable how he found him, 1. Retired; all alone. God often manifests himself to his people, when they are out of the noise and hurry of this world. Silence and solitude befriended our communion with God. 2. Employed in threshing wheat, with a staff or rod, (so the word signifies,) such as they used in beating out fitches and cummin, (Isa. 28. 27.) but now used for another purpose; when he had but a little to thresh, he needed not the oxen to tread it out. It was not then looked upon as any diminution to him, though he was a person of some account, and a mighty man of valour, to lay his hand to the business of the husbandman. He had many servants, (v. 27.) and yet would not himself live in idleness. We put ourselves in the way of divine visits, when we employ ourselves in honest business. Tidings of Christ's birth were brought to the shepherds, when they were keeping their flocks. The work he was about, was an emblem of that greater work to which he was now to be called, as the disciples' fishing was. From threshing corn he is fetched to thresh the Midianites, Isa. 41. 15. 3. Distressed; he was threshing his wheat, not in the threshing-floor, the proper place, but by the wine-press, in some private unsuspected corner, for fear of the Midianites. God himself shared in the common calamity, and now the angel came to animate him against Midian, when he himself could speak so feelingly of the heaviness of their yoke. The day of the greatest distress is God's time to appear for his people's relief. Let us now see what passed between the angel and Gideon, who knew not for certain, till after he was gone, that he was an angel, but supposed he was a prophet.

1. The angel accosted him with respect, and assured him of the presence of God with him, v. 12. He calls him a mighty man of valour, perhaps because he observed how he threshed his corn with all his might: and seest thou a man diligent in his business?—whatever his business is, he shall stand before kings. He that is faithful in a few things, shall be ruler over many. Gideon was a man of brave active spirit, and yet buried in obscurity, through the iniquity of the times; but he is here animated to undertake something great, like himself, with that word, The Lord is with thee; or, as the Chaldee reads it, The Word of the Lord is thy help. It was very sure the Lord was with him, when this angel was with him. By this word, [1.] He gives him his commission. If we have God's presence with us, that will justify us, and bear us out in our undertakings. [2.] He inspires him with all necessary qualifications for the execution of his commission. "The Lord is with thee to guide and strengthen thee, to animate and support thee." [3.] He assures him of success; for if God be for us, who can prevail against us? If he be with us, nothing can be wanting to us. The presence of God with us is all in all to our prosperity, whatever be the form of it, the appearance of the figure of valour, and yet he could bring nothing to pass without the presence of God, and that presence is enough to make any man mighty in valour, and to give a man courage at any time.

2. Gideon gave a very melanchooly answer to this joyful salutation; (v. 13.) "O my Lord, if the Lord be with us," (which the Chaldee reads, Is the Shechinnah of the Lord our help? making that the same with the Word of the Lord,) "why then is all made, which he gave him no direct answer to, but girded and clothed him with such power as would shortly enable him to answer them himself, and make him ashamed that ever he had made them. It was a speaking look, like Christ's upon Peter; (Luke 22. 61.) a powerful look, that strangely darted new light and life into Gideon's breast, and inspired him with a generous heat, far above what he felt before. [2.] But there was much more in what he said to him. First, He commissioned him to go and act on his assurance, and to do it. Such a one, the few thinking people in the nation, and among the rest, were now expecting to be raised up, according to God's former method, in answer to the cries of oppressed Israel; and now Gideon is told, "Thou art the man: Go in this thy might, this might, wherewith thou art now threshing wheat; go and employ it to a nobler purpose, I will make thee a thresher of men." Or rather, "this might wherewith thou art now or rather, this look." God gave him his commission, by giving him all the qualifications that were necessary for the execution of it, which is more than the mightiest prince and potentate on earth can do for those to whom he gives commissions. God's fitting men for work, is a sure and constant evidence of his calling them to it. "Go, not in thy might, that which is mine, and of thyself; depend not on thine own valour: but go in the might which thou hast now received; go in the strength of the Lord God, that is the strength with which thou must strengthen thyself." Secondly, He assured him of success; this was enough to put courage into him, he might be confident he should not mis carry in the attempt; it should not turn either to his own disgrace, or the damage of his people, (speak, and do,) but to his honour and their happiness; "The Lord shall deliver Israel from the hand of the Midianites, and so shall not only be an eye-witness, but a glorious instrument, of such wonders as thy fathers told thee of." Gideon, we may suppose, looked as one astonished at this strange and surprising power conferred upon him, and questions whether he may depend upon what he hears; the angel ratifies his commission and makes it good: "I am the Lord, and there needeth no more. "Have not I come and told thee? I that have all power in heaven and earth, and particular authority here as Israel's King, giving commissions immediately, I who am that I am, the same that sent Moses," Exod. 3. 14. (4.) Gideon made a very modest objection against this commission; (v. 15.) "O my Lord, wherewith shall I have a Israel?" This question bespeaks him either, [1.] Distruist of God, and his poet: as if though God should be with him, yet it were impossible for him to save Israel. True faith is often weak, yet it shall not be rejected, but encouraged and strengthened. Or, [2.] Inquisitive concerning the method he must take; "Lord, I labour under all imaginable disadvantages for it; if I must do it, thou must put me in the way." Note, Those who receive commissions from God, must expect and seek for instructions from him. Or, rather, [3.] Humble, self-diffident, and self-denying. The angel had honoured him, but see how meekly he speaks of himself; "My family is comparatively poor in Manasseh," (impoverished, it may be, more than other families, by the Midianites,) "and I am the least, that have the least honour and interest, in my father's house; what can I pretend to do? I am utterly unfit for the service, and unworthy of this honour." Note, God often chooses to do great things by those that are little, especially that are so in their own eyes. God delights to advance the humble. (5.) This objection was soon answered by repe-necessary he should give proofs of before he took the field, to give proofs of his valour there. [2.] That some steps might hereby be taken towards Israel's reformation, which must prepare the way for their deliverance. Sin, the cause, must be taken away, else should the trouble come to an end, which was but the effect? And it might be hoped that this example of Gideon's, who was now shortly to appear so great a man, would be followed by the rest of the cities and tribes, and the destruction of this one altar of Baal, would be the destruction of many.

II. Gideon was obedient to the heavenly vision, v. 27.
He that was to command the Israel of God, must be subject to the God of Israel, without disputing; and, as a type of Christ, must first save his people from their sin, and then save them from their enemies. 1. He had servants of his own, whom he could confide in, who, we may suppose, like him, had kept their integrity, and had not bowed the knee to Baal, and therefore were forward to assist him in destroying the altar of Baal. 2. He did not scruple taking his father's bullock, and offering it to God without his father's consent, because God, who expressly commanded him to do so, had already made it his own. This was the greatest real kindness he could do his father, to prevent his sin. 3. He expected to incur the displeasure of his father's household by it, and the ill-will of his neighbours; yet he did it, remembering how much it was Levi's praise, that, in the cause of God, he said unto his father and mother, I have not seen him, Deut. 35. 9. And while he was sure of the favour of God, he feared not the anger of men; he that bade him do it would bear him out. Yet, 4. Though he feared not their resentments when it was done, to prevent their resistance in the doing of it, he prudently chose to do it by night, that he might not be disturbed in these sacred actions. And some think it was the same night in which God spake to him to do it; and that as soon as ever he had received the orders, he immediately applied himself to the execution of them, and finished before morning.

III. He was brought into peril of his life for doing of it, v. 28, 31. 1. It was soon discovered what was done. Gideon, when he had gone through with the business, did not desire the concealment of it, nor could it be hid, for the men of the city rose early in the morning, as it should seem, to say their matins at Baal's altar, and so to begin the day with their God in the same way as he was;
so a strife and tumult was made thereby the true God, and yet, in the morning, direct no prayer to him, nor look up. 2. It was soon discovered who had done it. Strict inquiry was made; Gideon was known to be disaffected to the worship of Baal, which brought him into suspicion, and positive proof immediately came against him; "Gideon, no doubt, has done this thing." 3. Being found guilty of it, he was guiltily punished; the degenerate Israelites, arrived, that they take it for law he must die for the same; and require his own father (who, by patronizing their idolatry, had given them too much cause to expect he would comply with them herein) to deliver him up. Bring out thy son, that he may die. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and tremble, O earth! By the law, the worshippers of Baal were to die, but these wicked men impiously turn the penalty upon the worshippers of the God of Israel.

IV. He was rescued out of the hands of his perpe-cutors by his own father, v. 31. 1. There were those that stood against Gideon, that not only appeared at the first to make a demand, but insisted on it, and would have put him to death. Notwithstanding the heavy judgments they were at this time under for their idolatry, yet they hated to be reformed, and walked contrary to God then and everafter. 2. Then Joash stood for him; he was one of the chief men of the city. Those that have power, may do a great deal for the protection of an honest man and an honest cause, and when they use their power, they are ministers of God for good. This Joash had patronised Baal's altar, yet now protects him that had destroyed it; either, (1.) Out of natural af-fec tion to his son, and perhaps a particular esteem for him, as a virtuous, valiant, valuable young man, and never the worse for not joining with him in the worship of Baal. Many that have not courage enough to keep their integrity themselves, yet have so much conscience left, as makes them love and esteem those that do. If Joash had a kindness for Baal, yet he had a greater kindness for his son. Or, (2.) Out of a care for the public peace. The worse sort would have provok'd him to more and more, and therefore, as some think, he bestowed himself to repress the tumult; "Let it be left to the judges, it is not for you to pass sentence upon any man; he that offers it, let him be put to death;" he means, not as an idolater, but as a disturber of the peace, and a mover of sedition. Under this same colour, Paul was rescued at Ephesus, from those that were as zealous for Diana as these here for Baal, Acts 19. 40. Or, (3.) Out of a conviction that Gideon had done well. His son, perhaps, had reasoned with him, or God, who has all hearts in his hands, had secretly and effectually influenced him to appear thus against the advocates of Baal, though he had complied with them formerly in the worship of Baal. Note, It is good to appear for God when we are called to it, though there be few or none to second us, because God can incline the hearts of those to stand by us, from whom we little expect it. Let us do our duty, and then trust God with our safety.

Two things Joash urges; [1.] That it was an sured for them to plead for Baal. "Will you that are Israelites, the worshippers of the one only living and ttrue God, plead for Baal, a false god? Will you be so soft-souled, so senseless? They whose father's god was this Baal, would have had his cause pleaded in an excusable manner for him than you are, that are in covenant with Jehovah, and have been trained up in the knowledge of him. You that have smelt so much for worshipping Baal, and have brought all this mischief and calamity upon yourselves by it, will you yet plead for Baal?" Note, It is bad to commit sin, but it is a great wickedness indeed to plead for it, especially to plead for Baal, that idol, which was the most idolatrous of them all. In your heart which God should have. [2.] That it was needless for them to plead for Baal; If he were not a god, as was pretended, they could have nothing to say for him; if he were, he was able to plead for himself, as the God of Israel had often done, by fire from heaven, or some other judgment against those who put contempt upon him. Here is a fair chalcenge to you, warriors of the cross and conquerors of disobedience, who have been so weak and silly as to yield to the current of Baal's worship. Let your Souls be convinced his worshippers of their folly, in praying to one to help them, that could not avenge himself; after this, Gideon remarkably prospered, and thereby it appeared how unable Baal was to maintain his own cause. Lastly, Gideon's father hereupon gave him a new name; (v. 32.) he called him Jerubbaal; "Let Baal plead, let him plead against him if he can; if he have any thing to say for himself against his destroyer, let him say it." This name was a standing defiance to Baal; now that Gideon was taking up arms against the Midianites that worshipped Baal, let him defend his worshippers if he can; it likewise gave honour to Gideon, (a sworn enemy to that great usurper, and that had carried the day against him,) and encouragement to his soldiers, that they fought under one that fought for God, against that great competitor with him for the throne. It is the probable conjecture of the learned, that that Jerombalus, whom Sanchonialatus (one of the most ancient of all the heathen writers) speaks of as a priest of the god Jao, (a corruption of the name Jehovah,) and one that had he was indebted for a great deal of knowledge, was this Jerubaal. He is called Jerubbaseth, 2Sam. 11. 21. Baal, a lord, being fitly turned into Be'esheth, shame.

33. Then all the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and the children of the cast, were gathered together, and went over, and pitched in the valley of Jezreel. 34. But the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon, and he blew a trumpet; and Abiezer was gathered after him. 35. And he sent messengers throughout all Manasseh; who also was gathered after him: and he sent messengers unto Asher, and unto Zebulun, and unto Naphtali; and they came up to meet them. 36. And Gideon said unto God, If thou wilt save Israel by mine hand, as thou hast said, 37. Behold, I will put a fleece of wool in the floor; and if the dew be on the fleece only, and it be dry upon all the earth besides, then shall I know that thou wilt save Israel by mine hand, as thou hast said. 38. And it was so: for he rose up early on the morrow, and thrust the fleece together, and wringed the dew out of the fleece, a bowl-full of water. 39. And Gideon said unto God, Let not thine anger be hot against me, and I will speak but this once: Let me prove, I pray thee, this once with the fleece; let it now be dry only upon the fleece, and upon all the ground let there be dew. 40. And God did so that night: for it was dry upon the fleece only, and there was dew on all the ground.

Here we have,

I. The descent which the enemies of Israel made upon them, v. 33. A vast number of Midianites, Amalekites, and Arabians, got together, and came over Jordan, none either caring, or daring to guard that important and advantageous pass, against them; and they made their head-quarters in the valley of Jezreel, in the heart of Manasseh's tribe, not far from Gideon's city. Some think that the notice they had of Gideon's destroying Baal's altar, brought them over, and that they came to plead for Baal, and to make that a pretence for quarrelling with Israel; but it is more likely that it was now harvest-times when they had been wont each year to make them such a visit as this, (v. 3.) and were expected when Gideon was threatening, v. 11. God raised up Gideon to be ready against this terrible blow came. Their success so many years in these incursions, the little opposition they had met with, and the great booty they had carried off, made them now both very eager and very confident; but it proved the measure of their iniquity was full; for the year of recompense was come; they must now make an end to spoil, and must be spoiled, and they are gathered as sheaves to the floor, (Mic. 4. 12, 13.) for Gideon to thresh.

II. The preparation which Gideon makes to attack them in their camp, v. 34, 43. 1. God by his Spirit put life into Gideon; The Spirit of the Lord clothed Gideon, so the word is; clothed him as a robe to put honour upon him, clothed him as a coat of mail, to put defence upon him. These are well clad, that are thus clothed, A spirit of fortitude from before the Lord clothed Gideon; so the Chaldee renders it, He was made so strong himself a man of horror, yet personal strength and courage, though vigorously exerted, would not suffice for this great action; he must have the armour of God upon him, and that is it that he must depend upon; the Spirit of the Lord clothed him in an extraordinary manner; whom God calls to his work, he will qualify and animate for it. Gideon with his trumpet put life into his neighbours, God working with him; he blew a trumpet to call in volunteers, and more came in than perhaps he expected. (1.) The men of Abiezer, though lately enraged against him for throwing down the altar of Baal, and though they had condemned him to death as a criminal, were now convinced of their error, bravely came in to his assistance, and submitted to him as their general; Abiezer was gathered after him, v. 34. So suddenly can God turn the hearts, even of idolaters and persecutors. (2.) Distant tribes, even Asher and Naphtali, which lay most remote, though strangers to him, obeyed his summons, and sent him in the best of their forces, v. 35. Though they lay the farthest from the danger, yet, considering that if their neighbours were over run by the Midianites, their own turn would be next, they were forward to join against a common enemy.

III. The signs which God gratified him with, for the confirming both of his own faith and that of his followers; and perhaps it was more for their sakes than for his own that he desired them. Or, perhaps he desired by these to be satisfied, whether this was the time of his conquering the Midianites, or whether he was to wait for some other opportunity. Observe, 1. His request for a sign; (v. 36, 37.) Let me see one miracle that thou wilt save Israel by my hand; let a fleece of wool, spread in the open air, be wet with the dew, and let the ground about it be dry. The purport of this is, Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief. He found his own faith weak and wavering, and therefore begged of God by this sign to perfect what was lacking in it. We may suppose God, who intended to give these signs, for the glorifying of his own power and goodness; put it into his heart to ask them. Yet, when he repeated his request for a second sign, the reverse of the former, he did it with a very humble apology, deprecating God's displeasure, because it looked so like a peevish humoursome distrust of God, and dissatisfaction with the many assurances he had already given him; (v. 38.) Let not thine anger be hot against me. Though he took the boldness, to ask a second sign, yet, when he was denied the first, he was afraid and trembling, as showed that the familiarity God had graciously admitted him to, did not breed any contempt of God's glory, or presumption on God's goodness. Abraham had given him an example of this, when God gave him leave to be very free with him; (Gen. 18. 30, 32.) O let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak. God's favour must be esteemed a blessing, if God's will be done. It is a distinction, and a religious fear of his wrath. 2. God's gracious grant of his request. See how tender God is of true believers though they be weak, and how ready to condescend to their infirmities, that the bruised reed may not be broken, nor the smoking flax consumed: 16. He giveth a faithful soul... 17. Shew men... 18. He... 19. He... 20. Then Jerubbaal (who is Gideon) and all the people that were with him, rose up early, and pitched beside the well of Harod so that the host of the Midianites were on the north side of them, by the hill of Moreh, in the valley. 2. And the Lord said unto Gideon, The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me. 3. Now, therefore, go to proclaim in the ears of the people, saying, Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return, and depart early from mount Gilead: and there returned of the people twenty and two thousand, and there remained ten thousand. 4. And the Lord said unto Gideon, The people are yet too many; bring them down unto the water, and I will try them for thee there: and it shall be, that of whom I say unto thee, This shall go with thee, the same shall go with thee; and of whomsoever I say unto thee. This shall not go with thee, the same shall not go.
5. So he brought down the people unto the water: and the Lord said unto Gideon, Every one that lapeth of the water with his tongue, as a dog lapeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down upon his knees to drink. 6.
And the number of them that lapped, putting their hand to their mouth, were three hundred men: but all the rest of the people bowed down upon their knees to drink water.
7. And the Lord said unto Gideon by the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand: and let all the other people go every man unto his place. 8. So the people took victuals in their hand, and their trumpets:
and he sent all the rest of Israel, every man unto his tent, and retained those three hundred men. And the host of Midian was beneath him in the valley.

Here,
I. Gideon applies himself with all possible care and industry to do the part of a good general, in leading on the hosts of Israel against the Midianites.
He rose up early, (v. 1.) and one whose heart was upon his business, and who was afraid of losing time. Now that he is sure God is with him, he is impatient of delay. He pitched near a famous well, that his army might not be distressed for want of water, and gained the higher ground, which, possibly, might be some advantage to him, for the Midianites were beneath him in the valley. Note, Faith in God's promises must not slacken, but rather quicken our endeavours. When we are sure God goes before us, then we must bestir ourselves, 2 Sam. 5. 24.

II. God provides that the praise of the intended victory may be reserved wholly to himself, by appointing three hundred men only to be employed in this service. The army consisted of thirty-two thousand men; a small army, in comparison with what Israel might have raised upon so great an occasion, and a very small one in comparison with which the Midianites had now brought into the field; Gideon was ready to think them too few, but God comes to him, and tells him they were too many,
v. 2. Not but that they did well, who offered themselves willingly to this expedition, but God saw fit to make use of all that came. We often find God bringing great things to pass by a few hands, but this was the only time that he purposely made them fewer. Had Deborah lately blamed those who came not to the help of the Lord, and yet in the next great action must they be turned off that do come? Yes; 1. God would hereby show, that when he employed likely instruments in his service, he did not need them, but could do his work without them; so that he was not indebted to them for their service, but they to him for employing them. 2. He worked as they saw the way, and saw the manner of their conference, who had tamely submitted to the Midianites, and durst not make head against them, because of the disproportion of their numbers. They now saw, if they had but made sure of the favour of God, one of them might have chased a thousand. 3. He would hereby silence and exclude boasting: that is the reason here given by him who knows the pride that is in men’s hearts, lest Israel should think that all might have been done by their own hand, when they denied the honour of the service who would not give God the honour of the success. Mine own hand hath saved me, is a word that must never come out of the mouth of such as shall be saved. He that glories must glory in the Lord, and all flesh must be silent before him.

Two ways God took to lessen their numbers.

(1.) He ordered all that would own themselves timorous and faint-hearted to be dismissed, v. 3. He was now encamped on a mountain close to the enemy, called mount Gilead, from Gilead, the common ancestors of these families of Manas-sesh, which were seated on this side Jordan, Num. 26. 30. And from thence they might see perhaps the vast numbers of the enemy; those therefore who were disheartened at the sight, were left to take care of the welfare of the rest, and thereby was a law for making such a proclamation as this, Deut. 20. 8. But Gideon perhaps thought that concerned only those wars which were undertaken for the enlarging of their coast, not, as this, for their necessary defence against an invader; therefore Gideon had not proclaimed this, if God had not commanded him, who knew how his forces would hereby be diminished. Cowards would be as like-ly as any, after the victory, to take the honour of it from God, and therefore God would not do them the honour to employ them in it. One would have thought there had been scarcely one Israelite to be found, that against such an enemy as the Midianites, and under such a leader as Gideon, would have owned himself fearful; yet above two parts of three took advantage of this proclamation, and fled. God made the hardness of heart, and their own weakness, not considering the assurances of the divine presence which their general had received of the Lord, and, it is likely, delivered unto them. Some think the oppression they had been under so long, had broken their spirits, others, more probably, that consciousness of their own guilt had deprived them of their courage. So stared them in the face, and therefore they durst not die. In the face. Note, Fearful and faint-hearted people, are not fit to be employed for God; and among those that are listed under the banner of Christ, there are more such than we think there are.

(2.) He directed the cashiering of all that remained, but three hundred men; and he did it by a sign. The people were yet too many for me to manage, he said. God said, There are too many; and when diminished to a third part, there are yet many; which may help us to understand those providences which sometimes seem to weaken the church and its interests; its friends are too many, too mighty, too wise, for God to work deliverance by; God is taking a course to lessen them, that he may be exalted in his own strength.

Gideon is ordered to bring his soldiers to the watering place, probably, the wells of Haddas, (v. 1.) and the stream that ran from it; he, or some appointed by him, must observe how they drank. We must suppose they were all thirsty, and were inclined to drink; it is likely he told them they must prepare to enter upon action immediately, and therefore must refresh themselves accordingly, not expecting, after this, to drink any thing else but the blood of their enemies. Now, [1.] Some, and no doubt the most, would first quench their thirst, and put their mouths to the water as horses do, and so they might get their full draught. [2.] Others, it may be, would not make such a formal business of it, but as a dog laps with his tongue, so they would hastily take up a little water in their hands, and cool their mouths with that, and be gone. Three hundred and no more were of this latter sort, that drank in haste, and by those God tells Gideon he would rout the Midianites, v. 7. By the former distinction, none were retained but hearty men, that were resolved to do their utmost for retrieving the liberties of Israel; but by this further distinction it was provided that none should be made use of, but, First, Men that were hardy; that could endure long fatigue, without complaining of thirst or weariness; that had not in them any weakness or fear. It is, therefore, the done that were hasty; that thought it long until they were engaged with the enemy, preferring the service of God and their country before their necessary refreshments: such as these God chooses to employ, that are not only well affected, but zealously affected in a good thing: and also because these were the smaller number, and therefore the least likely to effect what they all of them designed for, God would by them save Israel. It was a great trial to the faith and courage of Gideon, when God bid him let all the rest of the people, but these three hundred go every man to his place; that is, go where they pleased out of his call, and from under his command: yet we may suppose those that were hearty in the cause, though now set aside, did not go far out of hearing, but that they were ready to help when the three hundred had made the assault; though that does not appear. Thus strangely was Gideon’s army purged and modelled, and reduced, instead of being recruited, as one would think in so great an action it both needed and deserved to be. Now let us see how this little despicable regiment, on which the stress of the action must be, was accoutred and fitted out. Had these three hundred been double-manned servants and attendants, and double-armed with swords and spears, we should have thought them the more likely to bring something to pass. But instead of making them more serviceable by their equipment, they are made less so; for, 1. Every soldier turns sutler; they took victuals in their hands, (v. 6.) left their baggage behind, and every man burdened himself with his own provision; which all the lbabies, that they might not be too burdened for, they could trust God when they had no more provisions with them than they could carry, and a trial of their diligence, whether they would carry as much as they had occasion for. This was indeed living from hand to mouth. 2. Every soldier turns trumpeter. The regiments that were cashiered left their trumpets behind them for the use of these three hundred men, who were furnished with those instead of weapons of war, as if they had been going rather to a game than to a battle. 9. And it came to pass the same night, that the Lord said unto him, Arise, get thee down unto the host; for I have delivered it into thine hand. 10. But if thou fear to go down, go thou with Phurah thy servant down to the host: 11. And thou shalt hear what they say; and afterward shall thine hands be strengthened to go down unto the host. Then went he down with Phurah his servant unto the outside of the armed men that were in the host. 12. And the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and all the children of the east, lay along in the valley like grasshoppers for multitude; and their camels were without number, as the sand by the sea-side for multitude. 13. And when Gideon was come, behold, there was a man that told a dream unto his fellow, and said, Behold, I dreamed a dream, and, lo, a cake of barley-bread tumbled into the host of Midian, and came unto a tent, and smote it that it fell, and overturned it, that the tent lay along. 14. And his fellow answered and said, This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon the son of Joash, a man of Israel: for into his hand hath God delivered Midian, and all the host. 15. And it was so, when Gideon heard the telling of the dream, and the interpretation thereof, that he worshipped, and returned into the host of Israel, and said, Arise; for the Lord hath delivered into your hand the host of Midian.

Gideon's army being diminished, as we have found it was, he must either fight by faith or not at all; God therefore here provides recruits for his fight, by ordering his fellow to tell his dream.

I. He furnishes him with a good foundation to build his faith upon; nothing but a word from God will be footing for faith. He has that as full and express as he can desire, v. 9. A word of command to warrant the action, which otherwise seemed rash and indiscreet, and unbecoming a wise general; "Arise, get thee down with this handful of men unto the host;" and a word of promise to assure him of the success, which otherwise seemed very improbable; "I have delivered it into thine hand, it is all thine own." This word of the Lord came to him the same night, when he was (may we suppose) full of care how he should come off; in the multitude of his thoughts within him these comforts did delight his soul. Divine consolations are given in to believers, not only strongly, but seasonably.

II. He furnishes him with a good prop to support his faith with. 1. He orders him to be his own spy, and now in the dead of the night to go down privately into the host of Midian and see what intelligence he could gain. "If thou fear to go down to fight, go first only with thine own servant, (v. 16.) and hear what they say; (v. 11.) and it is intimated to him he should hear that which would greatly strengthen his faith. God knows the infirmities of his people, and what great encouragement they may sometimes take from a small matter: and therefore knowing beforehand what would occur to Gideon, in that very part of the camp to which he would go down, he orders him to go down and hearken to what they said; that he might the more firmly believe what God said. He must take with him Phurah his servant, one that he could confide in; probably, one of the ten that had helped him to break down the altar of Baal; he must take him and no one else with him, must take him, that he be a witness of what he should hear the Midianites say, that out of the mouth of these two witnesses, when the matter came to be reported to Israel, the word might be established. He must go by himself, for he thought it better than one, and a little help better than none. 2. Being so, he orders him the sight of something that was discouraging. (1.) It was enough to frighten him, to discern, perhaps by moonlight, the vast numbers of the enemy; (v. 12.) the men like grasshoppers for multitude, and they proved no better than grasshoppers for strength and courage; the camels one could not count, any more than the sand. But, (2.) It is probable he was to a him a very good omen; and which when he had heard, he went back again immediately, supposing he now had what he was sent thither for. He overheard two soldiers of the enemy, that were, comrades, talking; probably, they were in bed together, waking in the night. [1.] One of them tells his dream, and (as our dreams generally are bad, and therefore not worthy telling again) it is a broken, fumbling dream. He dreams that a barley-cake come rolling down the hill into the camp of the Midianites, and "methought," says he, (for so we used to tell our dreams,) "this cake struck one of our tents," (perhaps one of the chief of their tents,) "and with such violence, that (would you think?) it overturned the tent, forced down the stakes, and broke the cords at one blow, so that the tent lay along, and buried its inhabitants," v. 13. In multitudinous, that is over thither, and as Gideon interpreted the dream, says Solomon, Eccl. 5. 7. One would wonder what odd incoherent things are often put together by a ludicrous fancy in our dreams. [2.] The other, it may be, between sleeping and waking, undertakes to interpret this dream, and the interpretation is very far fetched: "This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, v. 14." Our expositors now can tell us how apt the resemblance was; that those who had made cakes for his friend, and made cakes for his friend, made cakes for his friend, they may, as it were, as a barley-cake, hastily got together, as a cake suddenly baked upon the coals, and as unlikely to conquer the great army, as a cake to overthrow a tent. But, after all, do not interpret this, says Gideon, He.) Fit into the heart of the one to dream, and into the mouth of the other to give the sense of it. If Gideon had heard the dream only, and he and his servant had been to interpret it themselves, it had so little significancy in it, that it would have done him little service; but having the interpretation from the mouth of an enemy, it not only appeared to come from God, who has all men's hearts and tongues in his hand, but it was highly, at that very time, to hear this quite dispirited, and that the name of Gideon was become so formidable to them, that it disturbed their sleep. The victory would easily be won, which was already so tamely yielded; into his hand hath God delivered Midian. Those were not like-ly to fight, who saw God fighting against them. Gideon, observing the finger of God pointing to that likely to fight, who saw God fighting against them. Gideon, observing the finger of God pointing to that
15. First, how he gave God the glory of it; he worshipped immediately, bowed his head, or, it may be, lifted up his eyes and hands, and in a short ejaculation thanked God for the victory he was now sure of, and for this encouragement to expect it. Wherever we are, we may speak to God, and worship him, and find a way open heavenward. God must have the praise of that which is encouraging in our faith. And his providence must be acknowledged in those events, which, though minute and seemingly accidental, prove serviceable to us. Secondly, how he gave his friends a share in the encouragement he had received; “Arise, prepare to march presently; the Lord has delivered Midian into your hand.”

16. And he divided the three hundred men into three companies, and he put a trumpet in every man’s hand, with empty pitchers, and lamps within the pitchers. 17. And he said unto them, Look on me, and do likewise: and, behold, when I come to the outside of the camp, it shall be, that as I do, so shall ye do. When I blow with a trumpet, I and all that are with me, then blow ye the trumpets also on every side of all the camp, and say, The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon. 19. So Gideon, and the hundred men that were with him, came unto the outside of the camp, in the beginning of the middle watch; and they had but newly set the watch: and they blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers, that were in their hands. And the three companies blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers, and held the lamps in their left hands, and the trumpets in their right hands to blow withal; and they cried, The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon. 21. And they stood every man in his place round about the camp: and all the host ran, and cried, and fled. And the three hundred blew the trumpets, and the Lord set every man’s sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host: and the host fled to Beth-shittah in Zererath, and to the border of Abel-meholah, unto Tabbashath.

Here is, 1. The alarm which Gideon gave to the hosts of Midian in the dead time of the night; for it was intended that they who had so long been a terror to Israel, and had so often frightened them, should themselves be routed and ruined purely by terror. The attack here made was, in many circumstances, like that which Abraham made upon the army that had taken Lot captive; the number of men much the same, Abraham had three hundred and eighteen, Gideon three hundred; they both divided their forces, both made their attack by night, and were both victorious under great disadvantages, (Gen. 14. 14, 15.) and Gideon is not only a son of Abraham, (so were the Midianites by Keturah,) but an heir of his faith. Gideon, 1. Divided his army, small as it was, into three battalions (v. 16.) one of which he himself commanded, (v. 19.) because great armies (and such a one he would make a show of) were usually divided into the right wing, and left wing, and the body of the army. 2. He ordered them all to do as he did, v. 17. He told them now, it was very likely, what they must do, else the thing was so strange, they would scarcely have done it of a sudden, but he would, by doing it first, give notice to them when to do it, as officers exercise their soldiers with the word of command, or beat of drum, Look on me, and do likewise; such is the word of command our Lord Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, gives his soldiers, for he has left us an example, with a charge to follow it, As I do, so shall ye do. 22. And in this night, when they were secure, and least expected it, which would put them into great consternation; and when the smallness of his army would not be discovered. In the night, all frights are most frightful; especially in the dead of the night, as this was, a little after midnight, when the middle watch began, and the alarm would wake them out of their sleep. We read of terror by night, as very terrible, (Ps. 91, 5.) and fear in the night, Cant. 3. 8. 4. That Gideon aimed at, was, to frighten this huge host; to give them not only a fatal rout, but a very shameful one. He accounted his army with every man a trumpet in his right hand, and an earthen pitcher, with a torch in it, in his left; and he himself thought it no disparagement to him, to march before them thus armed. He would make but jest of conquering the enemy, and go out against them rather as against a company of children. The Midianites, The virgin, the daughter of Zuren, hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn, Isa. 37. 22. The fewness of his men favoured his design, for being so few, they marched to the camp with the greater secrecy and expedition; so that they were not discovered till they were close by the camp; and he contrived to give the alarm when they had just mounted their pitchers, (v. 16.) that when men, being then wakeful, might the sooner disperse the alarm through the camp, which was the best service they could do him.

Three ways Gideon contrived to strike a terror upon this army, and put them into confusion. (1.) With a great noise; every man must blow his trumpet in the most terrible manner he could, and scatter an earthen pitcher to pieces at the same time, probably, and dash his head against the next man’s, and so they were broken both together, which would not only make a great crash, but was a figure of what would be the effects of the fight, even the Midianites’ killing one another. (2.) With a great blaze; the lighted torches were hid in the pitchers, like a candle under a bushel, until they came to the camp, and then being taken out all together, a glorious show, and run through the camp like a flash of lightning. Perhaps with these they set some of the tents on the outside of the camp on fire, which would very much increase the confusion. (3.) With a great shout; every man must cry, For the Lord and for Gideon; so some think it should be read, v. 18. for there the sword is not in the original, but it is, v. 19. the sword of the Lord, and of Gideon. It should seem, he heard the word from the Midianite’s dream, (v. 14.) it is the sword of Gideon: finding his name was a terror to them, he thus improves it against them; but prefixes the name of Jehovah, as the figure, without which his own was but an insignificant cipher. This would put life into his own men, who might well take courage, when they had such a God as Jehovah, and such a man as Gideon, both to fight, and to fight for them; well might they follow, who had such leaders. It would likewise put their enemies into a fright, who had of old heard of Jehovah’s great name, and of late of Gideon’s. The sword of the Lord is all in all to the success of the sword of Gideon, yet the sword of Gideon must be employed. Men the instruments, and God the principal Agent, must both be considered in their places; but more may be required of us, as well as him. Gideon was not only made to save, but to save by a demonstration of God's power. This army was to be defeated purely by terrors, and those are especially the sword of the Lord. These soldiers, if they had swords by their sides, that was all, they had none in their hands; but they gained the victory by shouting "The Sword." So the church's enemies are routed by a sword out of the mouth, Rev. 19. 21.

Now this method here taken of defeating the Midianites, may be alluded to also (see 11. 13) As typifying the destruction of the Devil's kingdom in the world, by the preaching of the everlasting gospel, the sounding of that trumpet, and the holding forth of that light out of earthen vessels, for such the ministers of the gospel are, in whom the treasure of that light is deposited, 2 Cor. 4. 6, 7. Thus God chose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, a barley-cake to overthrow the tents of Midian, that the excellency of the power might be of God only; the gospel is a sword, not in the hand, but in the mouth, the sword of the Lord and of Gideon; of God and Jesus Christ, him that sits on the throne, and the Lamb. [2.] As representing the terrors of the great day. So the excellent Bishop Hall applies it; if these pitchers, trumpets, and fire-brands, did so daunt and dismay the proud troops of Midian and Amalek, who should be able to stand before the last terror, when the trumpet of the archangel shall sound, the elements shall be on a flame, the heavens pass away with a great noise, and the Lord himself shall descend with a shout! If the wonderful success of this alarm. The Midianites were shot out of their lives, as the walls of Jericho were shot down, that Gideon might see what he lately despaired of ever seeing, the wonders that their fathers told them of. Gideon was now come, even their destruction stood plain in his place round about the camp, (v. 21.) sounding his trumpet to excite them to fight one another, and holding out his torch to light them to their ruin. They did not rush into the host of Midian, as greedy either of blood or spoil, but patiently stood still to see the salvation of the Lord, a salvation purely of his own working. Observe how the design took effect.

They feared the Israelites; all the host immediately took the alarm; it flew like lightning through all the lines, and they ran, and cried, and fled, v. 21. There was something natural in this fright; we may suppose they had not had intelligence of the great diminution of Gideon's army, but rather concluded that since their last advices, it had been growing greater and greater; and therefore had reason to suspect, knowing how odious and grievous they had made themselves, and how bold steps had been taken toward the throwing off of their yoke, that it was a very great army which was to be ushered in with all those trumpeters and torch-bearers: but there was more of a supernatural power impressing this terror upon them; God himself gave it the setting on, to show how that promise should have been fulfilled if they had not forfeited it, One chose a terror here, as he did on Mount Sinai, and in the pillars of cloud and fire. See there the power of imagination, and how much it may become a terror at some times, as at other times it is a pleasure.

2. They fell foul upon one another; (v. 22.) The Lord set every man's hand against his fellow. In this confusion, observing the trumpeters and torch-bearers to stand still without their camp, they concluded the body of the army had already entered, and therefore every one ran at the next he met, though a friend, supposing him an enemy; and one such mistake as that, would occasion many, for then he that slew him would certainly be taken for an enemy, and would be despatched immediately. It is our interest to preserve such a command of our own spirits, as never to be afraid of any amazement. For we cannot conceive what mischiefs we thereby plunge ourselves in. See also how God often makes the enemies of his church instruments to destroy one another; it is pity the church's friend should ever be thus infatuated.

3. They fled for their lives. Perhaps when day-light came, they were sensible of their mistake in fighting with one another, and concluded that by this fatal error they had so weakened themselves, that now it was impossible to make any head against Israel, and therefore made no doubt of going out of their way toward their own country, though, for aught that appears, the three hundred men kept their ground. The wicked flees when none pursues, Prov. 28. 1. Terrors make him afraid on every side, and drive him to his feet, Job. 18. 11.

23. And the men of Israel gathered themselves together out of Naphtali, and out of Asher, and out of all Manasseh, and pursued after the Midianites. 24. And Gideon sent messengers throughout all mount Ephraim, saying, Come down against the Midianites, and take before them the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan. Then all the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and took the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan. 25. And they took two princes of the Midianites, Oreb and Zeeb; and they slew Oreb upon the rock Oreb, and Zeeb they slew at the wine-press of Zeeb, and pursued Midian, and brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon on the other side Jordan.

We have here the prosecution of this glorious victory.

1. Gideon's soldiers that had been dismissed, and perhaps had begun to disperse themselves, upon notice of the enemies' flight, got together again, and vigorously pursued them whom they had once caught by the face.

2. The men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and took the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan.

3. They were not such as now came from those distant countries, but the same that had enlisted themselves, (ch. 6. 35.) but had been cashiered. They who were fearful and afraid to fight, (v. 3.) now took heart, when the worst was over, and were ready enough to divide the spoil, though backward to make the onset. They also that might not fight, though they had a mind to it, and were disbanding by order from God, did not (as those, 2 Chron. 25. 10. 13.) return in great anger, but waited for an opportunity of doing service in pursuing the victory, though they were denied the honour of helping to force the lines.

2. The Ephraimites, upon a summons from Gideon, came in unanimously, and secured the passes over Jordan, by the several fords, to cut off the enemy's retreat on one side and the other. See there the power of imagination, and how much it may become a terror at some times, as at other times it is a pleasure.

3. Of the chief commanders of the host of Midian were taken and slain by the Ephraimites on this side Jordan, v. 23. Their names perhaps signified their nature, Oreb signifies a raven, and Zeeb a wolf (Corvinus and Lynxus). These in their flight had taken shelter, one in a rock; (Isa. 2. 21. Rev. 6. 15.) the other, as Gideon for fear of them had lately hid his corn by a winepress, ch. 5. 11. But the places of their shelter were made the places of their slaughter, and the memory of it preserved to posterity in the names of the places, to their perpetual infamy; Here fell the princes of Midian.

CHAP. VIII.

This chapter gives us a further account of Gideon's victory over the Midianites, with the residue of their enemies, and their government. I. Gideon prudently pacifies the offending Ephraimites, v. 1.-3. II. He bravely pursues the flying Midianites, v. 4.-10. III. He justly chastises the insolence of the man of Succoth and Penuel, who basely abused him, v. 5.-9. and were reckoned with for it, v. 13.-17. IV. He honourably slays the two kings of Midian, v. 18. -21. V. After all this, he modestly declines the government of Israel, v. 22, 23. VI. He foolishly gratified the superstitious humour of his people, by setting up an ephod in his own city, which proves a great snare, v. 24.—27. VII. He kept the country quiet forty years, v. 28. VIII. He died in honour, and left a numerous family behind him, v. 29. IX. Both he and his God were soon forgotten by ungrateful Israel, v. 33.-36.

I. AND the men of Ephraim said unto him, Why hast thou serviced us thus, that thou calledst us not when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites? and they did chide with him sharply. 2. And he said unto them, What have I done now in comparison of you? Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abiezer? 3. God hath delivered into your hands the princes of Midian, Oreb and Zeeb: and what was I able to do in comparison of you? Then their anger was abated toward him, when he had said that.

No sooner were the Midianites, the common eneyes, subdued, than through the violence of some hot spirits, the children of Israel are ready to quarrel among themselves; an unhappy spark was struck, which if Gideon had not with a great deal of wisdom and grace extinguished immediately, might have broken out into a flame of fatal consequence. The Ephraimites, when they brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon as general, instead of congratulating his successes, and addressing him with thanks for his great services, as they ought to have done, picked a quarrel with him, and grew very hot upon it.

I. Their accusation was very peevish and unreasensible; Why didst thou not call us when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites? v. 1. Ephraim was brother to Manasseh, Gideon's tribe, and had the pre-eminence in Jacob's blessing, and in Moses's, and therefore was very jealous of Manasseh, less jealous. (2.) It was a very bad manner of their's. Hence we find Manasseh against Ephraim, and Ephraim against Manasseh, Is. 9. 21. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and their contentions are as the bars of a castle, Prov. 18. 19. But how unjust was their quarrel with Gideon! They were angry he did not send for them to begin the attack upon Midian, as well as to follow the honor. Why may other men not lead the van? The post of honour, they thought, belonged to them. But, 1. Gideon was called of God, and must act as he directed; he neither took the honour to himself, nor did he dispose of honours himself, but left it to God to do all. So that the Ephraimites in this quarrel reflected upon the divine conduct; and what was Gideon that they murdered against him? 2. Why did not the Ephramites offer themselves willingly to the service? They knew the enemy was in their country, and had heard of the forces that were raising to oppose them, to which they ought to have joined themselves, in zeal for the common cause, though they had not a formal invitation. These seek themselves more than God, that stand upon a point of honour to excuse themselves from doing real service to God and their generation. (1.) The root of Ephraim, ch. 5. 14. Why did not that appear now? The case itself called them; they needed not wait for a call from Gideon. 3. Gideon had saved their credit in not calling them; if he had sent for them, no doubt, many of them would have gone back with the faint-hearted, or been dismissed with the lazy, slothful, and intemperate; so that by not calling them, he prevented the putting of those slurs upon them. Cowards will seem valiant when the danger is over, but these consult their reputation, who try their courage when danger is near.

II. Gideon's answer was very calm and peaceable, and was intended not so much to justify himself, as to please and pacify them, v. 2, 3. He answers them, 1. With a great deal of meekness and temper: he did not resent the affront, nor answer them with raging impatience. 2. With a great deal of modesty and humility, magnifying their performances above his own. (Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim, who picked up the stragglers of the enemy, and cut off those of them that escaped, better than the vintage of Abiezer?—greater honour to them, and better service to the country than the first attack Gideon made upon them? The destruction of the church's enemies is compared to a vintage, Rev. 14. 18. In this he owns their gleanings better than his gatherings. The improving of a victory is often more honourable, and of greater consequence, than the winning of it; in this they had signalized themselves, and their own courage and conduct. God hath dignified them; for though, to magnify their achievements, he is willing to diminish his own performances, yet he will not take any flowers from God's crown to adorn their's; God hath delivered into your hands the princes of Midian, and a great slaughter has been made of the enemy by your numerous hosts, and what was I able to do with three hundred men, in comparison of you and your brave experts? Gideon stands here a very great example of self-denial, and this instance shows us, (1.) That envy is best removed by humility. It is true, even right works are often envi'd, Eccl. 4. 4. Yet they are not so apt to be so, when those who do them, appear not to be proud of them. They are malignant indeed, who seek to cast those down from their excellency, that humble and abuse themselves. (2.) It is likely the surest method of endning strife, for only by pride comes contention, Prov. 13. 10. (3.) Humility is most amiable and admirable in the midst of great attainments and advancements. Gideon's conquests did greatly set off his condensations. (4.) It is the proper act of humility to esteem others better than ourselves, and in honour to prefer one another.

What was the controversy? The Ephraimites had chidden with him sharply, (v. 1.) forgetting the respect owing to their general, and one whom God had honoured, and giving vent to their passion in a very indecent liberty of speech, a well-timed answer turned away their wrath, Prov.
15. 1. Their anger was abated toward him, (v. 3.)
It is intimated, that they retained him some resentment, but he prudently overlooked it, and let it cool by degrees. Very great and good men must expect to have their patience tried, by the unkind-nesses and follies even of those they serve, and must not think it strange.

4. And Gideon came to Jordan, and passed over, he and the three hundred men that were with him, faint, yet pursuing them. 5.
And he said unto the men of Succoth, Give,
I pray you, loaves of bread unto the people that follow me; for they be faint, and I am pursuing after Zebah and Zalmunna, kings of Midian. 6. And the princes of Succoth said,
Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thine hands, that we should give bread unto thine army? 7. And Gideon said, Therefore, when the Lord hath de-ivered Zebah and Zalmunna into mine hand, then I will tear your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness and with briers.
8. And he went up thence to Penuel, and spake unto them likewise: and the men of Penuel answered him as the men of Succoth had answered him. 9. And he spake also unto the men of Penuel, saying, When I come again in peace, I will break down this tower. 10. Now Zebah and Zalmun-na were in Karkor, and their hosts with them, about fifteen thousand men, all that were left of all the hosts of the children of the east: for there fell a hundred and twenty thousand men that drew sword. 11. And Gideon went up by the way of them that dwelt in tents, on the east of Nobah and Jobbeah, and smote the host: for the host was secure. 12. And when Zebah and Zalmunna fled, he pursued after them, and took the two kings of Midian, Zebah and Zalmunna, and discomfited all the host.
13. And Gideon, the son of Joash, returned from battle before the sun was up. 14. And caught a young man of the men of Succoth, and inquired of him: and he described unto him the princes of Succoth, and the elders thereof, even three score and seventeen men.
15. And he came unto the men of Succoth, and said, Behold Zebah and Zalmunna, with whom ye did upbraided me, saying, Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thine hand, that we should give bread unto thy men that are weary? 16. And he took the elders of the city, and thorns of the wilderness and briers, and with them he taught the men of Succoth. 17. And he beat down the tower of Penuel: and slew the men of the city.

In these verses, we have,
1. Gideon, as a valiant general, pursuing the remaining Midianites, and bravely following his blow.
A very great slaughter was made of the enemy at first, and of hundred and twenty thousand men that drew the sword, v. 10.
Such a terrible execution did they make among themselves, and so easily a prey were they to Israel: but, it seems, the two kings of Midian, being better provided than the rest for an escape, with fifteen thousand men, got over Jordan before the passes could be secured by the Ephraimites, and made toward their own country:
Gideon does not execute his commission to save Israel, if he let them escape. He is not content to chase them out of the country, but he will chase them out of the world, Job 18. 18.
This resolution is here pushed on with great firmness, and crowned with great success.

1. His firmness was very exemplary; he effectded his purpose under the greatest disadvantages and discouragements that could be. (1.) He took none with him, but his three hundred men, who now laid aside their trumpets and torches, and betook them-themselves to their swords and spears. God had said,
By these three hundred men will I save you; (ch.
7. 7.) and confirming in that promise, Gideon kept them to only, v. 4. He expected more from three hundred men, supported by a particular promise, than from so many thousands, supported only by their own valor. (2.) They were faint and yet proved victorious; and, though they were exhausted, yet eager to do more against the enemies of their country. Our spiritual warfare must thus be prosecuted with what strength we have, though we have but little; it is many a time the true Christian's case, fainting, and yet pursuing. (3.) Though he met with discouragement from those of his own people, was jeered for what he was doing, as going about what he could never accomplish, yet he went on (v. 11.) if those that should be our helper and the way of our duty, prove hindrances to us, let not that drive us off from it. Those know not how to value God's acceptance, that know not how to despise the reproaches, and contempts of men. (4.) He made a very long march by the way of them dwelt in tents, v. 11. Either because he hoped to find them Kinder to him than the men of Succ-oth, Penuel, than Nobah, and Karkor, (sometimes there is more generosity and charity found in country tents than in city palaces;) or, because that was a road in which he would be least expected, and therefore that way it would be the greater surprise to them. It is evident, he spared no pains to complete his victory. Now he found it an advantage to have his three hundred men, such as could bear hunger, and thirst, and toil. It should only, he set upon them by night, as he had done before, for the host was secure. The security of sinners often proves their ruin, and dangers are most fatal when least feared.

2. His success was very encouraging to resolution and industry in a good cause. He routed the army, (v. 11.) and took the two kings prisoners, v. 12.
Note, The fear of the wicked shall come upon him.
They that think to run, and run full on to the Lord and of Gideon, do but run upon it. If he flee from the iron weapon, yet the bow of steel shall strike him through; for evil pursueth sinners.

II. Here is Gideon, as a righteous judge, chas-tising the insolvency of the disaffected Israelites, the men of Succoth, and the men of Penuel, both in the time of God, on the other side Jordan.

1. The crime was great. Gideon, with a handful of faithful men, was pursuing a common enemy, to complete the deliverance of Israel; his way leads him through the city of Succoth first, and afterward of Penuel; he expects not that the magistrates should meet him in their formalities, congratulate his victory, present him with the keys of their city, give him a treat, much less that they should send forces in to his assistance, though he was entitled to it all; but he only begs some necessary food for his followers that were ready to faint, and it do he it very humbly and importantly. Give, I pray you, loaves of bread unto the people that follow me, v. 5. The request had been reasonable if they had been but poor travellers in distress; but considering that they were soldiers, called and chosen, and faithful, (Rev. 17. 14.) men whom God had greatly honoured, and whom Israel was highly obliged to, who had done great service, and were come no more; that they were conquerors, and had power to put them under contribution; that they were fighting God's battles and Israel's; nothing could be more just than that they should furnish them with the best provisions their city afforded. But the princes of Succoth neither feared God, nor regarded man! For, (1.) In contempt of God, they refused to answer the just demands of him whom God had raised up to save them, affronted him, bantered him, despised the success he had already been honoured with, despaired of success of his present undertaking, did what they could to discourage him in prosecuting the war, and were very willing to believe that the remaining forces of Midian, which they had now seen march through their country, would be too hard for him. Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna, of which thou speakest, stronger, or wiser, or better furnished, or able to do more, than thine, or better able to dispose of numbers? (2.) The bows of their confusion were shut up against their brethren; they were as destitute of love as they were of faith; would not give morsels of bread (as some read it) to them that were ready to perish. Were these princes? Were these Israelites? Unworthy either title; base and degenerate men. Surely they were worshippers of Baal, or in the interests of Midian. The meanest Peniel gave the same answer to the same request, defying the sword of the Lord and of Gideon, v. 8. 2. The warning he gave them of the punishment of their crime, was very fair. (1.) He did not punish it immediately, because he would not lose so much time from the pursuit of the enemy that were flying from him, because he would not seem to put it in a heart of passage, and because he did not wish to precipitate their crime and confusion, when he had completed his undertaking which they thought impracticable. But, (2.) He told them how he would punish it, (v. 7, 9.) to show the confidence he had of success in the strength of God, and that if they had the least grain of grace and consideration left, they might, upon second thoughts, repent of their folly, humble themselves, and contrive how to satisfy him. And he now gave him access to their supplies, which if they had done, no doubt, Gideon would have pardoned them. God gives notice of danger, and space to repent, that sinners may flee from the wrath to come. 3. The warning being slighted, the punishment, though very severe, was really very just. (1.) The princes of Succoth were first made examples; Gideon got intelligence of their number, seventy princes; the safest abodes which were described in writing to him, v. 14. And to their great surprise, when they thought he had scarce overtake the Midianites, he was returned a conqueror; his three hundred men were now the ministers of his justice; they secured all these princes, and brought them before Gideon, who showed them his royal capvies in chains, "These are the men you thought me an unequal match for, and would give me no assistance in the pursuit of," v. 15. And he punished them with thorns and briers, but it should seem, not unto death. With these, (1.) He tormented their bodies, either by scourging, or rolling them in the thorns and briers; some way or other he tore their flesh, v. 7. These shall have judgment without mercy, that have showed no mercy. (2.) He observed to be soft and delicate men, who despised him and his company for their roughness and harshness, and therefore Gideon thus mortified them for their effeminacy. (2.) He instructed their minds; with these he taught the men of Succoth, v. 16. The correction he gave them, was intended, not for destruction, but wholesome discipline, to make them wiser and better for the future. He made them know, (so the word is,) made them know themselves and their folly, God and their duty; made them know who Gideon was, since they would not know by the success wherewith he had crowned them. Note, Many are taught with the briers and thorns of affliction, that would not learn otherwise. God gives wisdom by the rod and reproof, chastens and teaches, and by correction opens the ear of discipline. Our blessed Saviour, though he were a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered, Heb. 5. 8. Let every pricking brier, and grievous thorn, especially when it become a thorn in the flesh, be thus interpreted, thus improved, "By this God designs to teach me; what good lessons shall I learn?" (2.) Peniel's doom comes next, and it should seem he used them more severely than the other; for good reason, no doubt, v. 17. [1.] He made them know, that they had trusted, perhaps scornfully advising Gideon and his men rather to secure themselves in that, than to pursue the Midianites. What men make their pride, the ruin of it is justly made their shame. [2.] He slew the men of the city, not at all, perhaps not the elders or princes, but those that had affronted him, and those only. He slew some of the men of the city that were most insolent and abusive, for terror to the rest, and so he taught the men of Peniel. 18. Then said he unto Zebah and Zalmunna, What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor? And they answered, As thou art, so were they; each one resembled the children of a king. 19. And he said, They were my brethren, even the sons of my mother: as the Lord liveth, if ye had saved them alive, I would not slay you. 20. And he said unto Jether his first-born, Up, and slay them: but the youth drew not his sword; for he feared, because he was yet a youth. 21. Then Zebah and Zalmunna said, Rise thou, and fall upon us: for as the man is, so is his strength. And Gideon arose, and slew Zebah and Zalmunna, and took away the ornaments that were on their camels' necks. Judgment began at the house of God, in the just correction of the men of Succoth and Peniel, who were Israelites, but it did not end there. The kings of Midian, when they had served to demonstrate Gideon's victories, and grace his triumphs, must now be reckoned with. 1. They are indicted for the murder of Gideon's brethren some time ago at mount Tabor. When the children of Israel, for fear of the Midianites, made them dens in the mountains, v. 17. (2.) these young men, it is likely, took shelter in that mountain, where they were found by these two kings, and most basely and barbarously slain in cold blood. When he asks them what manner of men they were, (v. 18.) it is not because he was uncertain of the punishment of them, but what he has not so little concerned for his brethren’s blood, as not to inquire it out before now, nor were these proud tyrants solicitious to conceal it; but he puts that question to them, that by their acknowledgment of the more than ordinary comeliness of the persons they slew, their crimes might appear the more heinous, and consequently their punishment the more just. They could not but own, that though they were found in no object condemned, yet they had an unusual greatness and majesty in their countenances not unlike Gideon himself at this time; they resembled the children of a king, born for something great.

2. Being found guilty of this murder by their own confession, Gideon, though he might have put them to death as Israel’s judge, for the injuries done to that people in general, as Oreb and Zeeb, (ch. 7. 25.) yet he chooses rather to put on the character of an avenger of blood, as next of kin to the persons slain. They were my brethren, v. 19. The other crimes might have been forgiven, at least Gideon would not have slain them himself, let them have answered it to the people; but the voice of his brethren’s blood cries, cries to him, now it is in his power to avenge it, and therefore there is no remedy, by him must their blood be shed, though they were kings. Little did they think to have heard of this so long after; but murder seldom goes unpunished in this life.

3. The execution is done by Gideon himself with his own hand, because he was the avenger of blood; he bade his son slay them, for he was a near relation to the persons murdered, and fittest to be his father’s substitute and representative; and he would thus train him up to the rule of justice, and boldness, v. 20. But, (1.) The young man himself desired to be excused; he feared, though they were bound and could make no resistance, because he was yet a youth, and not used to such work: courage does not always run in the blood. (2.) The prisoners themselves desired that Gideon would excuse it; (v. 21.) begged, if they must die, to die by his own hand, it would be somewhat more honourable to them, and more easy, for by his great strength they would sooner be despatched and rid out of their pain. As the man, so is his strength. Either they mean it of themselves, they were men of such strength as called for a better hand than that young man’s to overpower quickly; or of Gideon. Thou art at thy full strength, he is not yet come to it, therefore be thou the executioner.” From these words it is evident that Gideon was of the opinion that the two kings, and that of the two princes, (ch. 7. 25.) is long after pleaded as a precedent in prayer for the ruin of others of the church’s enemies; (Ps. 83. 11.) Make their nobles like Oreb and Zeeb, and all their princes as Zelah and Zalmona; let them all be cut off in like manner.

22. Then the men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou and thy son, and thy son’s son also; for thou hast delivered us from the hand of Midian.

23. And Gideon said unto them, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you: the LORD shall rule over you.

24. And Gideon said unto them, I would desire a request of you, that ye would give me every man the ear-rings of his prey: (for they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ishmaelites.) 25. And they answered, We will willingly give them. And they spread a garment, and did cast therein every man the ear-rings of his prey.

26. And the weight of the golden ear-rings that he requested was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold, besides ornaments, and collars, and purple raiment that was on the kings of Midian, and besides the chains that were about their camels’ necks.

27. And Gideon made an ephod thereof, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah: and all Israel went thither a whoring after it; which thing became a snare unto Gideon, and to his house. 28. Thus was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more: and the country was in quietness forty years in the days of Gideon.

Here is,

1. Gideon’s laudable modesty after his great victory, in refusing the government which the people offered him. It was honest in him to offer; (v. 22.) Rule thou over us, for thou hast delivered us. They thought it very reasonable that he who had gone through the toils and perils of their deliverance, should enjoy the honour and power of commanding them ever after; and very desirable that he who in this great and critical juncture had such manifest tokens of God’s presence with him, should ever after preside in their affairs. Let us apply it to the Lord Jesus, he hath delivered us out of the hands of our enemies, our spiritual enemies, the worst and most dangerous, and therefore it is fit he should rule over us; for how can we be better ruled than by one that appears to have so great an interest in heaven, and so great a kindness for this earth? We are delivered, that we may serve him without fear, Luke 1. 74, 75. 2. It was honourable in him to refuse it; (v. 23.) I will not rule over you. What he did, was his design to serve them, not to rule them; to make them safe, easy, and happy, not to make himself great or honourable. And as he was not ambitious of grandeur himself, so he did not covet to entail it upon his family, “ My son shall not rule over you, either while I live, or when I am gone, but the Lord shall rule over you, and constitute your judges by the special designation of his own Spirit, as he has done.” This intimates, (1.) His modesty, and the mean opinion he had of himself and his own merits. He thought the honour of doing good was recompense enough for all his services, which needed not to be rewarded with honour of bearing sway; He that is greatest, let him be your minister. (2.) His piety, and the great opinion he had of God’s government. Perhaps he discerned in the people a dislike of theocracy, or divine government, a desire of a king like the nations; and his merits might have supplied a colourable pretence to move for this change of government. But Gideon would-by no means admit it. No good man can be pleased with any honor done to himself, which ought to be peculiar to God. Were ye baptized in the name of Paul? 1 Cor. 1. 13.

1. Gideon's zeal for the kings, the entertainment they gave him, and his zeal for the golden calf, Exod. 32. 2. These Gideon begged, v. 24. And he had reason enough to think that they offered him a crown, when he declined it, would not deny him their ear-rings, when he begged them, nor did they, v. 25. 2. He himself added the spoil he took from the kings of Midian, which, it should seem, had fallen to his share, v. 26. The plunder he had of that part of the prey which was most splendid, the prey of divers colours, ch. 5. 30. 3. Of this he made an ephod, v. 27. It was plausible enough, and might be well intended to preserve a memorial of so divine a victory in the judge's own city. But it was a very unadvised thing to make that memorial to be an ephod, a sacred garment. I would gladly put the best construction that can be upon the actions of good men, and suppose such a Gideon as this, and yet we have reason to suspect that this ephod had, as usual, a teraphim annexed to it, (Hos. 3. 4.) and that, having an altar already built by divine appointment, (ch. 6. 26.) which he erroneously imagined he might still use for sacrifice, he intended this for an oracle, to be consulted in doubtful cases. So the learned Dr. Spencer supposes. Each tribe having now very much its government, and in it their own hands, and no longer being all under one religious head, they could not get their religion among themselves. We read very little of Shiloh and the ark there, in all the story of the Judges. Sometimes by divine dispensation, and much oftener by the transgression of men, that law which obliged them to worship only at that one altar, seems not to have been so religiously observed as one would have expected, no more than afterward, when, in the reign of good kings, they were taken away from which we may infer, that that law had a further reach as a type of Christ, by whose mediation alone all our services are accepted. Gideon, therefore, through ignorance or inconsideration, sinned in making this ephod, though he had a good intention in it. Shiloh, it is true, was not far off, but it was in Ephraim, and that tribe had lately disinherited him, (v. 1.) which made him perhaps not care to go so often among them, as his occasions would lead him, to consult the oracle, and therefore he would have one nearer home. However this might be honestly intended, and at first did little hurt, yet in process of time, (1.) Israel went a whoring after it; that is, they deserted God's altar and priesthood, being fond of change, and prone to idolatry, and having some excuse for paying respect to this ephod, because so good a man as Gideon had set it up, and by degrees their respects to it grew more and more superstitions. Note, Many are led into false ways, by one false step of a good man. The beginning of sin, particularly of idolatry and will-worship, is as the setting forth of water, so it has been found in the fatal corruptions of the church of Rome, therefore leave it off before it be meddled with. (2.) It became a snare to himself, abating his zeal for the house of God in his old age, and much more to his house, who were drawn by it into sin, and it proved the ruin of the family.

III. Gideon's happy agency for the repose of Israel, v. 28. The Midianites that had been a vexation, gave them no more disturbance; Gideon, though he would not assume the honour and power of a king, governed as a judge, and did all the good offices he could for his people; so that the country was in quietness forty years. Hitherto the times of Israel had been reckoned by fifties; Othniel judged forty years, Ehud eighty—just two fifties, Barak forty, and now Gideon forty. Providence so ordering it, to bring in the mind the forty years of their wandering in the wilderness; Forty years more was I served with this generation. And see Ezek. 4. 6. After these Eli lived a long time, (1 Sam. 4. 18.) Samuel and Saul forty, (Acts 13. 21.) David forty, and Solomon forty. Forty years is about an age.

29. And Jerubbaal the son of Joash, went and dwelt in his own house. 30. And Gideon had threescore and ten sons of his body begotten: for he had many wives. 31. And his concubine, that was in Shechem, she also bare him a son, whose name he called Abimelech. 32. And Gideon, the son of Joash, died in a good old age, and was buried in the sepulchre of Joash his father, in Ophrah of the Abiezrites. 33. And it came to pass, as soon as Gideon was dead, that the children of Israel turned again, and went a whoring after Baalim, and made Baal-berith their god. 34. And the children of Israel remembered not the Lord their God, who had delivered them out of the hands of all their enemies on every side: 35. Neither showed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal, namely Gideon, according to all the goodness which he had showed unto Israel.

We have here the conclusion of the story of Gideon.

1. He lived privately; (v. 29.) he was not puffed up with his great honours, did not court a palace or castle to dwell in, but retired to the house he had lived in before his elevation. Thus that brave Roman who was called from the plough upon a sudden occasion to command the army, when the action was over, returned to his plough again.

2. His family was multiplied. He had many wives; (therein he transgressed the law;) by them he had seventy sons, (v. 30.) but one by a concubine, whom he named Abimelech, which signifies my father a king, that proved the ruin of his family, v. 31.

3. He died in honour, in a good old age, when he had lived as long as he was capable of serving God and his country; and who would desire to live any longer? And he was buried in the sepulchre of his fathers.

4. After his death, the people corrupted themselves, and went all to naught. As soon as ever Gideon was dead, who had kept them close to the worship of the God of Israel, they found themselves under no restraint, and then they went a whoring after Baalim, v. 33. They went a whoring, first after another ephod, (v. 27.) for which irregularity Gideon had himself given them too much occasion, and now they went a whoring after another god. False worship made way for false deities. They now chose a new god, (ch. 5. 8.)
god of a new name, Baal-berith; a goddess, say some. Berith, some think, was Berytus, the place where the Phoenicians worshipped this idol. The Lord of a covenant, so it signifies, perhaps because his worshippers joined themselves by covenant to him, in imitation of Israel's covenanting with God, for the Devil is God's ape. In this revolt of Israel to idolatry, they showed, (1.) Great ingratitude to God; (2.) Great ingratitude to the Lord, not only who had delivered them into the hands of their enemies, to punish them for their idolatry, but who had also delivered them out of the hands of their enemies, to invite them back again into his service: both the judgments and the mercies were forgotten, and the impression of them lost. (2.) Great ingratitude to Gideon, v. 35. A great deal of goodness he had showed unto Israel, as a father to his country, for which they ought to have been kind to his family when he was gone, for that is one way by which we ought to show ourselves grateful to our friends and benefactors, and may be returning their kindness when they are in their graves. But Israel showed not this kindness to Gideon's family, as we shall find in the next chapter. No wonder if those who forget their God, forget their friends.

CHAP. IX.

The apostasy of Israel after the death of Gideon, is punished, not as the former apostasies, by a foreign invasion, or the oppressions of any neighbouring power, but by internal strifes and revolts among themselves, which to this chapter we have the story of; and it is hard to say whether their sin or their misery appears most in it. It is an account of the usurpation and tyranny of Abimelech, who was base son to Gideon; so we must call him, and not more modestly, his natural son, he was so unlike us. We are here told, 1. How he thrust himself into the government at Shechem, his own city, by subtlety, and particularly by the murder of all his brethren, v. 1-5. 2. How his doughty men of Shechem, Gideon's youngest sons, v. 7-21. III. What strife there were between Abimelech and his friends the Shechemites, v. 22-41. IV. How this ended in the ruin of the Shechemites, v. 42-49., and of Abimelech himself, v. 50-57. Of this meteor, this ignis fatuus of a prince, that was not protector, but a plague to his country, we may say, as once was said of a great tyrant, that he came in like a fox, ruled like a lion, and died like a dog. For the transgression of a land such are the princes thereof.

1. AND Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal, went to Shechem unto his mother's brethren, and communed with them, and with all the family of the house of his mother's father, saying, 2. Speak, I pray you, in the ears of all the men of Shechem, Whether is better for you either that all the sons of Jerubbaal, which are threescore and ten persons, reign over you, or that one reign over you? remember also that I am your bone and your flesh. And his mother's brethren spake of him in the ears of all the men of Shechem all these words: and their hearts inclined to follow Abimelech; for they said, He is our brother. And they gave him threescore and ten pieces of silver out of the house of Baal-berith; wherewith Abimelech hired vain and light persons, which followed him. And he went unto his father's house at Ophrah, and slew his brethren, the sons of Jerubbaal, being threescore and ten persons, upon one stone; notwithstanding, yet Jotham, the youngest son of Jerubbaal, was left: for he hid himself. 6. And all the men of Shechem gathered together, and all the house of Millo, and went and made Abimelech king, by the plain of the pillar that was in Shechem.

We are here told by what arts Abimelech got into authority, and made himself great. His mother's brethren thought it a good way to get into power for good, and not to do fearfully. But with what success? 1. What he did, to get him into power. He hired a great number of vain and light persons, who were the instrument of his advancement. 2. For what purpose he hired them. He hired them to follow him, to be his army. 3. And what success he had by the use of them. He had them gathered together, ready to fight for him, and they actually delivered him. 4. And what purpose he intended them for. It was to make him king. 5. And what success he had in it. He succeeded, and was made king. 6. And what place he chose for his residence. It was Shechem, the ancient metropolis of Israel.
scum and scoundrels of the country, men of broken fortunes, giddy heads, and profligate lives; none but such would own him, and they were fittest to serve his purpose. Like leader, like followers.

II. How cruelly he got his father's sons out of the way. The first thing he did with the ruddle he headed, was, to kill all his brethren at once, publicly, and in cold blood, threescore and ten men, one only escaping, all slain upon one stone. See in this bloody tragedy, 1. The power of ambition, what beast it will turn men into, how it will break through all the ties of natural affection and natural concern; how it makes the brave man a dastard, and the dastard brave, and variable, to its designs. Strange that ever it should enter into the heart of a man to be so barbarous! 2. The peril of honour and high birth. Their being the sons of so great a man as Gideon, exposed them thus, and made Abimelech jealous of them. We find just the same number of Abahb's sons slain together at Samaria, 2 Kings 10. 1, 7. The Grand Seigniors have seldom thought themselves safe while any of their brethren have been unstrangled. Let none envy those of high extraction, or complain of their own meanness and obscurity. The lower, the safer.

Way being thus made for Abimelech's election, the men of Shechem proceeded to choose him king, v. 6. God was not consulted whether they should have any king at all, much less who it should be; here is no advising with the priest, or with their brethren of any other city or tribe, though it was designed he should reign over Israel, v. 22. But, (1.) The Shechemites, as if they were the people, and wisdom must die with them, do all; they aided and abetted him in the murder of his brethren, (v. 24.) and then they made him king. The men of Shechem, that is, the great men, the chief magistrates of the city, and the house of Millo, that is, the common council, the full-house, or house of fullness, as the word signifies, those that met in the Guild-hall; (we read often of the house of Milo, or state-house in Jerusalem, or the city of David, 2 Sam. 9. 2. 12 Kings 12.) these gathered together, not to prosecute and punish Abimelech for this barbarous murder, as they ought to have done, he being one of their citizens, but to make him king.

For the wickedness of the wicked was rewarded with a diadem. What could they promise themselves from a king that laid the foundation of his kingdom in blood? (2.) The rest of the Israelites were so very sottish as to sit by unconcerned; they took no care to give check to this usurpation, to protect the sons of Gideon, or to avenge their death, but tamely submitted to the bloody tyrant, as men, who with their religion had lost their reason, and all sense of honour and liberty, justice and gratitude. How vigorously had their fathers appeared to avenge the death of the Levite's concubine, and yet so wretchedly degenerate are they now, as not to attempt the avenging of the death of Gideon's sons; it is for this that they are charged with ingratitude; (ch. 8. 35.) Neither showed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal.

7. And when they told it to Jotham, he went and stood in the top of mount Gerizim, and lifted up his voice, and cried, and said unto them, Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you. 8. The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them: and they said unto the olive-tree, Reign thou over us. 9. But the olive-tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees? 10. And the trees said to the fig-tree, Come thou, and reign over us. 11. But the fig-tree said unto them, Should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees? 12. Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou, and reign over us. 13. And the vine said unto them, Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees? 14. Then said all the trees unto the bramble, Come thou, and reign over us. 15. And the bramble said unto the trees, If in truth ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow; and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon. 16. Now therefore, if ye have done truly and sincerely in that ye have made Abimelech king, and if ye have dealt well with Jerubbaal and his house, and have done unto him according to the deserving of his hands; 17. (For my father fought for you, and adventured his life far, and delivered you out of the hand of Midian;) and ye are risen up against my father's house this day, and have slain his sons, threescore and ten persons, upon one stone, and have made Abimelech, the son of his maid-servant, king over the men of Shechem, because he is your brother.) 18. If ye have then dealt truly and sincerely with Jerubbaal and with his house this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech, and let him also rejoice in you; 20. But if not, let fire come out from Abimelech, and devour the men of Shechem, and the house of Millo; and let fire come out from the men of Shechem, and from the house of Millo, and devour Abimelech. 21. And Jotham ran away, and fled, and went to Beer, and dwelt there, for fear of Abimelech his brother.

We have here the only testimony that appears to have been borne against the wicked confederacy of Abimelech, and the men of Shechem. It was a sign they had provoked God to depart from them, that neither any prophet was sent, nor any remarkable judgment, to awaken this stupid people, and to stop the progress of this threatening mischief. Only Jotham, the youngest son of Gideon, by a special providence escaped the common ruin of his family, (v. 5.) dealt plainly with the Shechemites, and his speech, which is here recorded, shows him to be a man of such great ingenuity and wisdom, and really such an accomplished gentleman, that we cannot but the more lament the fall of Gideon's sons. Jotham did not go about to raise an army out of the other cities of Israel, (in which, one would think, he might have made a good interest, for his father's sake,) to avenge his brethren's death, much less to set up himself in competition with Abimelech, so groundless was the usurper's suggestion, that the sons of Gideon aimed at domin ion; (v. 2.) but he contented himself with giving a faithful reproach to the Shechemites, and fair warning of the fatal consequences. He got an opportunity of speaking to them from the top of mount Gerizim, the mount of blessings, at the foot of which, probably, the Shechemites were, upon some occasion or other, gathered together, Josephus says, solemnizing a festival, and it seems they were willing to hear what he had to say.

I. His preface is very serious; (v. 7.) "Heerken nu toe, men van de Schechina, dat God may hearen unto you. As ever you hope to obtain God's favour, and to be accepted of him, give me a patient and impartial hearing." Note, Those who expect God to hear their prayers, must be willing to hear reason, to hear a faithful reproof, and to hear the complaints and appeals of wronged innocency. If we turn away our ear from hearing the their prayers will be an abomination. Prov. 28.9. II. His parable is very ingenious—that when the trees were disposed to choose a king, the government was offered to those valuable trees, the olive, the fig-tree, and the vine; but they refused it, choosing rather to serve than rule, to do good than bear away. But the same tender being made to the bramble, he accepted it with vain-glorious exultation. The way of instruction by parables, is an ancient way, and very useful, especially to give reproaches by.

1. He hereby applauds the generous modesty of Gideon, and the other judges who were before him, and perhaps of the sons of Gideon, who had declined accepting the state and power of kings when they might have had it. And likewise shows that it is in general the temper of all wise and good men to decline preferment, and to choose rather to be useful to their country, than to live a life of ease and luxury.

(1.) There was no occasion at all for the trees to choose a king; they are all the tree of the Lord which he has planted, (Ps. 104. 16.) and which therefore he will protect. Nor was there any occasion for Israel to talk of setting a king over them, for the Lord was their king.

(2.) When they had it in their thoughts to choose a king, they did not offer the government to the stately oak, or the lofty pine, which are one for show and shade, and not otherwise useful till they are cut down, but to the fruit-trees, the vine, and the olive. Those that bear fruit for the public good, are justly respected and honoured by all that are wise, more than they that affect to make a figure. For a good useful man some would even dare to die.

(2.) The reason which all these fruit-trees gave for their refusal was much the same. The olive pleads, (v. 9.) Should I leave my fatness? And the vine, (v. 13.) Should I leave my wine, wherewith both God and man are served and honoured? For oil and wine were used both at God's altars, and men's tables; and shall I leave my sweetness, with the fig-tree, and my good fruit, (v. 11.) and go to be promoted over the trees? Or, as the margin reads it, go up and down for the trees? It is intimated, That government involves not only a great deal of toil and care; he that is promoted over the trees, must go up and down for them, and make himself a perfect drudge to business. [2] That those who are preferred to places of public trust and power, must resolve to forego all their private interests and advantages, and sacrifice them to the good of the community. The fig-tree must lose its sweetness, its sweet retirement, sweet repose, and sweet conversation and contemplation, if it go to be promoted over the trees, and must undergo a constant fatigue. [3] That those who are advanced to honour and dignity, are in great danger of losing their fatness and fruitfulness. Preferment is apt to make men proud and slothful; and that spoils their usefulness, with which, in a lower sphere, they honour God and man. For which reason, they that desire to do good, are afraid of being too great.

2. He hereby exposes the ridiculous ambition of Abimelech, whom he compares to the bramble or thistle, v. 14. He supposes the trees to make their court to him, Come thou, and reign over us; perhaps, because he knew not that the first motion of Abimelech's preference came from himself, as we found, (v. 2.) but thought the Shechemites had imposed it to him: however, suppose it so, his folly in accepting it deserved to be punished. The bramble, a worthless plant, not to be numbered among the trees, useless and fruitless, nay, hurtful and vexations, scratching and tearing, and doing mischief, it began with the curse, and its end is to be burned. Such a one was Abimelech, and yet chosen to the government by the trees, by all the trees: this election seems to have been more unimportant than the other; for he served God, as he tells his people, to be a faithful fire come out of the bramble; a very unlikely thing to emit fire, and devour the cedars of Lebanon! more likely to catch fire and be itself devoured.

III. His application is very close and plain. In it, 1. He reminds them of the many good services his father had done for them, v. 17. He fought their battles, at the hazard of his own life, and to their unspeakable advantage. It was a shame that they should set up a king. He reproved them for it, v. 2. He攻克 their inclination, and then proceeds to show him the wickedness of his father's sons. He had left them, that was the blemish of his name and family, for he was the son of his maid-servant, whom all that had any respect to Gideon's honour, would endeavour to conceal, yet him they made their king. In both, they put the utmost contempt imaginable upon Gideon. 3. He leaves it to the event to determine whether they had done well, whereby he lodges the appeal with the divine providence; (1.) If they prospered long in this villainy, he would give them leave to say they had done well, v. 19. "If your conduct toward the house of Gideon be such as can be justified at any bar of justice, honour or conscience, much good may it do you with your new king." But, (2.) If they had, as he was sure they had, dealt basely and wickedly in this matter, let them never expect to prosper, v. 20. Abimelech and the Shechemites, that they had strengthened one another's hands in this villainy, would certainly be a plague and ruin one to another. Let none expect to do ill, and fare well.

Jotham, having given them this admonition, made a shift to escape with his life; (v. 21.) "other ther
When Abimelech had reigned three years over Israel, 23. Then God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem; and the men of Shechem dealt treacherously with Abimelech: 24. That the cruelty done to the threescore and ten sons of Jerubbaal might come, and their blood be laid upon Abimelech their brother, which slew them; and upon the men of Shechem, which aided him in the killing of his brethren. 25. And the men of Shechem set liers in wait for him in the top of the mountains, and they robbed all that came along that way by them: and it was told Abimelech. 26. And Gaal, the son of Ebed, came with his brethren, and went over to Shechem: and the men of Shechem put their confidence in him. 27. And they went out into the fields, and gathered their vineyards, and trode the grapes, and made merry, and went into the house of their god, and did eat and drink, and cursed Abimelech. 28. And Gaal, the son of Ebed, said, Who is Abimelech, and who is Shechem, that we should serve him? Is not he the son of Jerubbaal? and Zebul his officer? Serve the men of Hamor, the father of Shechem; for why should we serve him? 29. And would to God this people were under my hand! then would I remove Abimelech. And he said to Abimelech, Increase thine army, and come out. 30. And when Zebul, the ruler of the city, heard the words of Gaal, the son of Ebed, his anger was kindled. 31. And he sent messengers unto Abimelech privily, saying, Behold, Gaal, the son of Ebed, and his brethren, be come to Shechem; and, behold, they fortify the city against thee. 32. Now, therefore, up by night, thou and the people that is with thee, and lie in wait in the field: 33. And it shall be, that in the morning, as soon as the sun is up, thou shalt rise early, and set upon the city: and, behold, when he and the people that is with him come out against thee, then mayest thou do to them as thou shalt find occasion. 34. And Abimelech rose up, and all the people that were with him, by night, and they laid wait against Shechem in four companies. 35. And Gaal, the son of Ebed, went out, and stood in the entering of the gate of the city: and Abimelech rose up, and the people that were with him, from lying in wait. 36. And when Gaal saw the people, he said to Zebul, Behold, there come people down from the top of the mountains. And Zebul said unto him, Thou seest the shadow of the mountains as if they were men. 37. And Gaal spake again, and said, See, there come people down by the middle of the land, and another company come along by the plain of Meonemim. 38. Then said Zebul unto him, Where is now thy mouth, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech, that we should serve him? Is not this the people that thou hast despised! go out, I pray now, and fight with them. 39. And Gaal went out before the men of Shechem, and fought with Abimelech. 40. And Abimelech chased him, and he fled before him; and many were overthrown and wounded, even unto the entering of the gate. 41. And Abimelech dwelt at Arumah; and Zebul thrust out Gaal and his brethren, that they should not dwell in Shechem. 42. And it came to pass on the morrow that the people went out into the field; and they told Abimelech. 43. And he took the people, and divided them into three companies, and laid wait in the field, and looked, and, behold, the people were come forth out of the city; and he rose up against them, and smote them. 44. And Abimelech, and the company that was with him, rushed forward, and stood in the entering of the gate of the city: and the two other companies ran upon all the people that were in the fields, and slew them. 45. And Abimelech fought against the city all that day: and he took the city, and slew the people that was therein, and beat down the city, and sowed it with salt. 46. And when all the men of the tower of Shechem heard that, they entered into a hold of the house of the god Beth. 47. And it was told Abimelech that all the men of the tower of Shechem were gathered together. 48. And Abimelech got him up to mount Zalmon, he and all the people that were with him; and Abimelech took an axe in his hand, and cut down a bough from the trees, and took it, and laid it on his shoulder, and said unto the people that were with him, What ye have seen me do, make haste, and do as I have done. 49. And all the people likewise cut down every man his bough, and followed Abimelech, and put them to the hold, and set the hold on fire upon them; so that all the men of the tower of Shechem died also, about a thousand men and women.

Three years Abimelech reigned, after a sort, without any disturbance; it is not said, He judged Israel, or did any service at all to his country, but,
So long, he enjoyed the title and dignity of a king; and not only the Shechemites, but many other places, paid him respect. They must have been fond of a king, that could please themselves with such a one as this.

But the triumphing of the wicked is short. Within three years, as the years of a hireling, all this glory shall be contremued, and laid in the dust, (Judg. iv. 6.) the ruin of these confederates in wickedness was from the righteous hand of the God to whom vengeance belongs. He sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the Shechemites; (v. 23.) that is, they grew jealous one of another, and ill-affected one to another. He slighted them that set him up, and countenanced, perhaps more than their's, other cities which now began to come into his interests; and then they grew uneasy at his government, blasphemed his conduct, and quarrelled at his impositions. This was from God. He permitted the Devil, that great mischief-maker, to sow discord between them, and he is an evil spirit, whom God not only keeps under his check, but sometimes serves his own purposes by. Their own lusts were evil spirits, they are devils in men's own hearts, from them come wars and fightings. These God gave to Abimelech, and so might be said to send the evil spirits between them. When men's sin is made their punishment, though God is not the Author of the sin, yet the punishment is from him. The quarrel God had with Abimelech and the Shechemites, was for the murder of the sons of Gideon; (v. 24.) That the cruelty done to them might come, and their blood be shed as a burden upon Abimelech that slew them, and the men of Shechem that helped him. Not 1. Sooner or later. God will make inquirers know, and will avow the fact by making him king after he had done it, must fall with him, fall by him, and fall first. 2. Those that combine together to do wickedly, are justly dashed to pieces one against another. Blood cannot be a lasting cement to any interest.

1. The Shechemites began to affront Abimelech; perhaps they scarcely knew why, or wherefore, but they were given to change. 1. They dealt treacherously with him, v. 23. It is not said, They repented the wrong committed by him; but that it had been laudable to disown him; but they did it only upon some particular pique, conceived against him by their pride or envy. They that set him up, were the first that deserted him, and endeavoured to dethrone him. It is not strange that those who were ungrateful to Gideon, were unfaithful to Abimelech; for what will hold these that will not hold that? Note, It is just with God, that those who tempt others to be once perfidious, shall afterward be themselves betrayed by those whom they have taught to be perjurious. 2. They aimed to seize him when he was at Arumah, (v. 41.) his country-seat; expecting him to come to town, they set traps in wait for him, (v. 25.) who should make him their prisoner. This they hastily made their project. Those who were thus posted, he not coming, took the opportunity of robbing travellers, which would help to make the people more and more uneasy under Abimelech, when they saw he could not, or would not, protect them from highwaymen. 3. They entreated one Gaal, and set him up as their head in opposition to Abimelech, v. 26. This Gaal is said to be the son of Ebed, which signifies a servant, perhaps denoting the meanness of his extraction; as Abimelech was by the mother's side, so he by the father's, the son of a servant; here was one brimful contesting with another. We have reason to suspect that this Gaal was a native Canaanite, because he courts the Shechemites into subjection to the men of Hamor, who was the ancestor lord of this city in Jacob's time. He was a bold ambitious man, served their purpose admirably well, when they were disposed to quarrel with Abimelech, and they also served his purpose; so he went over to them to blow the coals, and they put their confidence in him. 4. They did all the despite they could to Abimelech's name, v. 27. They made themselves very merry in his absence, as those who were glad he was out of the way, and who, now that they had another to head them, were in hopes to get clear of him; now they went into the house of their god, to solemnise their festival-gathering, and there they did eat, and drink, and cursed Abimelech; not only said all the ill they could of him in their table-talk and the song of their drunkards, but wished all the ill they could to him over their sacrifices, praying to their idol to destroy him. They drank healths to his confusion, and with as loud huzzas as ever they had drunk them to his destruction. That very temple whence they had fetched money to set him up with, did they now meet in to curse him, and contrive his ruin. Had they deserted their idol-god with their image-less, they might have hoped to prosper; but while they still cleave to the former, the latter shall cleave to them their ruin. How should Satan cast out Satan? 5. They pleased themselves with Gaal's defying of Abimelech, v. 28, 29. They loved to hear his insolent speech, and the independent upstart speak scornfully. (1.) Of Abimelech; though calling him in disdain Shechem, or a Shechemite, he reflected upon their own city. (2.) Of his good father likewise, Gideon; Is not he the son of Jerubbaal? So he calls him, perhaps in an impious indignation at his name and memory, for throwing down the altar of Baal; turning that to his reproach which was his praise. (3.) Of his prime minister of state, Zebul his officer, and ruler of the city. "We may well be ashamed to serve them, and need not be afraid to oppose them." Men of turbulent ambitious spirits, thus despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities. Gaal aimed not to recover Shechem's liberty, only to change their tyrant, "O that this people were under my hand, what I would do! I would challenge Abimelech to try titles for the crown;" and it should seem the more to his purpose, they did not mean to be ready to dispute it with him, whenever he pleased; "Increase thine army and come out. Do thy worst; let the point be determined by the sword." This pleased the Shechemites, who were now as sick of Abimelech as ever they had been fond of him. Men of no conscience will be men of no constancy.

II. Abimelech turned all his force upon them, and, in a little time, quite ruined them. Observe the steps of it.

1. The Shechemites' counsels were betrayed to Abimelech by Zebul his confidant, the ruler of the city, who continued hearty for him. His anger was kindled, (v. 30.) and the more, because Gaal had spoken slightly of him; (v. 28.) for perhaps if he had complained of him, he might have propos'd his case to the Shechemites, and perhaps they were in this ferment, he might have gained him to his interest; but he, being disabused, sends notice to Abimelech of all that was said and done in Shechem against him, v. 31. Betrayers are often betrayed by some among themselves, and the cursing of the king is sometimes strangely carried by a bird of the air. He prudently advises him to come against the city immediately, and lose no time, v. 32, 33. He thinks it best that he should march his forces by night into the neighbourhood, surprise the city in the morning, and then make the best of his advantages. How could the Shechemites hope to speed in their attempt, when the ruler of their city was in the interests of their enemy? They knew it, and yet took no care to secure him.

2. Gaal, that headed their faction, having been betrayed by Zebul, Abimelech's confidant, was most wretchedly bantered by him. Abimelech, according to Zebul's advice, had drawn all his forces down upon Shechem by night, v. 54. Gaal, in the morning, went out to the gate, (v. 55.) to see what posture things were in, and to inquire, What new? Zebul, as a ruler of the city, met him there as a friend. Abimelech and his forces beginning to move toward the city, Gaal discovers them; (v. 56.) takes notice of their approach to Zebul that it was standing with him, little thinking that he had sent for them, and was now expecting them. "Look," says he, "not I see a body of men coming down from the mountain towards us. Yonder they are," pointing to the place; "No, no," says Zebul, "thine eye-sight deceives thee, it is but the shadow of the mountains which thou takest to be an army." By this he intended, (1.) To ridicule him as a man of no sense or spirit, and therefore unfit for what he pretended to; as none might easily be imposed upon, and managed to believe any, and least of all, a traitor so cowardly, that he apprehended danger where there was none, and was ready to fight with a shadow. (2.) To detain him, and hold him in talk, while the forces of Abimelech were coming up, that thereby they might gain advantage. But when Gaal, being content to believe those that he now saw, to be but the shadow of the mountains, (perhaps lying close by the city,) was undeceived by the discovery of two other companies that marched space toward the city, then Zebul took another way to flatter him, upbraiding him with what he had said but a day or two before, in contempt of Abimelech; (v. 58.) "Where is now thy mouth, that foul mouth of thine, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech?" Note, Proud and haughty people are often made, in the meantime, to fall below themselves, and to despise those whom they had most despised. Gaal had, in a bravado, challenged Abimelech to increase his army and come out; but now Zebul, in Abimelech's name, challenges him: "Go out, and fight with them, if thou darest." Justly are the insolent thus insulted over.

3. Abimelech routed Gaal's forces that sallied out of the town, v. 59, 60. Gaal, disheartened, no longer feared Zebul's enticings and perceiving his interest weaker than he thought it was, though he marched out against Abimelech with what little force he had, was soon put to the worst, and obliged to retire into the city with great precipitation. In this action the Shechemites' loss was considerable, many were overthrown and wounded; the common effect of popular tumults, in which the inconsiderate multitude are often drawn into fatal snares by those that promise them their success.

4. Zebul, that night, expelled Gaal, and the party he had brought with him into Shechem, out of the city, (v. 41.) sending him to the place whence he came. For though the generality of the city continued still averse to Abimelech, as appears by the sequel of the story, yet they were willing to part with Gaal, and did not oppose his expulsion, because, though he had talked big, both his conduct and courage had failed him when there was occasion for them. Most people judge of men's fitness for business by their success, and he that does not speed well, is concluded not to do well. Well, Gaal's interest in Shechem is soon at an end, and he that had talked of removing Abimelech, is himself self removed, nor do we ever hear of him any more.

5. Abimelech, the next day, set upon the city, and quite destroyed it, for their treacherous dealings with him. Perhaps Abimelech had notice of their expelling Gaal, who had headed the faction, with which they thought he would have been satisfied, but the crime was too deep to be thus atoned for, and his resentments too keen to be pacified by so small an instance of submission, because it was more Zebul's act than their's; by it their hands were weakened, and therefore he resolved to follow his blow, and effectually to chastise their treachery. (1.) He had intelligence brought him that the people of Shechem were come out into the field; (v. 42.) some think, into the field of business, to plough and sow, (having lately gathered in their harvest,) or to perfect their harvest, for it was only their change to plough them in an end; (v. 47.) and then it intimates that they were secure. And because Abimelech was retired, (v. 41.) they thought themselves in no danger from him, and then the issue of it is an instance of sudden destruction coming upon those that cry, Peace and safety. Others think they went out into the field of battle; though Gaal was driven out, they would not lay down their arms, but put themselves into a better engagement with Abimelech, in which they hoped to retrieve what they had lost before. (2.) He himself, with a strong detachment, cut off the communication between them and the city; stood in the entering of the gate, (v. 44.) that they might neither make their retreat into the city, nor receive any succours from the city, and then sent two companies of his men, who were too strong for them, and they put themselves to the sword, and destroyed all the Shechemites in the fields and slain them. When we go out about our business, we are not sure that we shall come home again; there are deaths both in the city and in the field. (3.) He then fell upon the city itself, and with a rage reaching up to heaven, though it was the place of his nativity, laid it in ruins, slew all the people, beat down all the buildings, and, in token of his desire that it might be a perpetual desolation, he set fire to the castle, leaving it burning as a monument of the punishment of perfidiousness. Yet Abimelech prevailed not to make its desolations perpetual, for it was afterward rebuilt, and became so considerable a place, that all Israel came thither to make Rehoboam king, 1 Kings 12. 1. And the place proved an ill omen. Abimelech intended hereby to punish the Shechemites for their slighting him now, but God intended to punish them for reviving of him formerly in the murder of Gideon's sons. Thus when God makes use of men as instruments in his hand to do his work, he means one thing, and they another, Is. 10. 6, 7. They design to maintain their honour, but God to maintain his.

6. Those that retired into a strong-hold of their idol-temple, were all destroyed there. These are called the men of the tower, Prov. 18. 10. (v. 43.) Some castles that belonged to that city, but lay at some distance from it; they, hearing of the desolation of the city, withdrew into a hold of the temple, trusting, it is likely, not so much to its strength, as to its sanctity: they put themselves under the protection of their idol; for thus all people will walk in the name of their god, and shall not we then choose to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of our life? For in the time of trouble he will hide us in his pavilion, Ps. 27. 5. The name of the Lord is a strong tower, Prov. 18. 10. But that which they hoped would have been for their welfare, proved to them a snare and a trap, as those will certainly find, that run to idols for shelter; it will prove a refuge of lies. When Abimelech had them altogether penned up in that hold, he desired no more. That barbarous project immediately came into his head, of setting fire to the strong-hold, and, so to speak, burning all the birds together in the nest. He kept the design to himself, but set all his men on work to expel the execution of it, v. 48, 49. He ordered them all to follow him, and do as he did: as his father had said to his men, (ch. 7. 17.) "Look on me, and do likewise;" so said he to his, as becomes a general that will not be wanting to give both the plainest direction, and the highest encouragement that can be, to his soldiers, What ye have seen me do, make haste to do as I have done. Not Ite illic—Go thither, but Venite hic—Come hither. The officers in Christ's army should thus teach by their example, Phil. 4. 9. He and they fetched each of them a bough from a wood, not far off, laid all their boughs together under the wall of this tower, which, it is probable, was of wood, set fire to their boughs, and so burnt down their hold, and all that were in it, who were either burnt or stifled with the smoke. What inventions men have to destroy one another! Whence come these cruel wars and fightings, but from their lusts? Some think that the men of the tower of Shechem were the same with the house of Millo, and then Jotham's just imprecation was answered in the letter, Let fire come out from Abimelech, and devour not in general the men of Shechem, but in particular the house of Millo, v. 20. About one thousand men and women perished in these flames, many of whom, it is probable, were no way concerned in the quarrel between Abimelech and the Shechemites, nor marked of either side, yet, in this civil war, came to this miserable end; for men of factious turbulent spirits, perish not alone in their iniquity, but involve many more, that follow them in their simplicity, in the same calamity with them.

50. Then went Abimelech to Thebez, and encamped against Thebez, and took it. 51. But there was a strong tower within the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the city, and shut it to them, and set them up to the top of the tower. 52. And Abimelech came unto the tower, and fought against it, and went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire. 53. And a certain woman cast a piece of a mill-stone upon Abimelech's head, and all to break his scull. 54. Then he called hastily unto the young man his armour-bearer, and said unto him, Draw thy sword, and slay me, that men say not of me, A woman slew him. And his young man thrust him through, and he died. 55. And when the men of Israel saw that Abimelech was dead, they departed every man unto his place. 56. Thus God rendered the wickedness of Abimelech, which he did unto his father, in slaying his seventy brethren. 57. And all the evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads: and upon them came the curse of Jotham the son of Jerubbaal.

We have seen the ruin of the Shechemites completed by the hand of Abimelech; and now it comes to his turn to be reckoned with, who was their leader in villany. Thebez was a small city, probably not far from Shechem, dependent upon it, and in confederacy with it. Now,

1. Abimelech attempted the destruction of this city, (v. 50.) drove all the inhabitants of the town into the castle, or citadel, v. 51. When he had him thus in his power, he did not but he should do the same execution here that he had lately done at the strong-hold of the temple of Baal-berith, not considering that the tower of an idol-temple lay more exposed to divine vengeance than any other tower. He attempted to set fire to this tower, at least, to burn down the door, and so force an entrance, v. 52. Those who have escaped and succeeded well in one desperate attempt, are apt to think the like attempt impossible to another. This instance was long after quoted, to show how dangerous it is to come near the wall of a besieged city, 2 Sam. 11. 20, &c. But God infatuates those whom he will ruin.

II. In the attempt, he was himself destroyed, having his brains knocked out with a piece of a millstone, v. 58. No doubt this man was a murderer, whom, though he had escaped the dangers of the war with Shechem, he should have had vengeance sufficient to bring him to life, Acts 28. 4. Evil pursueth sinners, and sometimes overtakes them then when they are not only secure, but triumphant. Thebez, we may suppose, was a weak inconsiderable place, conquered with Shechem. Abimelech, having conquered the bigger, makes no doubt of being master of the less without any difficulty, especially when he had taken the city, and had one to witness, yet he laid not much stress upon that, and there is all his honour buried. Thus are the mighty things of the world often confounded by the weakest, and those things that are most made light of. See here what rebukes these are justly put under many times by the divine providence, that are unreasonable in their demands of satisfaction for injuries received. Abimelech had some reason to chastise the Shechemites, and he had done: but a witness, and a man will carry his revenge further, and nothing will serve but that Thebez also must be sacrificed to his rage, he is not only disappointed there, but destroyed, for verily there is a God that judges in the earth.

Three circumstances are observed in the death of Abimelech.

1. That he was slain with a stone, as he had slain his brethren, v. 50. 2. That he had his skull broken; vengeance aimed at that guilty head which had worn the usurped crown. 3. That the stone was cast upon him by a woman, v. 53. He saw the stone come, it was therefore strange he did not avoid it; but, no doubt, it made it so much the greater mortification to him, to see from what hand it came. Sisera died by a woman's hand, and knew it not; Abimelech knew it, and when he felt his head Already to be let, vengeance troubled him so much as this, that it should be said, A woman slew him. See, (1.) His foolish pride, in laying so much to heart this little circumstance of his disgrace. Here was no care taken about his precious soul, no concern what would become of that, no prayer to God for his mercy; but very solicitous he is to patch up his shattered credit, when there is no patching of his shattered skull. O let it never be said such a mighty man as Abimelech was killed by a woman! The man was dying, but his pride was alive and strong, and the same vain-glory humour that had governed him all along, appears now at last. Qualis vita, finis ita—As was his life, such was his death. As God punished his cruelty by the manner of his death, so he punished his pride by the instrument of it. (2.) His foolish project to avoid this disgrace nothing could be more ridiculous; his own servant must run him through, not to rid him the sooner out of his pain, but that men say not, A woman slew him. Could he think that this would conceal what the woman had done, and not rather proclaim it the more? Nay, it added to the infamy of his death, for hereby he becomes a self-murderer. Better have it said, A woman slew him, than that it should be said, His servant slew him by his own order; yet now both have been said of him to his everlasting reproach. And it is observable, that this very thing which Abimelech was in such care to conceal, appears to have been more particularly remembered by posterity, than most passages of this history; for Joab speaks of it, as that which he expected David would reproach him with, for coming so nigh the wall, 2 Sam. 11. 21. The ignominy we seek to avoid by sin, we do but perpetuate the remembrance of.

Now the issue of all, is, that Abimelech being slain, [1.] Israel's peace was restored, and an end was put to this civil war, for they that followed him, departed every man unto his place, v. 55. [2.] God's justice was glorified, v. 56, 57. Thus God punished the wickedness of Abimelech, and of the men of Shechem, and performed Jotham's curse, for it was not a curse causeless. Thus he preserved the honor of his government, and gave a warning to all ages to expect blood for blood. The Lord is known by these judgments which he executes, when the wicked is snared in the works of his own hands. Though wickedness may prosper awhile, it will not prosper always.

CHAP. X.

In this chapter we have, I. The peaceable times Israel enjoyed under the government of two judges, Tola and Jair, v. 1-5. The troubles that ensued, v. 6-9. III. Their repentance and humiliation for sin, their prayers and reformation; and the mercy they found with God thereupon, v. 10-16. IV. Preparations made for their deliverance out of the hand of their oppressors, v. 17, 18.

1. AND after Abimelech there arose, to defend Israel, Tola the son of Puah, the son of Dodo, a man of Issachar; and he dwelt in Shamir in mount Ephraim. 2. And he judged Israel twenty and three years, and died, and was buried in Shamir. 3. And after him arose Jair a Gileadite, and judged Israel twenty and two years. 4. And he had thirty sons that rode on thirty ass-colls, and they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth-jair unto this day, which are in the land of Gilead. 5. And Jair died, and was buried in Camon.

Quiet and peaceable reigns, though the best to live in, are the worst to write of, as yielding least variety of matter for the historian to entertain his reader with; such were the reigns of these two judges, Tola and Jair, who make but a small figure, and take up but a very little room in this history. But, no doubt, they were both raised up of God to serve his country in the quality of judges, not pretending, as Abimelech had done, to the grandeur of kings, nor, like him, taking the honour they had to themselves, they were called of God to it.

1. Concerning Tola, it is said, that he arose after Abimelech to defend Israel, v. 1. After Abimelech had debauched Israel by his wickedness, disquieted and disturbed them by his restless ambition, and, by the miscarries he brought on them, exposed them to enemies from abroad, God appointed this good man to appear for the reforming of abuses, the putting down of idolatry, the appeasing of tumults, and the healing of the wounds given to the state by Abimelech's usurpation. Thus he saved them from themselves, and guarded them against their enemies. He was of the tribe of Issachar, a tribe disposed to serve, for he bowed his shoulder: v. 2, (Gen. 49. 14, 15.) and one of that tribe, there raised up to rule: for these that humble themselves, shall be exalted. He bore the name of him that was ancestor to the first family of that tribe; of the sons of Issachar, Tola was the first, Gen. 46. 13. Numb. 26. 23. It signifies a worm, yet being the name of his ancestor, he was not ashamed of it. Though he was of Issachar, yet, when he was raised up to the government, he came and dwelt in mount Ephraim, which was more in the heart of the country, that the people might the more conveniently resort to him for judgment. He judged Israel twenty-three years; (v. 2.) kept things in good order, but did not any thing very memorable.

2. Jair was a Gileadite, so was his next successor Jephthah, both of that half tribe of the tribe of Manasseh, which lay on the other side Jordan; through they seemed separated from their brethren, yet God took care, while the honour of the government was shifted from tribe to tribe, and before it settled in Judah, that they who lay remote, should sometimes share in it, putting more abundant honour on that part which lacked. Jair bore the name of a very famous man of the same tribe, who in Moses' time was very active in reducing this country, Numb. 22. 41. Josh. 13. 30. That which is chiefly remarkable concerning this Jair, is, the increase and honour of his family, he had thirty sons, v. 4. And, (1.) They had good preemptions, for they rode on thirty ass-colls; that is, they were judges itinerant, who, as deputies to their father, rode from place to place in their several circuits to administer justice. We find afterward that Samuel made his sons judges, though he could not make them good ones, 1 Sam. 8. 1-3. (2.) They had good possessions; every one a city, out of those that were called, from their ancestor, of the same name with their father, Havoth-jair; the villages of Jair; yet they are called cities, either because those young gentlemen to whom they were assigned, enlarged and fortified them, and so improved them into cities; or because they were as well pleased with their lot in those country towns, as if they had been cities compact together, and fenced with gates and bars. Villages are cities to a contented mind.

6. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim, and Ashtaroth, and the gods of Syria, and the gods of Zidon, and the gods of Moab, and the gods of the children of Ammon, and the gods of the Philistines, and forsook the Lord, and served not him. 7. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hands of the Philistines, and into the hands of the children of Ammon. 8. And that year they vexed and oppressed the children of Israel eighteen years, all the children of Israel that were on the other side Jordan, in the land of the Amorites, which is in Gilead: 9. (Moreover, the children of Ammon passed over Jordan to fight also against Judah, and against Benjamin, and against the house of Ephraim;) so that Israel was sore distressed.

While those two judges, Tola and Jair, preside in the affairs of Israel, things went well, but afterward,

1. Israel returned to their idolatry, that sin which did most easily beset them; (v. 6.) they did evil again in the sight of the Lord from whom they were unaccountably taken backside, as a foolish people and worse.

1. They worshipped many gods; not only their old demons Baalim and Ashtaroth, which the Canaanites had worshipped, but, as if they would proclaim their folly to all their neighbours, they served the gods of Syria, Zidon, Moab, Ammon, and the Philistines. It looks as if the chief trade of Israel were to import deities from all countries. It is hard to say, whether it was more impious or impotic to do this. By introducing these foreign deities, they rendered themselves mean and despicable, for no nation that had any sense of honour, changed their gods. Much of the wealth of Israel, we may suppose, was carried out, in offerings to the temples of the deities in the several countries, when they came, on which, as their mother-churches, their temples in Israel were expected to own dependence; the priests and ministers of those sorry deities would follow their gods, no doubt, in crowds into the land of Israel, and if they could not live in their own country, would take root there, and so "strangers would devour their strength." If they did it in compliment to the neighbouring nations, and to ingratiate themselves with them, justly were they disappointed; for those nations which by their wicked arts they sought to make their friends, by the righteous judgments of God became their enemies and oppressors. In quo quia fœcax, in eo fœnitra—Wherewith a person offends, therein he shall be punished.

2. They did not so much as admit the God of Israel to be one of these many deities they worshipped, but quite cast him off; they forsook the Lord, and served not him at all. Those that think to serve both God and mammon, will soon come entirely to forsake God, and to serve mammon only. If God have not all the heart, he will soon have none of it.

II. God renewed his judgments upon them, bringing them under the power of oppressing enemies. Had they fallen into the hands of the Lord immediately, they might have found that his mercies were great; but God let them fall into the hand of man, whose tender mercies are cruel; he sold them into the hand of the Philistines, that lay south-west of Canaan, and of the Ammonites that lay north-east, both at the same time; so that between these two millstones they were miserably crushed, as the original word is, (v. 8.) for oppreßed. God has appointed that if any of the cities of Israel should revolt to Jabesh, the rest should make war upon them, and cut them off; Deut. 13. 12. &c. They had been addicted to the wars of the Philistines that lay south-west of Canaan, and of the Ammonites that lay north-east, both at the same time; so that between these two millstones they were miserably crushed, as the original word is, (v. 8.) for oppressed.

God has appointed that if any of the cities of Israel should revolt to Jabesh, the rest should make war upon them, and cut them off; Deut. 13. 12. &c. They had been addicted to the wars of the Philistines that lay south-west of Canaan, and of the Ammonites that lay north-east, both at the same time; so that between these two millstones they were miserably crushed, as the original word is, (v. 8.) for oppressed.

God has appointed that if any of the cities of Israel should revolt to Jabesh, the rest should make war upon them, and cut them off; Deut. 13. 12. &c. They had been addicted to the wars of the Philistines that lay south-west of Canaan, and of the Ammonites that lay north-east, both at the same time; so that between these two millstones they were miserably crushed, as the original word is, (v. 8.) for oppressed.

18. They were grown very bad, that when one city was infected with idolatry, the next took the infection, and instead of punishing it, imitated and outdid it; and therefore since they that should have been revengers to execute wrath on them that did this evil, were themselves guilty, or bore the sword in vain, God brought the neighbouring nations upon them to chastise them for their apostasy.

The oppression of Israel by the Ammonites, the posterity of Lot, was, 1. Very long; it continued eighteen years. Some make these years to be part of the judgeship of Jair, who could not prevail to reform and deliver Israel as he would. Others make them to commence at the death of Jair, which seems the more probable, because that part of Israel which was most infested by the Ammonites, was Gilead, Jair's own country, which we can not suppose to have suffered so much while he was living; and part at least would be reformed and protected. 2. Very grievous; they vexed them and oppressed them. It was a great vexation to be oppressed by such a despicable people as the children of Ammon were. They began with those tribes that lay next to them on the other side Jordan, here called the land of the Amorites, (v. 8.) because the Israelites were so wretchedly degenerated, and had made themselves so like the heathen, that they were become, in a manner, perfect Amorites, Ezek. 16. 3. Or, because by their sin they forfeited their title to this land, so that it might justly be looked upon as the land of the Amorites again, from whom they took it. But by degrees they pushed forward, came over Jordan, and invaded Judah, and Benjamin, and Ephraim, (v. 9.) three of the most famous tribes of Israel; yet thus insulted by them, when they had forsaken God, and proved how much they needed him. Now the threatening was fulfilled, that they should be slain before their enemies, and should have no power to stand before them, Lev. 26. 17, 37. Their ways and their doings procure this to themselves; they are sadly degenerated, and so they come to be sorely distressed.

10. And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, saying, We have sinned against thee, both because we have forsaken our God, and also served Baalim. 11. And the Lord said unto the children of Israel, Did not I deliver you from the Egyptians, and from the Amorites, from the children of Ammon, and from the Philistines? 12. The Zidonians also, and the Amalekites, and the Moabites, did oppress you; and ye cried to me, and I delivered you out of their hand. 13. Yet ye have forsaken me, and served other gods: wherefore I will deliver you no more. 14. Go and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen; let them deliver you in the time of your tribulation. 15. And the children of Israel said unto the Lord, We have sinned, do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee; deliver us only, we pray thee, this day. 16. And they put away the strange gods from among them, and served the Lord: and his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel. 17. Then the children of Ammon were gathered together, and encamped in Gilead: and the children of Israel assembled themselves together, and encamped in Mizpeh. 18. And the people and princes of Gilead said one to another, What man is he that will begin to fight against the children of Ammon? he shall be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.

God in their distress, v. 10. Now they own themselves guilty, like a malefactor upon the rack, and promise reformation, like a child under the rod. They did not only complain of the distress, but acknowledged it was their own sin that had brought them into the distress; therefore God was righteous, and they had no reason to repine. They confess their omissions, for in them their sin began, "We have forsaken our God;" and their commissions, and what they had served Baal, and beloved the idolatrously, did foolishly, treating God wickedly.

II. An humbling message which God thereupon sends to Israel; whether, by an angel, (as ch. 2. 1.) or by a prophet, (as ch. 6. 8.) not certain. It was kind that God took notice of their cry, and did not turn a deaf ear to it, and send them no answer at all; it was kind likewise that when they began to repent, he sent them such a message as was proper to further and promote their repentance, that they might be qualified and prepared for deliverance. Now in this message, 1. He upbraids them with their great ingratitude, reminds them of the great things he had done for them, delivering them from such and such enemies; the Egyptians first, out of whose land they were rescued; the Amorites whom they conquered, and into whose land they entered; and let their inheritance not be here. The Amorites had joined with the Moabites to oppress them, (ch. 3. 13.) when the Philistines were vexatious in the days of Shangr, and afterward other enemies had given them trouble; upon the petition, God had wrought many a great salvation for them, v. 11, 12. Of their being oppressed by the Zidonians and the Maonites we read not elsewhere; God had in justice corrected them, and in mercy delivered them, and therefore might have been charged that either through fear or through love they would have adhered to him and his service; well therefore might the word cut them to the heart, (v. 13.) yet ye have forsaken me that have brought you out of your troubles, and served other gods that brought you into your troubles. Thus did they forsake their own mercies for their own delusions. 2. He shows them how justly he might now abandon them to ruin, by abandoning them to the gods that they had served. To awaken them to a thorough repentance and reformation, he lets them see, (1.) Their folly in serving Baalim; they had been at a vast expense to obtain the favour of such gods as could not help them, then when they had most need of their help. "Go, and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen," (v. 14.) try what they can do for you now; you have worshipped them as gods, try if they have now either a divine power, or a divine goodness, to be employed for you; you paid your homage to them as your kings and Lords, try if they will now protect you; you brought your sacrifices of praise to their altars as your benefactors, imagining that they gave you corn, and wine, and oil; but a friend indeed will be a friend in need. The plea of their favour stand you in now." Note, It is necessary every nation should consider, that there be a full conviction of the utter insufficiency of all these things to help us and do us any kindness, which we have idolized and set upon the throne in our hearts in competition with God. We must be convinced that the pleasures of sense on which we have doted, cannot be our satisfaction, nor the wealth of the world which we have coveted, sure we were never happy in any where but in God. (2.) Their misery and danger in forsaking God. "See what a pass you have brought yourselves to; now you can expect no other than that I should say, I will deliver you no more; and what will become of you then?" v. 13.

This he tells them, not only as what he might do, but as what he would do, if they rested in a confidence of what they had done amiss, and did not put away their idols, and amend for the future.

III. An humble submission which Israel hereupon made to God's justice, with an humble application to his mercy; (v. 15.) The children of Israel met together, it is probable, in a solemn assembly at the door of the tabernacle; received the impressions of the message God had sent them; were not driven by it to despair, though it was very threatening; but resolved to lie at the Lord's feet, and if they perish, they will perish there. They did not only repent, but confessed, We have sinned; but, 1. They surrender themselves to God's justice, Do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee. Hereby they own that they deserved the severest tokens of God's displeasure, and were sure he could do them no wrong, whatever he laid upon them; they humbled themselves under his mighty and heavy hand, and acknowledged the punishment of their iniquity, which Moses had made the condition of God's return in mercy to them, Lev. 26. 40. Note, True penitents dare and will refer themselves to God to correct them as he thinks fit, knowing that their sin is highly malignant in its deserts, and that God is not rigorous or extreme in his demands. 2. They supplicate for God's mercy, and implore that, Deliver us, and we will again serve thee, and do this enemy. They acknowledge that they deserved, yet pray to God not to deal with them according to their deserts. Note, We must submit to God's justice, with a hope in his mercy.

IV. A blessed reformation set on foot hereupon. They brought forth fruits meet for repentance; (v. 16.) they put away the gods of strangers, (as the word is,) strange gods, and worshipped by these nations, that were enemies to the commonwealth of Israel, and to the covenant of promise; and they served the Lord. Need drove them to him. They knew it was to no purpose to go to the gods whom they had served, and therefore return to the God whom they had slighted. This is true repentance, not only for sin, but from sin.

V. God's gracious return in mercy to them, which is expressed here very tenderly; (v. 16.) His soul was grievous for the misery of his people; and therefore there is any grief in God, he has infinite joy and happiness in himself, which cannot be broken in upon by either the sins or the miseries of his creatures; not that there is any change in God, he is in one mind, and who can turn him? But his goodness is his glory; by it he proclaims his name, and magnifies it above all his name; and as he is pleased to put himself into the relation of a father to his people that are in covenant with him, so he is pleased to represent his goodness to them, by the compassions of a father toward his children; for as he is the Father of lights, so he is the Father of mercies; as the disobedience and misery of a child are a grief to a tender father, and make him feel very sensibly from his natural affection, so the provocations of God's people make him sensible of his being father to those he is joined with their yıkish heart: (Ezek. 6. 3.) which all these troubles also are a grief to him; so he is pleased to speak when he is pleased to appear for the deliverance of his people; changing his way and method of proceeding, as tender parents, when they begin to relent toward their children with whom they have been displeased. Such are the tender mercies of our God, and so far is he from having any pleasure in the destruction of sinners.

VI. Things are now working toward their deliverance from the Ammonites' oppression, v. 17, 18. God had said, "I will deliver you no more;" but now they are not what they were, they are other men, they are new men, and now he will deliver them. That threatening was denounced, to convince and humble them; and now that it had taken its desired effect, it is revoked, in order to their deliverance. 1. The Ammonites are hardened to their own ruin; they gathered together in one body, that they might be destroyed at one blow, Rev. 16. 16. 2. The Israelites are animated to their own rescue. They assembled likewise, v. 17. During their eighteen years' oppression, as in their former servitudes, they were run down by their enemies, because they would not incorporate; each family, city, or tribe, would stand by itself, and act independently, and so they all became an easy prey to the oppressors, for want of a due sense of a common interest to cement them; but whenever they got together, they did well; so they did here. When God's Israel became as one man to advance a common good, and oppose a common enemy, what difficulty had they before them? The people and princes of Gilead being met, consult first about a general that should command in chief against the Ammonites. Hitherto most of the deliverers of Israel had an extraordinary call to the office, as Ehud, Barak, Gideon; but the next is to be called in a more common way, by a convention of the states, who inquired out a fit man to command their army, found one admirably well qualified for the purpose, and God owned their choice by putting his Spirit upon him, ch. 11. 29. So that this instance is of use for direction and encouragement in after ages, when extraordinary calls are no longer to be expected. Let such be impartially chosen to public trust and power, whom God has qualified, and then God will graciously own those who are thus chosen.

CHAP. XI.

This chapter gives us the history of Jephthah, another of Israel's judges, and numbered among the worthies of the Old Testament, chap. 11. 32. though he had not such an extraordinary call as the rest there mentioned had. Here is, I. The disadvantages of his rise and original, v. 1. 3. II. The Gileadites' choice of him to be commander in chief against the Ammonites, and the terms he made with them, v. 4. 11. III. His treaty with the king of Ammon about the rights of the two nations, that the matter might be determined, if possible, without bloodshed, v. 12. 28. IV. His war with the Ammonites, which he entered upon with a small force, v. 29. 31. he prosecutes with bravery, v. 32. and ends with a glorious victory, v. 33. V. The straits he was brought into at his return to his own house, by the vow he had made, v. 34. 40.

1. NOW Jephthah the Gileadite was a mighty man of valour, and he was the son of a harlot: and Gilead begat Jephthah. 2. And Gilead's wife bare him sons: and his wife's sons grew up, and they thrust out Jephthah, and said unto him, Thou shalt not inherit in our father's house; for thou art the son of a strange woman. 3. Then Jephthah fled from his brethren, and dwelt in the land of Tob; and there were gathered vain men to Jephthah, and went out with him.

The princes and people of Gilead we left in the close of the foregoing chapter, consulting about the choice of a general, being come to this resolve, that whoever would undertake to lead their forces against the children of Ammon, should by common consent be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead. The enterprise was difficult, and it was fit that so great an encouragement as this should be proposed to him that would undertake it. Now all agreed that Jephthah, the Gileadite, was a mighty man of valour, and very fit for that purpose; none so fit as he; but he lay under three disadvantages:

1. He was the son of a harlot, (v. 1.) of a strange woman, (v. 2.) one that was neither a wife nor a concubine; some think his mother was a Gentile; so Josephus, who calls him a stranger by the mother's side. An Ishmaelite, say the Jews. If his mother was a harlot, that was not his fault, however it was his disgrace. Men ought not to be reproached with any of the infelicities of their parentage or extraction, so long as they are endeavouring by their personal merits to roll away the reproach. The son of a harlot, if born again, born from above, shall be accepted of God, and be as welcome as any other to the glorious liberties of his children. Jephthah could not read in the law the brand there put on the Ammonites, the enemies he was to grapple with, that they should not enter into the congregation of the Lord, but in the same paragraph he met with that which looked back upon himself, that a bastard should be in like manner excluded, Deut. 23. 2, 3. But if that law means, as most probably it does, only those that are born of incest, not of fornication, he was not within the reach of it.

2. He had been driven from his country by his brethren. His father's legitimate children, insisting upon the rigour of the law, thrust him out of having any inheritance with them, without any consideration had of his extraordinary qualifications, which merited a dispensation, and would have made him a mighty strength and ornament of their family, if they had overlooked his being illegitimate, and admitted him to a child's part. v. 2. One would not have thought this abandoned youth was intended to be Israel's deliverer and judge, but God often humbles those whom he designs to exalt, and makes that stone the head of the corner which the builders refused; so Joseph, Moses, and David, the three most eminent of the shepherds of Israel, were all thrust out by men, before they were called of God to their great offices.

3. He had, in his exile, headed a rabble, v. 3. Being driven out by his brethren, his great soul would not suffer him either to dig, or beg, but by his sword he must live; and being soon noted for his bravery, those that were reduced to such straits and animated by such a spirit, enlisted themselves under him. Vain men they are here called, that is, men that had run through their estates and were to seek for a livelihood, those that went out with him, not to rob or plunder, but to hunt wild beasts, and perhaps to make incursions upon these countries which Israel was entitled to, but were not as yet come to the possession of, or were some way or other injured by.

This is the man that must save Israel. That people had by their idolatry made themselves children of whoresoms, and aliens from God and his covenant, and therefore, though God upon their repentance will deliver them, yet, to modify them and remind them of their sin, he chooses to do it by a bastard and an exile.

4. And it came to pass in process of time, that the children of Ammon made war against Israel. 5. And it was so, that when the children of Ammon made war against Israel, the elders of Gilead went to fetch Jephthah out of the land of Tob: 6. And they said unto Jephthah, Come, and be our captain, that we may fight with the children of Ammon. 7. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, Did not ye hate me, and expel me out of my father's house? And why are ye come unto me now when ye are in distress?

8. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, Therefore we turn again to thee now, that thou mayest go with us, and fight against the children of Ammon, and be our head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.

9. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, If ye bring me home again to fight against the children of Ammon, and the Lord deliver them before me, shall I be your head?

10. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, The Lord be witness between us, if we do not so according to thy words.

11. Then Jephthah went with the elders of Gilead, and the people made him head and captain over them: and Jephthah uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh.

Here is,

I. The distress which the children of Israel were in upon the Ammonites' invasion of their country, v. 4. Probably this was the same invasion with that mentioned, ch. 10. 17, when the children of Ammon were gathered together, and encamped in or against Gilead. And those words, in process of time, refer to what goes immediately before the expulsion of Jephthah: many days after he had been thus thrust out in disgrace, was he fetched back again with honour.

II. The court which the elders made to Jephthah hereupon to come and help them. They did not write or send a messenger to him, but went themselves to fetch him, resolving to have no denial, and the exigence of the case was such as would admit no delay. Their errand to him was, (v. 6.) Come, and be our captain. They knew none among themselves that was able to undertake that great trust, but do in effect confess themselves unfit for it; they knew him to be a stout man, and incensed to the sword, and therefore he must be the man. See how God prepares men for the service he designs them for, and makes their troubles work for their advancement. If Jephthah had not been put to his shifts, by his brethren's unkindness, he had not had such an occasion as that gave him, to exercise and improve his martial genius, and so to signalize himself and become famous; Out of the eater comes forth meat. The children of Israel were assembled and encamped, ch. 10. 17. But an army without a general, is like a body without a head, therefore, Come, say they, and be our captain, that we may fight. See the necessity of government; though they were hearty enough in all, yet they did not fight without a captain to command them. So necessary is it to all societies, that there be a prince pretern, and a prince subditus, some to rule, and others to obey, and that a community should humbly beg the favour of being commanded, rather than that every man should be his own master. Blessed be God for government, for a good government!

III. The objections Jephthah made against accepting their offer; (v. 7.) Did ye not hate me, and expel me? It should seem that his brethren were some of these elders; or these elders, by suffering his brethren to abuse him, and not righting him as they ought to have done, (for their business is to defend the poor and fatherless, Ps. 82. 3, 4;) had made themselves guilty of this expulsion, and he might justly charge them with it. Magistrates that have power to protect those that are injured, if they do not do them right, really do them wrong. "You hated me and expelled me, and therefore how can I believe that you are sincere in your proposal? And how can you expect that I should do you any service? Not but that Jephthah was very willing to serve his country, but he thought fit to give them a hint of their former misconduct, that they might repent of their sin in using him so ill, and might for the future be the more sensible of their obligations. Thus Joseph humbled his brethren before he made himself known to them. The particular case between the Gileadites and Jephthah, was a resemblance of the general state of the case between Israel and God at this time: they rebelled against their God, by rejecting the blessing which they had, and in their distress they begged his help; he told them a how justly he might have rejected them, and yet graciously delivered them. So did Jephthah. Many sight God and good men, till they come to be in distress, and then they are desirous of God's mercy and good men's prayers.

IV. Their urgency with him to accept the government they offered him, v. 8. Therefore because we forsook thee, didst thou think that we would do thee no good? for we repent of it, and would gladly stone for it, we turn again to thee now, to put such an honour upon thee as shall balance that indignity. Let this instance be, 1. A caution to us not to despise or trample upon any because they are mean, or to be injurious to any that we have advantage against, because, whatever we think of them now, the time may come when we may have need of them, and would be glad to be beholden to them. It is our wisdom to make no man our enemy, because we know not how soon our distresses may be such, as that we may be highly concerned to make him our friend.

2. An encouragement to men of worth that are slighted and ill treated; let them bear it with meekness and cheerfulness, and leave it to God to make their light shine out of obscurity. Fuller's remark on this story in his Psalms-Sight, is this; Virtue once in an age will work our own advancement, and when such as hate it chance to need it, they will be forced to prefer it, and then the honour will appear the brighter.

V. The bargain he makes with them. He had mentioned the injuries they had formerly done him, but perceiving their repentance, his spirit was too great and generous to mention them any more. God had forgiven Israel the affronts they had done him, (ch. 10. 18;) and therefore Jephthah will forgo give. Only he thinks it prudent to make his bargain wisely for the future, since he deals with men that he had reason to distrust. 1. He puts to them a fair question, v. 9. He speaks not with too much confidence of his success, knowing how justly God might suffer the Ammonites to prevail for the further punishment of Israel; but puts an if upon it. Nor does he speak with any confidence at all in himself; if he had not such an assurance as that gave him, to exercise and improve his martial genius, and so to signalize himself and become famous; Out of the eater comes forth meat. The children of Israel were assembled and encamped, ch. 10. 17. But an army without a general, is like a body without a head, therefore, Come, say they, and be our captain, that we may fight. See the necessity of government; though they were hearty enough in all, yet they did not fight without a captain to command them. So necessary is it to all societies, that there be a prince pretern, and a prince subditus, some to rule, and others to obey, and that a community should humbly beg the favour of being commanded, rather than that every man should be his own master. Blessed be God for government, for a good government!

2. He speaks not against God in threatening them; He will give them into your hand; in the same part of the sentence as if he had said, (ch. 10. 30;) and therefore Jephthah will forgo give. Only he thinks it prudent to make his bargain wisely for the future, since he deals with men that he had reason to distrust. 1. He puts to them a fair question, v. 9. He speaks not with too much confidence of his success, knowing how justly God might suffer the Ammonites to prevail for the further punishment of Israel; but puts an if upon it. Nor does he speak with any confidence at all in himself; if he had not such an assurance as that gave him, to exercise and improve his martial genius, and so to signalize himself and become famous; Out of the eater comes forth meat. The children of Israel were assembled and encamped, ch. 10. 17. But an army without a general, is like a body without a head, therefore, Come, say they, and be our captain, that we may fight. See the necessity of government; though they were hearty enough in all, yet they did not fight without a captain to command them. So necessary is it to all societies, that there be a prince pretern, and a prince subditus, some to rule, and others to obey, and that a community should humbly beg the favour of being commanded, rather than that every man should be his own master. Blessed be God for government, for a good government!

3. He speaks not against God in threatening them; He will give them into your hand; in the same part of the sentence as if he had said, (ch. 10. 30;) and therefore Jephthah will forgo give. Only he thinks it prudent to make his bargain wisely for the future, since he deals with men that he had reason to distrust. 1. He puts to them a fair question, v. 9. He speaks not with too much confidence of his success, knowing how justly God might suffer the Ammonites to prevail for the further punishment of Israel; but puts an if upon it. Nor does he speak with any confidence at all in himself; if he had not such an assurance as that gave him, to exercise and improve his martial genius, and so to signalize himself and become famous; Out of the eater comes forth meat. See the necessity of government; though they were hearty enough in all, yet they did not fight without a captain to command them. Blessed be God for government, for a good government!
plain to need a debate, and the necessity too press ing to admit a delay; they knew they had power to conclude a treaty for those whom they represented, and therefore found it with an oath, The Lord be witness between us. They appeal to God's omniscience as the judge of their present sincerity, and to his justice as an avenger, if afterward they should prove false. The Lord be a hearer, so the word is.

Whatever we speak, it concerns us to remember that God is a witness to speak accordingly. Thus was the original contract ratified between Jephthah and the Gileadites, which all Israel, it should seem, agreed to afterward, for it is said, (ch. 12. 7.) he judged Israel. He hereupon went with them (v.
11.) to the place where they were all assembled, (ch. 10. 17.) and there, by common consent, they made him head and captain, and so ratified the bargain their representatives had made with him, that he should be not only captain now, but head fore Jephthah, to obtain this little honour, was willing to expose his life for them; (ch. 12. 3.) and shall we be discouraged in our christian warfare by any of the difficulties we may meet with in it, when Christ himself has promised a crown of life to him that overcometh?
VI. Jephthah's pious acknowledgment of God in this great affair, (v. 11.) he uttered all his words before the Lord in Michtem. That is, upon his elecvation, he immediately retired to his devotions, and in prayer spread the whole matter before God.
both his choice to the office, and his execution of the office, as one that had his eye ever toward the Lord, and would do nothing without him, that leaned not to his own understanding or courage, but depended on God and his favour. He utters before God all his thoughts and cares in this matter, for he gives us leave to be free with him. 1. "Lord, the people have made me their head; will thou confirm the choice they have made of me? Thus head under thee, and for thee?" God justly complaints of Israel, (Hos. 8. 4.) they have set up kings, but not by me; "Lord," said Jephthah, "I will be no head of their making without thee. I will not accept the government unless thou give me leave." Had Abimelech done this, he might have prosper'd. 2. "Lord, they have made me their captain, to go before them in this war with the Am-monites. How shall I prevent the reproach that will be before me? If not carry me not up hence. Lord, satisfy me in the justice of the cause. Assure me of success in the enterprise. " This is a rare example, to be imitated by all, particularly by great ones; in all our ways let us acknowledge God, seek his favour, ask counsel at his mouth, and take him along with us; so shall we make our way prosperous. Thus Jephthah opened the campaign with prayer. That was likely to end gloriously, which began piously.

12. And Jephthah sent messengers unto the king of the children of Ammon, saying, What hast thou to do with me, that thou art come against me to fight in my land?
13. And the king of the children of Ammon answered unto the messengers of Jephthah, Because Israel took away my land when they came up out of Egypt, from Arnon even unto Jabbok, and unto Jordan: now, therefore, restore those lands again peaceably. 14. And Jephthah sent messengers again unto the king of the children of Ammon, 15. And said unto him, Thus saith Jephthah, Israel took not away the land of Moab, nor the land of the children of Ammon: 16. But when Israel came up from Egypt, and walked through the wilderness unto the Red Sea, and came to Kadesh; 17. Then Israel sent messengers unto the king of Edom, saying, Let me, I pray thee, pass through thy land: but the king of Edom would not hearken thereunto. And in like manner they sent unto the king of Moab; but he would not consent: and Israel abode in Kadesh. 18. Then they went along through the wilderness, and compassed the land of Edom and the land of Moab, and came by the east side of the land of Moab, and pitched on the other side of Arnon, but came not within the border of Moab: for Arnon was the border of Moab. 19. And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, the king of Heshbon; and Israel said unto him, Let us pass, we pray thee, through thy land unto my place. 20. But Sihon trusted not Israel to pass through his coast: but Sihon gathered all his people together, and pitched in Jahaz, and fought against Israel. 21.
And the Lord God of Israel delivered Sihon and all his people into the hand of Israel, and they smote them: so Israel possessed all the land of the Amorites, the in-habitors of that country. 22. And they possessed all the coasts of the Amorites, from Arnon even unto Jabbok, and from the wilderness even unto Jordan. 23. So now the Lord God of Israel hath disposessed the Amorites from before his people Israel, and shouldest thou possess it? 24.
Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess? So whomsoever the Lord our God shall drive out from before us, them will we possess. 25.
And now, art thou any thing better than Balak the son of Zippar, king of Moab? did he ever strive against Israel, or did he ever fight against them, 26. While Israel dwelt in Heshbon and her towns, and in Aroer and her towns, and in all the cities that be along by the coasts of Arnon, three hundred years? why therefore did ye not recover them within that time? 27. Wherefore I have not sinned against thee, but thou doest me wrong to war against me: the Lord the Judge be judge this day between the children of Israel and the children of Ammon. 28. Howbeit the king of the children of Ammon hearkened not unto the words of Jephthah which he sent him.

We have here the treaty between Jephthah, now judge of Israel, and the king of the Ammonites, who is not named; that the controversy between the two nations might, if possible, be accommodated without the effusion of blood.

1. Jephthah, as one having authority, sent to the king of Ammon, who in this war was the aggressor, to demand his reasons for invading the land of Israel; (v. 12.) Why art thou come to fight against me in my land? Had I come first into thy land to destroy any person in the land, that had been reason enough for fighting against me, for how must I be repelled but by force? But what hast thou to do to come thus in a hostile manner into my land?* So he calls it, in the name both of God and Israel. Now this fair demand shows, 1. That Jephthah did not delight in war, though he was a mighty man of valour, but was willing to prevent it by a peaceable accommodation. If he could by reason persuade the invaders to retire, he would not compel them to do it by the sword. War should be the last remedy, not to be used till all other methods of ending matters in variance have been tried in vain. Ratio ultima regimen—The last resource of kings. This rule should be observed in going to law. The sword of justice, as the sword of war, must not be appealed to till the contending parties have first endeavoured by gentler means to understand one another, and to accommodate matters in variance, 1 Cor. 6, 1, 2. That Jephthah did delight in equity, and designed no other than to do justice. If the children of Ammon could convince him that Israel had done them wrong, he was ready to restore the rights of the Ammonites. If not, it was plain by their invasion that they did Israel wrong, and he was ready to maintain the rights of the Israelites. A sense of justice should guide and govern us in all our proceedings.

II. The king of the Ammonites now gives in his demand, which he should have published before he had invaded Israel, v. 13. His pretence is, Israel took away my lands long since, now therefore restore these lands. We have reason to think the Ammonites, when they made this descent upon Israel, meant no other than to spoil and plunder the country, and enrich themselves with the prey, as the Amorites done. Ego desideravi. But when no such demand as this was made, though the matter was then fresh; but when Jephthah demanded the cause of their quarrel, and they could not for shame own what was their true intent and meaning, some old forgotten records were searched, or some ancient traditions inquired into, and from them this reason is drawn to serve the present turn, for a colourable pretence of equity in the invasion. We've in that description of the Ammonites, and their conduct, a such conviction in their consciences of justice, that they would seem to do right. Restore those lands. See upon what uncertain terms we hold our worldly possessions; what we think we have the surest hold of, may be challenged from us, and wrested out of our hands. Those that are got to the heavenly Canaan, need not fear having their titles questioned.

Jephthah gives in a very full and satisfactory answer to this demand, showing it to be altogether unjust and unreasonable, and that the Ammonites had no title to this country that lay between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, now in the possession of the tribes of Reuben and Gad. As one very well versed in the history of his country, he shows,

1. That Israel never took any land away, either from the Moabites or Ammonites; he puts them together as brethren, the children of Lot, near neighbourhood of one another, having the same god, Chemosh, and perhaps sometimes the same king. The lands in question Israel took away; nor from the Moabites or Ammonites, they had particular orders from God not to meddle with them, or any thing they had, (Deut. 2, 9, 19.) and religiously observed their orders; but they found them in the possession of Sihon, King of the Amorites, and out of his hand they took them justly and honourably, as he will show afterward. If the Amorites, before Israel came into that country, had taken these lands from the Moabites or Ammonites, as it should seem they had, (Numb. 21. 26. Josh. 13. 23.) Israel was not concerned to inquire into that, or answer for it. If the Amorites had lost these lands and their title to them, the children of Israel were under no obligation to recover the possession for them. Their business was to conquer for themselves, not for other people. This is the first plea, Not guilty of the trespass.

2. That they were so far from invading the property of any other nations than those of the devoted posterity of accursed Canaan, (one of the branches of which the Amorites were, Gen. 10. 16.) that they would not so much as force a passage through the country, either through Edom, the seed of Esau, or of the Moabites, the seed of Lot, after a very tedious march through the wilderness, with which they were so badly tired, (v. 16.) when the king of Edom first, and afterward the king of Moab, denied them the courtesy of a way through their country, (v. 17.) rather than give them any offence or annoyance, weary as they were, they put themselves to the further labour of compassing both the land of Edom and that of Moab, and came not within the border of either, v. 18. Note, Those that conduct themselves insensibly, may take the comfort of it, and plead it against those that charge them with injustice and wrong doing. Our righteousness will answer for us in time to come, (Gen. 30. 33.) and will put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. 2. 15.

3. That in that war in which they took this land out of the hands of Sihon, king of the Amorites, he was the aggressor, and not they, v. 12. 20. They sent a humble petition to him, for leave to go through his land, willing to give him any security for their good behaviour in their march; Let us pass (say they) unto my place, that is, to the land of Canaan; that is the only place we call ours, and to which we are pressing forward, not designing a settlement here. But Sihon not only denied them this courtesy, as Edom and Moab had done, (had he only done so, who knows but Israel might have gone about some other way?) but he mustered all his forces, and fought against Israel; (v. 20.) not only shut them out of his own land, but would have cut them off from the face of the earth; (Numb. 21. 23, 24.) aimed at nothing less than their ruin, v. 20. Israel therefore, in their war with him, stood in their own just and necessary defence, and therefore, had an heart mightily to cut the edge, in further revenge of the injury, seize the country as forfeited; so Israel came to the possession of this country, and doubted not to make good their title to it; and it is very unreasonable for the Ammonites to question their title, for the Amorites were the inhabitants of that country, and it was purely their land and their coasts that the Israelites then made themselves masters of, v. 21.

4. He pleads a grant from the crown, and claims under that, v. 23, 24. It was not Israel, they were fatigued with their long march, and were not fit for action so soon; but it was the Lord God of Israel, who is King of nations, whose the earth is, and the fulness thereof, he it was, that dispossessed the Amorites, and planted Israel in their room. God gave it them by an express and particular conveyance, such as he did the title in them, in which they might make good against all the world, (Deut. 2. 24.) I have given into thy hand, Sihon and his land: he gave it them, by giving them, a complete victory over the present occupants, notwithstanding the great disadvantages they were under: Can you think that God gave it us in such an extraordinary manner, with design that we should return it to the Moabites or Ammonites again? No, we put a higher value upon God's favours, than to part with... them so easily." To corroborate this plea, he urges him with an argument ad hominem—directed to the one who knew whether the nations by which they were surrounded were good or bad? He not only appeals to the common resolutions of men, to hold their own against all the world, but to the common religion of the nations, which, they thought, obliged them to make much of that which their gods gave them. Not that Jephthah thought Chemosh a god, only he is thy god; and the worshippers even of those dung-ful-deities that could do neither good nor evil, yet thought themselves beheld to them, and would have, (Hos. 2. 12, These are my rewards which my lovers have given me: and see Judg. 16. 24.) and make this a reason why they would hold it fast, that their gods gave it them. "This thou thinkst a good title, and shall not we?" The Ammonites had dispossessed those that dwelt in their land before they; they thought they did it by the help of Chemosh their god, but really it was Jehovah the God of Israel, that did it for them, as is expressly said, Deut. 2. 19, 21. "Now," says Jephthah,
"we have as good a title to our country as you have to yours." Note, One instance of the honour and respect we owe to God, as our God, is, rightly to possess that which he gives us to possess, receive it from him, use it for him, keep it for his sake, and part with it when he calls for it. He has given us to possess, not to enjoy. He himself only must be enjoyed.
He keeps the title, and we enjoy the possession. Their right title had not been disputed when they first entered upon it, v. 25. "Barak, who was then king of Moab, from whom the greatest part of these lands had been taken by the Ammonites, and who was most concerned and best able to oppose us, if he only had had any thing to object against our settlement there, yet sat still, and never offered to strive against Israel." He knew that for his own part he had fairly lost it to the conquerors. A true ruler would not use the right that he could not but acknowledge that Israel had fairly won it of the Ammonites, and therefore all his care was to secure what was left, he never pretended a title to what was lost. See Numb. 21. 2, 3.
"He then acquiesced in God's way of disposing kings, and wilt not thou now?" (2.) Their possession had never been disturbed, v. 26. He pleads that they had kept this country as their own, now about three hundred years, in all that time had never attempted to take it from them, no, not when they had it in their power to oppress them, ch. 3. 12, 13. So that, supposing their title had not been clear at the first, (which yet he had proved it was,) yet no continual claim being made by so many descents, the entry of the children of Ammon, without doubt, was barred for ever. A title so long unquestioned, shall be presumed unquestionable.
6. By these arguments Jephthah justifies himself and his own cause; (v. 27.) "I have not sinned against thee in taking or keeping what I have no right to, if I had, I would instantly make restitution," and condemns the Ammonites, "Thou dost me wrong to war against me, and must expect to speed accordingly." It seems to me an evidence that the children of Israel, in the days of their prosperity and power, (for some such days they had in the time of their own judges,) had conducted themselves very offensively to all their neighbours, and had not been vexatious, or opposing to them, (either by way of reprisal, or under colour of propagating their religion, that the king of the Ammonites, when he would seek an occasion of quarrelling with them, was forced to look three hundred years back for a pretence. It becomes the people of God thus to be blameless and harmless, and without rebuke.
7. For the deciding of the controversy, he puts himself upon God and his sword, and the king of Ammon joined issue with him; (v. 27, 28.) The Lord the Judge be Judge this day. With this so lem reference of the matter to the Judge of heaven and earth, Jephthah (which means He that is secu-ites from proceeding, and oblige them to retire, when they saw the right of the cause was against them, or to justify himself in subduing them, if they should go on. Note, War is an appeal to heaven, to God the Judge of all, to whom the issues of it belong. If doubtful rights be disputed, he is th.e only by requested to determine them: if manifest rights be invaded or denied, he is thereby applied to for the vindication of them; to settle all controversies of wrong. As the sword of justice was made for lawless and disobedient persons, (1 Tim. 1. 9.) so was the sword of war made for lawless and disobedient princes and nations. In war therefore the eye must be ever up to God, and it must always be thought a dangerous thing to desire or expect that God should patronise unrighteousness.
Neither Jephthah's apology, nor his appeal, worthed upon the king of the children of Ammon;
they had found the secrets of the spoil of Israel, in the eighteen years wherein they had oppressed them, (ch. 10. 8.) and hoped now to make them selves masters of the tree which they had so often enriched themselves with the fruit of. He heartened not to the words of Jephthah, his heart being hardened to his destruction.
29. Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah; and he passed over Gilead and Manasseh, and passed over Mizpah Gilead, and from Mizpah of Gilead he passed over unto the children of Ammon. 30. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, 31. Then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering. 32. So Jephthah passed over unto the children of Ammon, to fight against them; and the Lord delivered them into his hands. 33. And he smote them from Aroer, even till thou come to Minuth. even twenty cities, and unto the plain of the vineyards, with a very great slaughter. Thus the children of Ammon were subdued before the children of Israel. 34. And Jephthah came to Mizpah unto his house, and behold, his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances; and she was his only child:
besides her he had neither son nor daughter.
35. And it came to pass, when he saw her, that he rent his clothes, and said, Alas, my daughter! thou hast brought me very low, and thou art one of them that trouble me:
for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back. 36. And she said unto him, My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which hath proceeded out thy mouth; forasmuch as the Lord hath taken vengeance for thee of thine enemies, even of the children of Ammon. 37. And she said unto her father, Let this thing be done for me: Let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains, and bewail my virginity, I and my maidens. 38. And he said, Go. And he sent her away for two months; and she went with her companions, and bewailed her virginity upon the mountains. 39. And it came to pass, at the end of two months, that she returned unto her father, who did with her according to his vow which he had vowed: and she knew no man. And it was a custom in Israel, 40. That the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in a year.

We have here Jephthah triumphing in a glorious victory, but, as an allay to his joy, troubled and distressed by an unavoidable vow.

I. Jephthah’s victory was clear, and shines very bright, both to his honour, and to the honour of God, his in pleading, and God’s in owning, a righteous cause.

1. God gave him an excellent spirit, and he used it bravely, v. 39. Then when it appeared by the people’s unanimous choice of him for their leader, that he had so clear a call from God confirmed in him his office, and assured him of success in his undertaking. Thus animated, he loses no time, but with an undaunted resolution takes the field. Particular notice is taken of the way by which he advanced towards the enemies’ camp, probably, because the choice of it was an instance of that extraordinary direction with which the Spirit of the Lord had furnished him; for those who sincerely walk after the spirit, shall be led forth the right way.

2. God gave him eminent success, and he bravely improved that too; (v. 32.) The Lord delivered the Ammonites into his hand, and gave judgment upon the appeal in favour of the righteous cause, and made these feel the force of war, that would not yield to the force of reason, for he sits in the throne, judging right. Jephthah lost not the advantages given him, but pursued and completed his victory, and having routed their forces in the field, he pursued them to their cities, where he put to the sword all he found in arms, so as utterly to disable them to give Israel any molestation, v. 33. But it does not appear that he utterly destroyed the people, as Joshua had done those of the devoted nations, or that he offered to make himself master of the country, though their pretensions to the land of Israel’s inheritance routed their forces in the field, he took care that they should be brought into subjection. Though others’ attempting wrong to us, will justify us in the defence of our own right, yet it will not authorize us to do them wrong.

II. Jephthah’s vow is dark, and much in the clouds. When he was going out from his own house, upon this hazardous undertaking, in prayer to God for his presence with him, he makes a secret but solemn vow, or religious promise to God, that if God would graciously bring him back a conqueror, whosoever, or whatevsoever, should first come out of his house to meet him, it should be devoted to God, and offered up for a burnt-offering; at his return, tidings of his victory coming home before him, his own and only daughter meets him with the seasonable tidings of his triumphs; but Jephthah had reason enough to be confident of success, especially when he found the Spirit of the Lord come upon him; and yet now that it came to the setting, he seems to hesitate; (v. 30.) If thou shalt without fail deliver them into my hand, then I will do so and so. And perhaps the snare into which his vow brought him, was designed to correct the weakness of his faith; and a fond conceit he had, that he could not promise himself a victory, unless he promised something considerable to be given to God in lieu of it. (2.) That yet it is very good, when we are in the pursuit or expectation of any mercy, to make vows to God of some instance of acceptable service to him, not as a purchase of the favour we desire, but as an expression of our gratitude to him, and the deep sense we have of our obligations to render according to the benefit done to us. The matter of such a singular vow (Lev. 27. 2.) must be something that has a plain and direct tendency, either to the advancement of God’s glory, and the interests of his kingdom among men, or to the furtherance of himself in his service, and in that which is antecedently our duty. (3.) That we have great need to be very cautious, and well advised, in the making of such vows, lest, by indulging a present emotion even of pious zeal, we entangle our own consciences, involve ourselves in perplexities, and are forced at last to say before the angel that it was an error, Eccl. 5. 2-6. It is a snare to a man, hastily to devour that which is holy, without due consideration, (quid valeant humeri, quid ferre recusen—what we are able to effect,) and without inserting the needful provisos and limitations which might prevent the entanglement, and then after vows to make the inquiry which should have been made before, Lev. 26. 27. Let God be our warning in this matter. See Deut. 29. 22. (4.) That what we have solemnly vowed to God, we must conscientiously perform, if it be possible and lawful, though it be ever so difficult and grievous to us. Jephthah’s sense of the powerful obligation of his vow must always be our’s (v. 35.) I have opened my mouth unto the Lord in a solemn vow, and I cannot go back; that is, “I cannot recall the vow I have made to myself, or to any other in the earth, and dispense with it, or give me up my bond. The thing was mine own, and in mine own power, (Acts 5. 4.) but now it is not.” Vow and pay, Ps. 76. 11. We deceive ourselves, if we think to mock God. If we apply this to the consent we have solemnly given in our sacramental vows to the covenant of grace, made with poor sinners in Christ, what a powerful argument will it be against the sins we have vowed, and against our own revolt from, and what a strong inducement to the duties we have thereby bound ourselves up to, and what a ready answer to every temptation! “I have opened my mouth to the Lord, and I cannot go back; I must therefore go forward: I have sworn, and I must, I will, perform it. Let me not dare to play fast and loose with God.” (5.) That it well becomes children, obediently and cheerfully to submit to their parents in the Lord, and particularly to comply with their pious resolutions for the honour of God, and the keeping up of religion in their families, though they be harsh and severe, as Rechab-ites, who for many generations religiously observed the commands of Jonadab their father in forbearing wine, and Jephthah's daughter here, who, for the satisfying of her father's conscience, and for the honour of God and her country, yielded herself as one devoted; (v. 36.) Do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth; I know I am dear to thee, but am well content that God should be dearer. The father might not disallow and venerate the daughter, (v. 36.) but the daughter could not disallow or disannul, no, not such a vow as this, made by the father. This magnifies the law of the fifth commandment. (6.)
That our friends' grievances should be our griefs.
Where she went to bewail her hard fate, the vir-gins, her companions, joined with her in her lamentations, v. 38. With those of her own sex and age she used to associate, who, no doubt, now that her father was of a sudden grown so great, expected, shortly after his return, to dance at her wedding, but were heavily disappointed, when they were called to retire to the mountains with her and share in her griefs. Those are unworthy of the name of friends, that will only rejoice with us, and not weep with us. (7.) That heroic zeal for the honour of God and Israel, though alloyed with infirmity of body, and want of years, was not in perpetual remembrance. It well became the daughters of Israel, by an annual solemnity to preserve the honourable memory of Jephthah's daughter, who made light even of her own life, like a noble heroine, when God had taken vengeance of Israel's enemies, v. 36. Such a rare instance of one that preferred the public interest before life itself, was never to be forgotten. Her sex forbid her to follow the example of Jephthah's daughter in her honour to die, not as a sacrifice of atonement for the people's sins, (that honour was reserved for Christ only,) but as a sacrifice of acknowledgment for the people's mercies. (8.) From Jephthah's concern on this occasion, we must learn not to think it strange if the day of our triumphs in this world proves upon some account or other the day of our griefs, and therefore must rejoice with trembling!
we hope for a day of triumph hereafter which will have no allay. 2. Yet there are some difficult questions that do arise upon this story, which have very much employed the pens of learned men; I will say but little to them, because Mr. Poole has discussed them very fully in his English annotations.
(1.) It is hard to say, what Jephthah did to his daughter when he offered up this vow. [1.] Some think he only shut her up for a nun, and that it being unlawful, according to one part of his vow, (for they make it disjunctive,) to offer her up for a burnt-offering, he thus, according to the other part, engaged her to be the Lord's, that is, totally to sequester herself from all the affairs of this life, and consequently from marriage, and to employ herself wholly in the acts of devotion all her days. This which counterposes this opinion, is, that she is said to bewail her virginity, (v. 37, 33.) and that she knew no man, v. 39. But if he sacrificed her, it was proper enough for her to bewail, not her death, because that was intended to be for the honour of God, and she would undergo it cheerfully, but that unhappy circumstance of it, which made it more great to her than to any other, because she was the father's only child, in whom he hoped his name and family would have been built up; that she was unmarried, and so left no issue to inherit her father's honour and estate; therefore that is it that is particularly taken notice of, (v. 34.) that beside her he had neither son nor daughter. But that which makes me think Jephthah did not go about thus to save his vow or event it rather, is, that we do not find any law, usage, or custom, but his the Old Testament, which does in the least intimate that a single life was any branch or article of religion, or that any person, man or woman, was looked upon as the more holy, more the Lord's, or devoted to him, for living unmarried; it was no part of the law, either of the priests, or of the Nazarites, Deborah and Huldah, both prophetesses, are both of them particularly taken notice of to be married women.
Besides, had she only been confined to a single life,
she needed not to have desired these two months bewayl it in; she had her whole life before her to do that, if she saw cause. Nor needed she to take such a bad leave of her companions; for they that are of that opinion, understand what is said, (v. 40.) of their coming to talk with her, as our margin reads it, four days in the year. Therefore, (2.) It seems reasonable to think, that this was the day of her vow, according to the letter of his vow, misunderstanding that law which spoke of persons devoted to the cause of God, as if it were to be applied as such were devoted by men's vows; (Lev. 27, 29.) None devoted shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death: and wanting to be better informed of the power the law gave him in this case to redeem her.
Abraham's attempt to offer up Isaac, perhaps, to the cause of God, was neither lawful nor proper, yet he would not accept this sacrifice which he had vowed, he would send an angel to stay his hand, as he did Abraham's; if she came out designedly to be made a sacrifice, as who knows but she might, perhaps he thought that would make the case the plainer; Volenti non sit injuria—An injury cannot be done to a person when he himself consents to it. He imagined, it may be, that where there was neither anger nor delinquency, he might offer her up, as he had been honoured to die, not as a sacrifice of atonement for
the people's sins, (that honour was reserved for Christ
only,) but as a sacrifice of acknowledgment for
the people's mercies. (8.) From Jephthah's concern
on this occasion, we must learn not to think it strange if the day of our triumphs in this world
proves upon some account or other the day of our griefs, and therefore must rejoice with trembling!
we hope for a day of triumph hereafter which will have no allay. 2. Yet there are some difficult questions that do arise upon this story, which have very much employed the pens of learned men; I will say but little
to them, because Mr. Poole has discussed them very fully in his English annotations.
(1.) It is hard to say, what Jephthah did to his daughter when he offered up this vow. [1.] Some think he only shut her up for a nun, and that it being unlawful, according to one part of his vow, (for they make it disjunctive,) to offer her up for a engaged her to be the Lord's, that is, totally to sequester herself from all the affairs of this life, and

which counterposes this opinion, is, that she is said
to bewail her virginity, (v. 37, 33.) and that she knew no man, v. 39. But if he sacrificed her, it was proper enough for her to bewail, not her death, bound by his vow, to that which God had forbidden by the letter of the sixth commandment, Thou shalt not kill. God had forbidden human sacrifices, so that it was (says Dr. Lightfoot) in effect a sacrifice to Moloch. And, probably, the reason why it is left dubious by the inspired penman, whether he sacrificed her or no, was that they who did afterwards offer their children, might not take any encouragement from this instance. Concerning this, and some other such passages in the sacred story, which learned men are in the dark, divided, and in doubt about, we need not much amuse ourselves; what is necessary to our salvation, thanks be to God, is plain enough.

CHAP. XII.

In this chapter, we have, 1. Jephthah's rencounter with the Ephraimites, and the bloodshed on that unhappy occasion, (v. 1. 6.) and the conclusion of Jephthah's life and government, v. 7. 11. A short account of three other of the judges of Israel; Ibzon, (v. 8. 10.) Elon, (v. 11. 12.) and Abdon, v. 13. 15.

1. And the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and went northward, and said unto Jephthah, Wherefore passedest thou over to fight against the children of Ammon, and didst not call us to go with thee? we will burn thine house upon thee with fire. 2. And Jephthah said unto them, I and my people were at great strife with the children of Ammon; and when I called you, ye delivered me not out of their hands. 3. And when I saw that ye delivered me not, I put my life in my hands, and passed over against the children of Ammon, and the Lord delivered them into my hand: wherefore then are ye come up unto me this day to fight against me? 4. Then Jephthah gathered together all the men of Gilead, and fought with Ephraim: and the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim among the Ephraimites, and among the Manassites. 5. And the Gileadites took the passages of Jordan before the Ephraimites: and it was so, that when those Ephraimites which were escaped, said, Let me go over, that the men of Gilead said unto him, Art thou an Ephraimite? If he said, Nay; 6. Then said they unto him, Say now Shibboleth; and he said Sibboleth: for he could not frame to pronounce it right. Then they took him, and slew him at the passages of Jordan; and there fell at that time of the Ephraimites forty and two thousand. 7. And Jephthah judged Israel six years: then died Jephthah the Gileadite, and was buried in one of the cities of Gilead.

Here is, 1. The unreasonable displeasure of the men of Ephraim against Jephthah, because he had not called them in to his assistance against the Ammonites, that they might have shared in the triumphs and spoils, v. 1. Pride was at the bottom of the quarrel; only by that comes contention. Proud men think all the honours lost, that go beside themselves, and then who can stand before envy? The Ephraimites had the same quarrel with Gideon, (ch. 8. 1.) and the same enmity against Jephthah was of Manasseh on the other side Jordan. Jephthah was of Manasseh on the other side Jordan. Ephraim and Manasseh were nearer akin than any other of the tribes, being both the sons of Joseph, and yet they were more jealous one of another than any other of the tribes. Jacob having crossed hands, and given Ephraim the preference, looking as far forward as the kingdom of the ten tribes, which Ephraim was the head of, after the revolt from the house of David, that tribe, not content with that honour in the promise, was displeased if Manasseh had any honour done it in the mean time. It is pity that kindred and relations, which should be an inducement to love and peace, should ever be an occasion (as it often proves) of strife and discord. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city, and their contentions are as the bars of a castle. The anger of the Ephraimites at Jephthah was, 1. Causeless and unjust. Why didn't thou call us to go with thee? For a good reason, because they were the men of Gilead that had made him their captain, not the men of Ephraim, so that he had no authority to call them. Had his attempt miscarried for want of their help, they might justly have blamed him for not desiring it. But when the work was done, and done effectually, the Ammonites subdued, and Israel delivered, there was no harm done, though their own countrymen were invaded: and it was cruel and outrageous. They got together in a tumultuous manner, went over Jordan as far as Mizpeh in Gilead, where Jephthah lived, and no less will satisfy their fury, but they will burn his house, and him in it. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce. Those resentments that have the least reason for them, have commonly the most rage in them. Jephthah was now the captain of the common counsels of Israel, and they should have come to congratulate him, and return him the thanks of their tribe for the good services he had done; but we must not think it strange if we receive ill from those from whom we deserve well. Jephthah was now a meurer for the calamity of his family, upon his daughter's account, and they should have come to console and comfort him; but barbarous men take a pleasure in adding affliction to the afflicted. In the world, men are more often provoking to their own ruin, than to become the instruments of their brother's deliverance. Nor must we ever be so mean as though we had put off the harness. 2. Jephthah's warm vindication of himself. He did not endeavour to pacify them, as Gideon had done in the like case; the Ephraimites were now more outrageous than they were then, and Jephthah had not so much of a meek and quiet spirit as Gideon had. Whether they would be pacified or no, Jephthah t-skes, v. 1. To justify himself, v. 2. 3. He makes it out that they had no cause to quarrel with him, for, (1.) It was not in pursuit of glory that he had engaged in this war, but for the necessary defence of his country, with which the children of Ammon greatly surfe. (2.) He had invited the Ephraimites to come and join with him, though he neither needed them, nor was under any obligation to pay that respect to them; but yet they had declined the service; I called you, and ye delivered me not out of their hands. Had that been true which they charged him with, yet it had not been a just ground of quarrel, but it seems it was false; and, as the matter of fact now appears, he had more cause to quarrel with them, for deserting the common interests of Israel in a time of need. It is no derogation to those who are themselves most culpable, to be most clamorous in accusing the innocent. (3.) The enterprise was very hazardous, and they had more re-son to pity him, than to be angry with him; I put my life in his hands; that is, "exposed myself to the utmost peril in what I did, having so small an army."

The honour they envied, was bought dear enough, they needed not to grudge it him; few of them would have ventured so far for it. (4.) He does not take glory of the success of himself, (that had been invisible,) but gives it all to God, "The Lord delivered them into mine hand. If God was pleased so far to make use of me for his glory, why should you be offended at that? Have you any reason to fight against me? Is not that in effect to fight against God, in whose hand I have been only an unworthy instrument?"

9. When this just answer (though not so soft an answer as Gideon did) did prevail to turn away their wrath, he took care both to defend himself from the fury, and to chastise their insolvency with the sword, by virtue of his authority as Israel's judge.

(1.) The Ephraimites had not only quarrelled with Jephthah, but when his neighbours and friends appeared to take his part, they had abused them, and given them fine language, for I adhere to our tradition, and take it, v. 4. They said in scorn, "Ye Gileadites that dwell here on the other side Jordan, are but fugitives of Ephraim, the scum and dregs of the tribes of Joseph, of which Ephraim is the chief, the refuse of the family, and are so accounted among the Ephraimites, and among the Manassites. Who cares for you? All your neighbours know what you are, no better than fugitives and vagabonds, separated from your brethren, and driven hither into a corner." The Gileadites were as true Israelis as any other, and at this time had signalized themselves, both in the choice of Jephthah, and in the war with Ammon, above all the families of Israel, and yet are most basely and unjustly called fugitives. It is an ill thing to fasten names or characters of reproach upon persons or countries, as is common, especially upon those who lie under outward disadvantages: it often occasions quarrels that prove of ill consequence, as it did here. See likewise what a mischievous thing an abusive tongue is, that calls ill names, and gives surburious language; it sets on fire the course of nature, and is set on fire of hell, (Jam. 3. 6.) and may a time cuts the throat of him that uses it, as it did here, Ps. 64. 8. If these Ephraimites could have deniled themselves the poor satisfactions of Gilead, the Gileadites might, in a better frame, or spirit, have prevented a great deal of bloodshed, for grievous words excite anger, and who knows how great a matter a little of that fire may kindle?

(2.) This affront raises the Gileadites' blood, and the indignity done to themselves, as well as to their captain, must be revenged. [1.] They routed them in the field, v. 4. They fought with Ephraim, and, Ephraim being but a rude uncourageable people, sent Gilead to rout them to flight. [2.] They cut off their retreat, and so completed their revenge, v. 6. The Gileadites, who perhaps were better acquainted with the passages of Jordan than the Ephraimites were, secured them with strong guards, who were ordered to slay every Ephraimit that offered to pass the river. Here was, First, Cruelty enough in the destruction of them. Sufficient surely was the Ely, which was why smote by murther when they were routed in the field, there needed not this severity to cut off all that escaped. Shall the sword devour for ever? Whether Jephthah is to be praised for this, I know not; perhaps he saw it to be a piece of necessary justice. Secondly, Cunning enough in the discovery of them. It seems the Ephraimites, though they spoke the same language with other Israelites, yet had got a custom in the dialect of their country to pronounce the Hebrew letter Shin like Samech, and they had so strangely used themselves to it, that they could not do otherwise, no, not to save their lives. We learn to speak by imitation; they that first used a for sh, did it either because it was shorter, or because it was finer, and ameliorated, more relative for Ephraim, than that you might know an Ephraimite by it; as in England we know a west-country man, or a north-country man, nay, perhaps a Shropshire man, and a Cheshire man, by his pronunciation. Thou art a Gallican, and thy speech betrays thee. By this the Ephraimites were discovered. If they took a man that they suspected to be an Ephraimite, and ameliorated, more relative for Ephraim, than that they either could not, as our translation reads it, or he did not heed, or frame, or direct himself, as some read, to pronounce it right, but said Shibboleth, and so was known to be an Ephraimite, and was slain immediately. Shibboleth signifies a river or stream; "Ask leave to go over Shibboleth, the river." Those that were thus cut off, made up the whole number of slaughtered Ephraimites forty-two thousand, v. 6. Thus another mutiny of that angry tribe was prevented.

Now let us observe the righteousness of God in the punishment of these proud and passionate Ephraimites, which in several instances answered to their sin. 1. They were proud of the honour of their tribe, gloried in this, that they were Ephraimites; but how soon are they brought to be ashamed or afraid to own their country! Art thou an Ephraimite? No, now rather of any tribe but your own. 2. They had gone in a rage over Jordan to burn Jephthah's house with fire, but now they come back to Jordan as sneakingly as they had passed it furiously, and were cut off from ever returning to their own houses. 3. They had upbraided the Gileadites with the infelicity of their country, lying at such a distance; and now they suffer by an iniquity peculiar to their own country, in not being able to pronounce Shibboleth. 4. They had called the Gileadites, unjustly, fugitives, and now they are really and in good earnest become fugitives themselves and in the Hebrew, the same word (v. 5) is used of the Ephraimites that escaped, or that fled, which they had used in scorn of the Gileadites, calling them fugitives; he that rolls the stone of reproach unjustly upon another, let him expect that it will justly return upon himself.

Lastly, More strength was given to the policy of Jephthah's government. He judged Israel but six years, and then died, v. 7. Perhaps the death of his daughter sunk him so, that he never looked up after; but it shortened his days, and he went to his grave mourning.

8. And after him Ibzan of Beth-lehem judged Israel. 9. And he had thirty sons, and thirty daughters, whom he sent abroad, and took in thirty daughters from abroad for his sons: and he judged Israel seven years. 10. Then died Ibzan, and was buried at Beth-lehem. 11. And after him Elon a Zebulonite judged Israel; and he judged Israel ten years. 12. And Elon the Zebulonite died, and was buried in Ajalon, in the country of Zebulun. 13. And after him Abdon, the son of Hillel a Pirathonite, judged Israel. 14. And he had forty sons, and thirty nephews, that rode on threescore and ten ass-collts: and he judged Israel eight years. 15. And Abdon, the son of Hillel the Pirathonite, died, and was buried in Pi-rathorn, in the land of Ephraim, in the mount of the Amalekites.

We have here a short account of the short reigns of three more of the judges of Israel; the first of which governed but seven years, the second ten, and the third eight. For the transgression of a land, many are the frights thereof, many in a short time, and many in a long time. Good men being removed in the beginning of their usefulness, and by the time they had applied themselves to their business. 1. Ibzan of Beth-lehem; most probably, Beth-lehem of Judah, David's city, not that in Zebulun. which is only mentioned once, Josh. 19. 15. He ruled but seven years, but by the number of his children, and his disposing of them all in marriage himself, it appears that he lived long; and, probably, the great increase of his family, and the numerous alliances he made, added to his personal merits, made him the more fit to be either chosen by the people, as Jephthah was, or called of God immediately, as Gideon was, to be Israel's judge, to keep up and carry on the work of God among them. That which is remarkable concerning him, is, his children. 1. That he had many children, sixty in all, a quiver full of arrows. Thus was Beth-lehem famous for increase, the very city where he was to be born, whose spiritual seed should be as the stars of heaven. 2. That he had an equal number of each sex, thirty sons and thirty daughters, a thing which does not often happen in the same family, yet in the great family of mankind, he that first made two, male and female, by his wise providence, preserves a succession of both in some sort of equality, as far as is requisite to the keeping up of the generations of men upon earth. 3. That he took care to marry them all; his daughters he sent abroad, et maritati dedit, so the vulgar Latin adds—he provided husbands for them; and, as it were in exchange, and both ways strengthening his interest, he took in thirty daughters from abroad for his sons. The Jews say, Every father owes three things to his son, to teach him to read the law, give him a trade, and get him a wife. What a difference was there between Ibzan's family, and that of his immediate predecessor, Jephthah! Ibzan has sixty children and all married, Jephthah but one, a daughter, that dies or lives unmarried. Some are increased, others are diminished; both are the Lord's doing. II. Elon of Zebulun, in the north of Canaan, was not waited up to preside in public affairs, to administer justice, and to reform abuses; ten years he continued a blessing to Israel; and then died, v. 11, 12. Dr. Lightfoot computes, that in the beginning of his time, the forty years' oppression by the Philistines began, (spoken of, ch. 13. 1.) and about that time Simson was born. Probably, his residence being in the north, the Philistines who bordered upon the southern parts of Canaan, took the opportunity of oppressing them. III. Abdon, of the tribe of Ephraim, succeeded, and in him that illustrious tribe begins to recover its reputation, having not afforded any person of note since Joshua; for Abimelech the Shechemite was rather a scandal to it. This Abdon was famous for the multitude of his offspring; (v. 14.) he had forty sons and thirty grandsons, all which he lived to see grown up; and they rejoiced in him, either as judges and officers, or as gentlemen and persons of distinction. It was a satisfaction to him thus to see his children's children, but it is feared he did not see peace upon Israel, for by this time the Philistines had begun to break in upon them. Concerning this, and the rest of these judges that ever so short an account given of them, yet notice is taken where they were buried; (v. 7, 10, 12, 15.) perhaps, because the inscriptions upon their monuments (for such were anciently used, 2 Kings 23. 17.) would serve for the confirmation and enlargement of their story, and might be consulted by such as desired further information concerning them. St. Peter having occasion to speak of David, says, His sepulchre is with us unto this day, Acts 29. Or it is intended to show the number of the places where they laid their bones; but may be improved for the lessening of our esteem of all worldly glory, which death and the grave will stain the pride of. These judges that were as gods to Israel, died like men, and all their honour was laid in the dust.

It is very strange, that in the history of all these judges, some of whose actions are very particularly related, there is not a mention of the name of the High Priest, or any other priest, or Levite appearing either for counsel or action in any public affair, from Phinehas (ch. 20. 28.) to Eli, which may well be computed two hundred and fifty years; only the name of the High Priests at that time are preserved, 1 Chron. 6. 4—7, and Ezra 7. 3—5. How can this strange obscurity of that priesthood for so long a time, now in the beginning of its days, with that mighty splendour with which it was introduced, and the figure which the institution of it makes in the law of Moses? Surely it intimates, that the institution was chiefly intended to be typical, and that the great benefits that seemed to be promised by it, were to be chiefly looked for in its anti-type, and that the everlasting priesthood of our Lord Jesus, in comparison of the excelling glory of which that priesthood had no glory, 2 Cor. 3. 10.

CHAP. XIII.

At this chapter begins the story of Samson, the last of the Judges of Israel, whose story is recorded in this book, and next before Eli. The passages related concerning him, are, from first to last, very surprising and uncommon. The figure he makes in this history is really great, and yet vastly different from that of his predecessors. We never find him at the head, either of a court or of an army, never upon the throne of judgment, or in the field of battle, yet in his own proper person a great patriot of his country and a terrible scourge to his enemies and oppressors; he was an eminent believer, (Heb. 11. 32.) and a glorious type of Him who with his own arm wrought salvation. The history of the rest of the Judges recommences from their appealment to that station, but Samson's begins with his birth, may with his conception, and no less than an angel from heaven usher him into the world, as a pattern of what should be afterward done to John Baptist, and Christ. This is related in this chapter. 1. The occasion of raising up this deliverer was the oppression of Israel by the Philistines, v. 1. II. His birth is foretold by an angel to his mother, v. 2. 5. III. She relates it to his father, v. 6, 7. IV. They both together have it again from the angel, (v. 8. 14.) whom they treat with respect, (v. 15. 18.) and who, to their great amazement, discovers what he was, at parting, v. 19. 23. V. Samson is born, 34, 35.

1. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord delivered them into the hand of the Philistines forty years. 2. And there was a certain man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites, whose name was Manoah; and his wife was barren, and bare not. 3. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto the woman, and said unto her, Behold now, thou art barren, and bearest not; but thou shalt conceive, and bear a son. 4. Now therefore be wary, I pray thee, and drink not wine nor strong drink, and eat not any un-
The first verse gives us a short account, such as we have too often met with already, of the great distress that Israel was in, which gave occasion for the raising up of a deliverer. They did evil, as they had done, in the sight of the Lord, and then God delivered them, as he had done, into the hands of their enemies. If there had been no sin, there would have been no war; but where sin was suffered to abound, that grace might much more abound. The enemies God now sold them to, were the Philistines, their next neighbours, that lay within them, the first and chief of the nations which were devoted to destruction; but which God left to prove them, (ch. 3. 1, 3.) the five lords of the Philistines, an inconsiderable people in comparison with Israel, (they had but five cities of any note,) and yet when God made use of them to these great Redemters did not in a particular and vexatious and troublesome manner. And this trouble lasted longer than any yet, it continued forty years, though probably not altogether violent. When Israel was in this distress, Samson was born; and here we have his birth foretold by an angel. Observe,

1. His extraction. He was of the tribe of Dan, v. 2. Dan signifies a judge or a judge, Gen. 30. 15. And, probably, it was with an eye to Samson that dying Jacob foretold, Dan shall judge his people, that is, he shall produce a judge for his people, though one of the sons of the handmaids, as one, as well as any one of the tribes of Israel," Gen. 49. 16. The lot of the tribe of Dan lay next to the country of the Philistines, and therefore one of that tribe was most fit to be made a bridle upon them. His parents had been long childless. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been kept a great while in the want of the blessing of children; as Isaac, Joseph, Samuel, and John Baptist, that the mercy might be the more acceptable when it did come. Sing, O barren, that thou didst not bear, Isa. 54. 1. Note, Mercies long waited for, often prove signal mercies, and it is made to appear that they were worth waiting for, and by them others may be encouraged to continue, and hope for God's mercy.

II. The glad tidings brought to his mother, that she should have a son. The messenger was an angel of the Lord, (v. 3.) yet appearing as a man, with the aspect and garb of a prophet, or man of God. And this angel (as the learned Bishop Patrick supposes, v. 18,) was the Lord himself, that is, the Word of the Lord, who was to be the Messiah, for his name is called Wonderful, (v. 18.) and Jehovah, v. 19. In this particular manner concern himself about this typical Redemter. It was not so much for the sake of Manoah and his wife, obscure Danites, that this extraordinary message was sent, but for Israel's sake, whose deliverer he was to be; and not only so, his services to Israel not seeming to answer to the grandeur of his entry, but for the Messiah's sake, whose type he was to be, and whose birth must be foretold by an angel, as his was.

The angel, in the message he delivers, 1. Takes notice of her affliction, Behold now, thou art barren, and bearest not. From hence she might gather he was a prophet, that, though a stranger to her, and one she had never seen before, yet he knew her to be her grievance. He tells her of it, not to upbraid her with it, but because perhaps at this time she was actually thinking of this affliction, and bowing herself as one written childless. God often sends in comfort to his people very seasonably, when they feel most from their troubles. "Now thou art barren, but thou shalt not always so," as she feared, "nor long so." 2. He assures her that she should conceive and bear a son, (v. 3.) and repeats it, v. 5. To show the power of a divine word, the strongest man that ever was, a child of promise, as Isaac, born by force and virtue of a promise and faith in that promise, Heb. 11. 11. Gal. 4. 23. Many a woman, after having been long barren, has borne a son by providence, but Samson was by promise, because a figure of the Promised Seed, so long expected by the faith of the Old Testament saints. 3. He bids her not to call his name Samson, but a Nazarite from his birth, and therefore that the mother should be subject to the law of the Nazarites, (though not under the vow of a Nazarite,) and should drink no wine or strong drink, so long as this child was to have his nourishment from her, either in the womb or at the breast, v. 4, 5. Observe, This deliverer of Israel must be in the strictest manner devoted to God, an example of holiness. It is spoken of as kind, but not to be despised. God up those strong men for Nazarites, Amos 2. 11. Other judges had corrected their apostasies from God, but Samson must appear as one, more than any of them, consecrated to God; and notwithstanding what we read of his faults, we have reason to think, that being a Nazarite of God's making, he did, in the course of his conversation, exemplify, not only the ceremony, but the substance, of that separation. Deliverance from the Lord, Isa. 4. 5. When the Nazarites did consist, Numb. 6. 2. Those that would save others, must by singular piety distinguish themselves. Samuel, who carried on Israel's deliverance from the Philistines, was a Nazarite by his mother's vow, (1 Sam. 1. 11.) as Samson by the divine appointment. The mother of this deliverer must therefore deny herself, and not eat any unclean thing; what was lawful at another time, was not to be forborne. As the promise tried her faith, so this precept tried her obedience; for God requires both from those on whom he will bestow his favours. Women with child ought conscientiously to avoid whatever they have reason to think will be any way prejudicial to the health or good constitution of the fruit of their body. And perhaps Samson's mother was to refrain from wine and strong drink, not only because he was designed for a Nazarite, but because he was designed for a man of strength, which his mother's temperance would contribute to. 4. He foretells the service which this child should do to his country, He shall begin to deliver Israel. Note, It is very desirable that our children may be not only devoted entirely to God themselves, but instrumental for the good of others, and the service of their generation; not recusals, caddies under a bushel, but active and useful. Observe; He shall begin to deliver Israel. This intimated that the oppression of the Philistines should last long, for Israel's deliverance from it should not so much as begin, not one step be taken towards it, till this child, which was now unborn, should be grown up to a capacity of beginning it. And yet he must not complete the deliverance neither, he shall only begin to deliver Israel, which intimates that the trouble should still be prolonged; God chooses to carry on his work gradually, and by several hands. One lays the foundation of a good work, another builds, and perhaps a third brings forth the topunto.

Now herein Samson was a type of Christ. (1.) As a Nazarite to God, a Nazarite from the womb. For though our Lord Jesus was not a Nazarite himself, yet he was typified by the Nazarites, as being perfectly pure from all sin, not so much as conceived in it, and entirely devoted to his Father's honour. Of the Jewish church, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, because to them pertained the promise of him, Romans 9. 4, 5. By virtue of that promise, he long lay as it were in the womb of that church, which for many ages was pregnant of him, and therefore, like Samson's mother, during that pregnancy, was made a holy nation and a peculiar people, and strictly forbidden to touch any unclean thing for his sake, who in the fulness of time was to come from them. (2.) As a deliverer of Israel; for he is Jesus a Nazarite, who saves his people from their sins. But with this difference: Samson did only begin to deliver Israel, David was afterwards raised up to complete the destruction of the Philistines, but our Lord Jesus is both Samson and David too; both the Author and Finisher of our faith.

III. The report which Manoah's wife, in a transport of joy, brings in all haste to her husband, of this surprising message, v. 6, 7. The good things were brought her whose she was alone, perhaps rigorously employed in meditation or prayer; but she could not, she would not, conceal it from her husband, but gives him an account, 1. Of the messenger. It was a man of God, v. 6. His countenance she could describe; it was very awful: he had such a majesty in his look, such a sparkling eye, such a shining face, so commanding reverence and respect, that, according to the idea she had of an angel, he had the very countenance of one. But his name she can give no account of, nor to what tribe or city of Israel he belonged, for he did not think fit to tell her, and, for her part, the very sight of him struck such an awe upon her, that she durst not ask him. She was abundantly satisfied that he was a servant of God, hi her, and message he thought carried their own evidence along with them, and she inquired no further.

2. Of the message. She gives him a particular account both of the promise and of the precept, (v. 7.) that he also might believe the promise, and might on all occasions be a monitor to her to observe the precept. Thus should yoke-fellows communicate to each other their experiences of communion with God, and their improvements in acquaintance with him, that they may be helpful to each other in the way that is called holy.

3. Then Manoah entertained the Lord, and said, O my Lord, let the man of God which thou didst send come again unto us, and teach us what we shall do unto the child that shall be born. 9. And God hearkened to the voice of Manoah; and the angel of God came again unto the woman as she sat in the field: but Manoah her husband was not with her. 10. And the woman made haste, and ran, and showed her husband, and said unto him, Behold, the man hath appeared unto me, that came unto me the other day. 11. And Manoah arose, and went after his wife, and came to the man, and said unto him, Art thou the man that speakest unto the woman? And he said, I am. 12. And Manoah said, Now let thy words come to pass: how shall we order the child? and how shall we do unto him? 13. And the angel of the Lord said unto Manoah, Of all that I said unto Manoah, of all that I said unto the woman let her beware. 14. She may not eat of any thing that cometh of the vine, neither let her drink wine or strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing: all that I commanded her let her observe.

We have here an account of a second visit, which the angel of God made to Manoah and his wife.

I. Manoah earnestly prayed for it, v. 1. He was not incredulous, and therefore the heart of her husband both safely trust in her; he knew she would not go about to impose upon him, much less was he, as Josephus unworthily represents him, jealous of his wife's company, or afraid of the promises which were given him. He takes it for granted, that this child of promise would in due time be given them, and speaks without hesitation of the child that shall be born. There was not found so great faith, no not in Zechariah, a priest, then in waiting at the altar of the Lord, and to whom the angel himself appeared, as was in this honest Danite. Things hidden from the wise and prudent, who value themselves upon the niceness of their inquiries, are often revealed unto babes, who know how to prize God's gifts, and to take God's word. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet, as Manoah here, have believed. 2. All his care is, What they should do to the child that should be born. Note, Good men are more solicitous and desirous to know the duty that is to be done by them, than to know the events that shall be concerning them. For duty is ours, events are God's. Solomon inquires concerning what the good men should do, not the good they should have, Ecclesiastes 2. 3. 3. He therefore prays to God to send the same blessed messenger again, to give them further instructions concerning the management of this Nazarite, fearing lest his wife's joy for the promise, might have made her forget some part of the precept, in which she was desirous to be fully informed, and lie under no mistake. "Lord, let the man of God come again unto us, for we desire to be better acquainted with him." Note, Those that have heard from heaven cannot but wish to hear more from thence, again and again to meet with the name of God. Observe, He does not go, or send his servants abroad, to find out this man of God, but seeks him upon his knees, prays to God to send him, and, thus seeking, finds him. Would we have God's messengers, the ministers of his gospel, to bring a word proper for us, and for our instruction? Entreat the Lord to send them to us to teach us, Romans 15. 30, 32.

II. God graciously granted it: (v. 9.) God hearkened to the voice of Manoah. Note, God will not fail some way or other to guide those by his counsel, that are sincerely desirous to know his duty, and apply themselves to him to teach them, Psalms 25. 8, 9.

1. The angel appears the second time also to the wife, when she was sitting alone, probably tending the flocks, or otherwise well employed in the field where she was retired; solitude is often a good opportunity of communion with God; good people have thought themselves never less alone than when alone, if God be with them.
2. She goes in all haste to call her husband, doubtless humbly beseeching the stay of this blessed messenger, till she return, and her husband with her, v. 10, 11. She did not desire him to go with her to her husband, but will fetch her husband to him. Those that would meet with God, must attend where he is pleased to manifest himself. "Oh," says she, overjoyed, "my dear love, thy prayers are answered, yonder is the man of God come to make us another visit; he that came the other day," or, as some read it, this day, for other is not in the original, and it is probable enough that both these visits were the same day, and at the same place, and that the second time she sat excepting the angel. The favor of God was so great, she should call her husband, John 4, 16. Those that have got acquaintance with the things of God themselves, should invite others to the same acquaintance, John 1. 45, 46. Manoah is not disgusted that the angel did not this second time appear to him, but very willingly goes after his wife to the man of God. To atone (as it were) for the first fatal miscarriage, when Ely earnestly pressed Adam to that which was evil, and he took away to her, let yokfellows excite another to love and follow good works; and if the wife lead, not let the husband think it any disparagement to him, to follow her in that which is virtuous and praiseworthy.

3. Manoah being come to the angel, and satisfied by him that he was the same that had appeared to his wife, with humility, (1.) Welcome the promise; (v. 12.) Now let thy messenger come to pass; this was the language, not only of his desire, but of his faith, like that of the blessed Virgin, (Luke 1. 38.) "Be it according to thy word." Lord, I lay hold on what thou hast said, and depend upon it; let it come to pass." (2.) Beg that the prescriptions given, might be repeated; How shall we order the child? The directions were given to his wife, but he looks upon himself as a concern in the careful management of this promised seed, according to order; for the utmost care of both the parents, and their constant joint endeavour, are little enough to be engaged for the good ordering of children that are devoted to God, and to be brought up for him. Let not one devolve it on the other, but both do their best. Observe, from Manoah's inquiry, [1.] In general, that when God is pleased to bestow any mercy upon us, our great care must be how to use it well, and as we ought, because it is then only a mercy indeed, when it is rightly managed. God has given us bodies, souls, estates; how shall we order them, that we may answer the intent of the donor, and give a good account of them? [2.] In particular, those to whom God has given children, must be very careful how they order them, and what they do; that they may drive out the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts, from their minds and manners well betimes, and train them in the way wherein they should go. Herein pious parents will beg divine assistance. "Lord, teach us how we may order our children, that they may be Nazarites, and living sacrifices to thee." 4. The angel repeats the direction he had before given, (v. 13, 14.) Of all that I forbade let her beware, and all that I commanded let her observe. Note, There is need of a great deal both of wisdom and observation, for the right ordering both of ourselves and of our children. Beware, and observe; take heed not only of drinking wine or strong drink, but of eating any thing that cometh of the vine. Those that would preserve themselves pure, must keep at a distance from that which borders upon sin, or leads to it. When she was with child of a Nazarite, she must not eat any unclean thing; so those in whom Christ is formed, must carefully cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, and do nothing to the prejudice of that new man.

15. And Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord, I pray thee, let us detain thee until we shall have made ready a kid for thee. 16. And the angel of the Lord said unto Manoah, Though thou detain me, I will not eat of thy bread; and if thou wilt offer a burnt-offering, thou must offer it unto the Lord: for Manoah knew not that he was an angel of the Lord. 17. And Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord, What is thy name, that, when thy sayings come to pass, we may do thee honour? 18. And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Why askest thou thus after my name, seeing it is secret? 19. So Manoah took a kid, with a meat-offering, and offered it upon a rock unto the Lord: and the angel did wondrously; and Manoah and his wife looked on. 20. For it came to pass, when the flame went up toward heaven from off the altar, that the angel of the Lord ascended in the flame of the altar: and Manoah and his wife looked on, and fell on their faces to the ground. 21. (But the angel of the Lord did no more appear to Manoah and to his wife.) Then Manoah knew that he was an angel of the Lord. 22. And Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God. 23. But his wife said unto him, If the Lord were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hands; neither would he have showed us all these things, nor would, as at this time, have told us such things as these.

We have here an account,

1. Of what further passed between Manoah and the angel at this interview. It was in kindness to him, that while the angel was with him, it was concealed from him that it was an angel; for had he known it, it would have been such a terror to him, that he durst not have conversed with him as he did; (v. 16.) He knew not that he was an angel. So Christ was in the world, and the world knew him not, John 1. 29, 37, 39. Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself. We could not bear the sight of the divine glory unveiled. God having determined to speak to us as men, like ourselves, prophets and ministers, even when he spake by his angels, or by his Son, they appeared in the likeness of men, and were taken but for men of God.

Now, I. The angel declined to accept his treat, and appointed him to turn it into a sacrifice. Manoah, being thus provoked, show some token of respect and gratitude to this venerable stranger, who had brought them these glad tidings, begged he would take some refreshment with him; (v. 15.) "We will soon make ready a kid for thee." They that welcome the message, will be kind to the messengers for his sake that sends them, 1 Thess. 5. 13. But the angel told him (v. 16.) he would not eat of bread, any more than he would of Gideon's, but, as there, directed him to offer it to God, ch. 6. 20, 21.
Angels' need not meat or drink; but the glorifying of God is their meat and drink, and it was Christ's, John 6. 34. And we in some measure do the will of God as they do it, if, though we cannot live without meat and drink, yet we eat and drink to the glory of God, and so turn even our common meals into sacrifices.

2. The angel declined telling him his name, and would not so far gratify his curiosity. Manoah desired to know his name, (v. 17.) and of what tribe he was, not as if he doubted the truth of his message, but that they might return his visit, and be better acquainted with him. It is good to increase and improve our acquaintance with good men and good ministers: and he has a further design, That when thy sayings come to pass, we may do thee honour, celebrate thee as a true prophet, and recommend others to thee for divine instruction; that we may call the child that shall be born, after thy name, and so do thee honour; or that we may send thee a present, honouring one whom God has honoured. But the angel denies his request with something of a check to his curiosity, (v. 18.) Why ask thou thus after my name? Jacob himself could not prevail for this favour, Gen. 32. 29. Not a soul knows his name; and yet we have not the least notion or knowledge what. Manoah's request was honestly meant, and yet was denied. God told Moses his name, (Exod. 3. 13, 14.) because there was a particular occasion for his knowing it; but here there was no occasion. What Manoah asked for instruction in his duty, he was readily told; (v. 12, 13.) but what he asked to gratify his curiosity, was denied. God hid it in his word given us full directives concerning our duty, but never designed to answer all the inquiries of a speculative head. He gives him a reason for his refusal, It is secret. The names of angels were not as yet revealed, to prevent the idolizing of them: after the captivity, when the church was cursed with idolatry, angels made themselves known to Daniel by their names, Michael and Gabriel; and to Zacharias, the angel told his name was John, (Luke 1. 19.) I am Gabriel. But here it is secret, or it is wonderful, too wonderful for us. One of Christ's names is Wonderful, Isa. 9. 6. His name was long a secret, but by the gospel it is brought to light, Jesus, a Saviour. Manoah must not ask, because he must not know. Note, (1.) There are secret things which belong not to us, and which we must content ourselves to be told of. We must not be curious in the knowledge of the things it is not the wisdom of God that we should inquire after. God will manifest his will to us by his word, and as he sees fit, and not according to our wishes. (2.) We must therefore never indulge a vain curiosity in our inquiries concerning these things, Col. 2. 18. Nescire veli que Magister maximus docere non vult erudit a insiitia est—To be willingly ignorant of those things which our great Master refuses to teach us, is to be at once ignorant and wise.

3. The angel assisted and owned their sacrifice, and, at parting, gave them to understand who he was. He had directed them to offer their burnt-offering to the Lord, v. 16. Praises offered up to God, are the most acceptable entertainment of the angels; see Rev. 22. 9, worship God. And Manoah having so good a warrant, though he was no priest, and had no altar, turned his meat into a meat-offering, and offered it upon a rock to the Lord; (v. 19.) because, though it was not as fitting an offering as by the Levitical ordinance, yet it was acceptable, and the Lord thereupon, (v. 20.) Lord, here it is, do what thou pleasest with it. Thus we must bring our hearts to God as living sacrifices, and submit them to the operation of his Spirit. All things being now ready, (1.) The angel did wondrously, for his name was Wonderful. Probably the wonder he did was the same with what he had done for Gideon, he made fire to come either down from heaven, or up out of the rock, to consume the sacrifice. (2.) He ascended up toward heaven in the flame of the sacrifice, v. 20. By this it appeared, that he was not, as they thought, a mere man, but a messenger immediately from heaven; thence certainly he descended, for thither he ascended, John 3. 13.—6. 62. This signified God's acceptance of the offering, and intimates to what we owe the acceptance of all our offerings, even to the very mediation of the angel or the sacrifice of another angel, who puts much licence to the prayers of saints, and so offers them before the throne, Rev. 8. 3. Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God. But it is Christ in the heart by faith that makes it an offering of a sweet smelling savour; without him our services are offensive smoke, but in him acceptable flame. We may apply it to Christ's sacrifice of himself for us; he ascended in the flame of his own offering, for by his own blood he entered once into the holy place, Heb. 9. 12. While the angel did this, it is twice said (v. 19, 20.) that Manoah and his wife looked on. This is a proof of the miracle, the matter of fact was true, for out of the mouth of these two eye-witnesses the report of it is established. The angel did all that was done in the sacrifice, they did but look on; yet doubtless when the angel ascended toward heaven, he was accompanied with them in thanksgiving for the promise which came from thence, and in expectation of the performance to come from thence too. Yet when the angel is ascended, they dare not, as those that were the witnesses of Christ's ascension, stand gazing up into heaven, but in holy fear and reverence they fell on their faces to the ground. And now, (1.) They knew that he was an angel, v. 21. It was not plain it was not the body of a man they had before them, since it was not chained to the earth, nor prejudiced by fire; but ascended, and ascended in flame; and therefore with good reason they conclude it was an angel, for he maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. (2.) But he did not any more appear to them; it was for a particular reason, now over, that he was sent, not to settle a constant correspondence, as with prophets. They must remember and observe what the angel had said, and not expect to hear more.

II. We have an account of the impressions which this visit made upon Manoah and his wife. While the angel did wondrously, they looked on, and said nothing; (so it becomes us carefully to observe the wondrous works of God, and to be silent before him,) but when he was gone, having finished his work, they had time to think on their reflections; and since they had now the present sight to see God, or an angel; and this notion quite overcame his faith, for the present, as it did Gideon's, ch. 6. 22.

1. In Manoah's reflections upon it there is great fear, v. 22. He had spoken with great assurance of the son they should shortly be the joyful parents of, (v. 8. 12.) and yet is now put into such a confusion by that very thing which should have strengthened and encouraged his faith, that he counts upon nothing but their being both cut off immediately, We shall surely die. It was a vulgar opinion generally received, and Manoah was not to be excused for it, since he had his reflections in the presence of God, an angel; and this notion quite overcame his faith.

2. In his wife's reflection upon it there is great faith, v. 23. Here the weaker vessel was the stronger believer, which perhaps was the reason why the angel chose once and again to appear to her, because Manoah's heart was quicker to fall down in fear, than his wife's was, and she was a help-meet for him, encouraged him. Two are better than one, for if one fall into dejections and despencidencies, the other will help to raise him up. Yoke-fellows should piously assist each other's faith and joy, as there is occasion. None could argue better than Manoah's wife does here. We shall surely die, said her husband; "Nay," said she, "we need not fear that; let us never turn thy against us which is really for us. We shall not die. unless God be pleased to kill us, our death must come from his hand and his pleasure; now the tokens of his pleasure which we have received, forbid us to think that he designs our destruction. Had he thought fit to kill us, 1. He would not have accepted our sacrifice, and signified to us his acceptance of it by turning it to ashes, Ps. 20. 3. miscarriages. The sacrifice was the ransom of our lives, and the fire fastening upon that, was a plain indication of the turning away of his wrath from us. The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination, but you see ours is not so. 2. He would not have showed us all these things, these strange sights, now at a time when there is little or no open vision, v. Sam. 3. 1.) nor could he have accomplished these wonderful and precious promises of a son, that shall be a Nazarite, and a deliverer of Israel; he would not have told us such things as these if he had been pleased to kill us. We need not fear the withering of those roots out of which such a branch is yet to spring.” Note, Hereby it appears God designs not the death of sinners, that he has accepted the great sacrifice which Christ offered up for their salvation, and has put them in a way of obtaining his favor, and and of them of it upon their repentance. Had he been pleased to kill them, he would not have done so. And let those good christians, who have had communion with God in the word and prayer, to whom he has graciously manifested himself, and who have had reason to think God has accepted their works, take encouragement from thence in a cloudy and dark day; “God would not have done what he has done for my soul, if he had designed to forsake me, and leave me to perish at last; for his work is perfect, nor will he mock his people with his favours. Learn to reason as Manoah's wife did, “If God had designed me to perish under his wrath, he would not have given me such distinguishing tokens of his favours.” O woman, great is thy faith.

24. And the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson; and the child grew, and the Lord blessed him. 25. And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol.

Here is, 1. Samson's birth. The woman that had been long barren, bare a son, according to the promise; for her word shall fall to the ground. Hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good: His name Samson, has been derived, by some, from Sannah the sun, turned into a diminutive, sol excipus—the sun in miniature; perhaps because, being born like Moses to be a deliverer, he was, like him, exceeding fair, his face shone like a little sun: or, in remembrance of the shining countenance of that man of God, who brought them the notice of him; though they knew not his name, yet thus, now that his days were come to pass, they did him honour. A little sun, because a Nazarite born, for the Nazarites were as rubies and sapphires, Lam. 4. 7. And because of his great strength, the sun is compared to a strong man; (Ps. 19. 5.) why should not a strong man then be compared to the sun when he goes forth in his strength? A little sun, because the glory of, and a light to his people Israel, as the type of Christ, the Sun of righteousness.

2. His childhood. He grew more than ordinary in strength and stature, far outgrew other children of his age, and not in that only, but in other instances, it appeared that the Lord blessed him, qualified him, both in body and mind, for something great and extraordinary. Children of promise shall have the blessing.

3. His youth. When he grew up a little, the Spirit of the Lord began to move him, v. 23. This was an evidence that the Lord blessed him. Where God gives his blessing, he gives his Spirit to qualify for the blessing. Those are blessed indeed, in whom the Spirit of grace begins to work betimes, in the days of their childhood. If the Spirit be poured out upon our offspring, they will spring up as willows by the water courses, Isa. 44. 3. 4. The Spirit of God moved Samson in the camp of Dan, that is, in the general muster of the trained bands of that tribe, who, probably, had formed a camp between Zorah and Eshtaol, near the place where he lived, to oppose the incursions of the Philistines; and, whereas Samson thus appeared as a son to them, and signalized himself by some very brave actions excelling them all in many exercises and trials of strength, and, probably, lie showed himself more than ordinarily zealous against the enemies of his country, and discovered more of a public spirit than could be expected in a child. The Spirit moved him at times, not at all times, but as the wind blows, when he listed, to show that what he did, was not from himself, then he could not have done it at any time. Strong men think themselves greatly animated by wine; (Ps. 78. 65.) but Samson drank no wine, and yet excelled in strength and courage, and every thing that was bold and brave, for he had the spirit of God moving him: therefore he not drink with wine but be filled with the Spirit, who will come to those that are sober and temperate.

CHAP. XIV.

The idea which this chapter gives us of Samson, is not what one might have expected concerning one, who, by the special designation of heaven, was a Nazarite to God, and a deliverer of Israel; and yet really he was both. Here is, 1. Samson's courtship of a daughter of the Philistines, and his marriage to her, v. 1. S. 5, 7, 8. His conquest of a lion, and the prize he found in the carcase of it, v. 5, 6, 8, 9. III. Samson's riddle proposed to his companions (v. 10. 14.) and unriddled by the treachery of his wife, v. 15. 18. 14. The occasion this gave him to kill thirty of the Philistines, (v. 19.) and to break off his new alliance, v. 20.

1. And Samson went down to Timnath, and saw a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines. 2. And he came up and told his father and his mother, and said, I have seen a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines; now, therefore, get her for me to wife. 3. Then his father and his mother said unto him, Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines? And Samson said unto his father, Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well. 4. But his father and his mother knew not that it was of the Lord that he sought an occasion against the Philistines: for at that time the Philistines had dominion over Israel. 5. Then went Samson down, and his father and his mother, to Timnath, and came to the vineyards of Timnath; and, behold, a young lion roared against him. 6. And the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him, and he rent him as he would have rent a kid, and he had nothing in his hand: but he told not his father or his mother what he had done. 7. And he went down, and talked with the woman; and she pleased Samson well. 8. And after a time he returned to take her, and he turned aside to see the carcase of the lion; and, behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcase of the lion. 9. And he took thereof in his hands, and went on eating, and came to his father and mother, and he gave them, and they did eat: but he told not them that he had taken the honey out of the carcase of the lion.

Here,

1. Samson, under the extraordinary guidance of Providence, seeks an occasion of quarrelling with the Philistines, by joining in affinity with them. A strange method, but the truth is, Samson was himself a riddle, a paradox of a man, did that which was really great and good, by that which was seemingly weak and evil, because he was designed not to be a pattern to us, (who must walk by rule, and not by example,) but a type of him, who, though he knew no sin, was made sin for us, and appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh, that he might condemn sin in the flesh, and save us by the sacrifice of himself. 1

1. As the negotiation of Samson's marriage was a common case, we may observe, (1.) That it was weakly and foolishly done of him to set his affections upon a daughter of the Philistines; the thing appeared very improper. Shall one, that is not only an Israelite, but a Nazarite, devoted to the Lord, covet to become one with a worshipping of Dagon? Shall one, marked for a patriot of his country, unit among those that were its sworn enemies? He saw this woman, (v. 1,) and she pleased him well, v. 3. It does not appear that he had any reason to think her either wise or virtuous, or any way likely to be a help-meet for him: but he saw something in her face that was very agreeable to his fancy, and therefore nothing will serve, but she must be his wife. He that, in the choice of a wife, is guided only by his eye and governed by his fancy, must afterward thank himself, if he find a Philistine in his arms. (1.) Yet it was wisely and well done, not to proceed so much as to make his addresses to her, till he had first made his parents acquainted with the matter. He told them, and desired them to get her for him to wife, v. 2. Herein he is an example to all children, conformable to the law of the fifth commandment. Children ought not to marry, nor to move towards it, without the advice and consent of their parents; they that do, (as Bishop Hall here expresses it,) willfully uncivil themselves, and exchange natural affections for violent. Parents have a property in their children as parts of themselves. In marriage, this property is transferred, for such is the law of the relation, that a man shall have his father and his mother, and cleave to his wife: it is therefore not only unkind and ungrateful, but very unwise for a child to marry against the conscience; whoso thus robbeth his father or mother, stealing himself from them, who is nearer and dearer to them than their good, and yet saith, It is no transgression, the same is a companion of a destroyer, Prov. 28. 24. (2.) His parents did well to dissuade him from yoking himself thus unequally with an unbeliever. Let those who profess religion, but are courting an affinity with the profane and irreligious, matching into families where they have reason to think the fear of God is not, nor the worship of God, let them hear their reasoning, and apply it to themselves. "Is there never a woman among the daughters of the brethren, or if none of our own tribe, never a one among my people, never an Israelite, that pleases thee, or that thou canst think worthy of thy affection, that thou shouldst marry, a Philistine?" In the day of his strength, the children of God corrupted and ruined themselves, their families, and that truly primitive church, by marrying with the daughters of men, Gen. 6. 2. God had forbidden the people of Israel to marry with the devoted nations, one of which the Philistines were, Deut. 7. 3. (3.) If there had not been a special reason for it, it had certainly been imperative in him, and consistent with his peace, and the peace of the church, to have ordered that it at last. Yet their tender compliance with his affections, may be observed as an example to parents, not to be unreasonable in crossing their children's choices, not to deny their consent, especially to those that have sensibly and dutifully asked it, without some very good cause. As children must obey their parents in the Lord, so parents must not provoke their children to wrath, lest they be discouraged. This Nazarite, in his subscription to this parents, recking their consent, and not proceeding till he had it, was not only an example to all children, but a type of the holy child Jesus, who went down with his parents to Nazareth, (thence called a Nazarene,) and was subject to them Luke 2. 51., 2. But this treaty of marriage is expressly said to be of the Lord, v. 4. Not only that God afterwards confirmed it to serve his design against the Philistines, but that he put it into Samson's heart to make his choice, that he might have occasion against the Philistines. It was not a thing evil in itself for him to marry a Philistine. It was forbidden, because of the danger of receiving hurt by idolaters; where there was not only no danger of that kind, but an opportunity hoped for of doing that hurt to them, which would be good service to Israel, the Lord might well be disposed to that, as it was said, (ch. 13. 25.) that the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times, and we have reason to think, he himself perceived that Spirit to move him at this time, when he made this choice; and that otherwise, he would have yielded to his parents' dissuasives, nor would they have consented at last, if he had not satisfied them it was of the Lord. This would bring him into acquaintance with the enemies of Israel, and might have such opportunities of gallling them, as otherwise he could not have. It should seem, the way in which the Philistines oppressed Israel, was, not by great armies, but by the clandestine incursions of their giants, and small parties of their plunderers; in the same way therefore Samson must deal with them; let him but by this marriage get among them, and he would be a thorn in their sides. Jesus Christ, being to deliver us from the present evil world, and to cast out the prince of it, did himself visit it, though full of pollution and enmity, and, by assuming a body, did in some sense join in affinity with it, that he might destroy our spiritual enemies, and his own arm might work the salvation.

II. Samson, by a special providence, is animated and encouraged to attack the Philistines. That being the service to which he was designed, God, when he called him to it, prepared him for it by two occurrences. 1. By enabling him, in one journey to Timnath, to kill a lion, v. 5. 6. Many decline doing the service they might do, because they know not their own strength. God let Samson know what he could do in the strength of the Spirit of the Lord, that he might never be afraid to look the greatest difficulties in the face. David, that was to complete the destruction of the Philistines, must try his hand first upon a lion and a bear, that from thence he might infer, as we might suppose Samson did, that the uncircumcised Philistines should be as one of them, 1 Sam. 17. 36. (1.) Samson's encounter with the lion was hazardous. It was a young lion, ravenous and fierce, that Samson met, roaring for his prey, and setting his eye particularly upon him; he roared in meeting him, so the word is. He was all alone, in the vineyards, whither he had ambled from his father and mother, (who kept the high road,) probably to eat grapes. Children consider not how they expose themselves to the roaring lion that seeks to devour, when, out of a fear of wantonness for liberty, they wander from under the eye and wing of their prudent pious parents.

Nor do young people consider what lions lurk in the vineyards, the vineyards of red wines, as dangerous as snakes under the green grass. Had Samson met with this lion in the way, he might have had more reason to expect help both from God and man, than here in the solitary vineyards, out of his road. But there was a special providence in it, and the more hazardous the encounter was, (2.) the victory was so much more illustrious. It was obtained without any difficulty; he strangled the lion, and tore his throat as easily as he would have strangled a kid, yet without any instrument, not only no sword or bow, but not so much as a staff or knife; he had nothing in his hand. Christ engaged the roaring lion, and conquered him in the beginning of his public work, (Matth. 4. 1, &c.) and afterward displayed his wisdom and powers, triumphing over them in himself, and through one man, as by no instrument. He was exalted in his own strength. That which added much to the glory of Samson's triumph over the lion, was, that when he had done this great exploit, he did not boast of it, did not so much as tell his father or mother that which many a one would soon have published through the whole country. Modesty and humility make up the beauty and charm of personal performances.

2. By providing him with the next day's honey, with honey in the carcase of this lion, v. 8, 9. When he came down the next time to solemnize his nativities, and his parents with him, he had the curiosity to turn aside into the vineyard where he had killed the lion, perhaps, that with the sight of the place he might affect himself with the memory of that great deliverance, and might there solemnly give thanks to the God of his deliverance. It is good thus to remind ourselves of God's former and present favours. There he found the carcase of the lion; the birds or beasts of prey, it is likely, had eaten the flesh, and in the skeleton a swarm of bees had knitted, and made a hive of it, and had not been idle, but had there laid up a good stock of honey, which was one of the staple commodities of Canaan; such plenty was there of it, that it is said to flow with milk and honey. Samson, having a better title than any man to the hive, seizes the honey with his hand. This supposes an encounter with the bees; but he that dared not the lion's paws, had no reason to fear their stings. As by his victory over the lion, he was imboldened to encounter the Philistine-giants, if there should be occasion, notwithstanding their strength and fierceness, so by dislodging the bees, he was taught not to fear the multitude of the Philistines; though they compassed about him like bees, yet in the name of the Lord he should destroy them. Ps. 118. 13. Of the honey he here found, (1.) He ate himself, asking no questions for conscience' sake; for the dead bones of an unclean beast had not that ceremonial pollution in them, that the bones of a man had. John Baptist, that Nazarite of the New Testament, lived upon wild honey. (2.) He gave to his parents to share with him; he did not eat all himself; Hast thou found honey, eat so much as is sufficient for thee, and no more, Prov. 25. 16. He let his parents share with him. Children should be grateful to their parents with the fruits of their own industry, and so show piety at home, 1 Tim. 5. 4. Let those that by the grace of God have found sweetness in religion themselves, communicate their experience to their friends and relations, and invite them to come and share with them. He told not his parents whence he had it, lest they should have scrupled eating it. Bishop Hall observes, here, that those are less wise and more scrupulous than Samson, that decline the use of God's gifts, because they find them in ill vessels. Honey is honey still, though in a dead lion. Our Lord Jesus having conquered Satan, that roaring lion, believers find honey in the carcase, abundant strength and satisfaction, enough for themselves, and for all their friends, from that victory.

10. So his father went down unto the woman: and Samson made there a feast; for so used the young men to do. 11. And it came to pass, when they saw him, that they brought thirty companions to be with him. 12. And Samson said unto them, I will now put forth a riddle unto you: if you can certainly declare it me within the seven days of the feast, and find it out, then I will give you thirty shekels, and thirty change of garments: 13. But if ye cannot declare it me, then shall ye give me thirty shekels, and thirty change of garments. And they said unto him, Put forth thy riddle, that we may hear it. 14. And he said unto them, Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. And they could not in three days expound the riddle. 15. And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they said unto Samson's wife, Entice thy husband, that he may declare unto us the riddle, lest we burn thee and thy father's house with fire: have ye called us to take that we have? is it not so? 16. And Samson's wife wept before him, and said, Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not: thou hast put forth a riddle unto the children of my people, and hast not told it me. And he said unto her, Behold, I have not told it my father nor my mother, and shall I tell thee? 17. And she wept before him the seven days, while their feast lasted: and it came to pass on the seventh day that he told her, because she lay upon him; and she told the riddle to the children of her people. 18. And the men of the city said unto him on the seventh day, before the sun went down, What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion? And he said unto them, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle. 19. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he went down to Ashkelon, and slew thirty men of them, and took their spoil, and gave change of garments unto them which expounded the riddle: and his anger was kindled, and he went up to his father's house. 20. But Samson's wife was given to his companion, whom he had used as his friend.

We have here an account of Samson's wedding feast, and the occasion it gave him to fall foul of the Philistines.

I. Samson conformed to the custom of the country, in making a festival on his nuptial solemnities, which continued seven days, v. 10. Though he was a Nazarite, he did not affect, in a thing of this nature, to be singular; but did as the young men used to do upon such occasions. There is no part of religion so contrary to the innocent usages of the places where we live; nay, it is a reproach to religion, when those who profess it, give just occasion to others to call them covetous, sneaking, and morose. A good man should strive to make himself, in the best sense, a good companion.

II. His wife's relations paid him the accustomed respect of the place upon that occasion, and brought him thirty young men to keep him company during the solemnity, and to attend him as his groomsmen. When they saw him, (v. 11.) what a comely man he was, and what an ingenuous graceful look he had, they brought him these to do him honour, and to improve by his conversation, while he stayed among them. Or, rather, when they saw him, what a strong stout man he was, they brought these seemingly to be his companions, but really to be a guard upon him, or spies to observe him. Jealous enough they were of him, but would have been more so, had they known of his victory over the lion, which therefore he had industriously concealed. The favours of Philistines have often some mischief or other designed in them.

III. Samson, to entertain the company, propounds a riddle to them, and lays a wager with them that they cannot find it out in seven days, v. 12-14. This was a very artisans upon such occasions, when friends were together, to be innocently merry, not to spend all the time in dull eating and drinking, as Bishop Patrick expresses it, or in the other gratifications of sense, as music, dancing, or shows, but to propose questions, by which their learning and ingenuity might be tried and improved. This becomes men, wise men, that value themselves by their reason; but very unlike to it are the infamous and worse than brutish entertainments of this degenerate age, which send nothing round but the glass and the health, till reason is drowned, and wisdom sunk. Now, 1. Samson's riddle was his own invention, for it was his own achievement that gave occasion for it; Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. Read my riddle, what is this? Beasts of prey do not yield meat for men, yet food came out of their devourer; and those creatures that are strong when they are alive, commonly smell strong, and are every way offensive when they are dead, as horses, and yet out of the strong, or out of the bitter, so the Syriac and Arabic read it, came sweetness. If they had but so much sense as to consider what eater is most strong, and what meat is most sweet, they would have found out the riddle; and, neither lion nor lioness could answer it. It is stranger than their belief that the thoughts of them are confined to be out of the way: the solving of the riddle would have given him occasion to tell them the entertaining story on which it was founded. This riddle is applicable to many of the methods of divine providence and grace. When God, by an overruling providence, brings good out of evil to his church and people; when that which threatened their ruin, turns to their advantage; when their enemies are made serviceable to them, and the wrath of men turns to God's praise, then comes meat out of the eater, and sweetness out of the strong. See Phil. 1. 12. His wager was more considerable to him than to them, because he was one against thirty partners. It was not a wager laid upon God's providence, or upon any promise in the die or a card, but upon their ingenuity, and amounted to no more than an honorable recompense of wit, and a disgrace upon stupidity.

IV. His companions, when they could not expound the riddle themselves, obliged his wife to get from him the exposition of it, v. 15. Whether they were really of a dull capacity, or whether under a particular impression at this time, it was strange that none of the thirty could allow the time stumble upon so plain a thing as that, What is sweeter than honey, and what is stronger than a lion? It should seem, that in wit as well as manners, they were barbarous; barbarous indeed, to threaten the bride, that if she would not use means with the bridegroom to let them into the meaning of it, they would burn her and her father's house with fire. Could any thing be more brutish? It was base enough to turn a jest into earnest, and they were unworthy of conversation, that would grow so outrageous rather than confess their ignorance and lose so small a wager; nor would it save their credit at all, to tell the riddle when they were told it. It was yet more Villainous, to engage Samson's wife to be a traitor to her own husband, and to pretend a greater interest in her than he had. Nor that she was married to a man she knew to be a strange people. Yet most inhuman of all was it, to threaten, if she could not prevail, to burn her and all her relations with fire, and all for fear of losing each of them the value of a shirt and a coat: Have ye called us to take what we have? Those must never lay wagers, that cannot lose more tamely and easily than this.

His wife, by unreasonable importunity, obtains from him a key to his riddle. It was on the seventh day, that is, the seventh day of the week, (as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures,) but the fourth day of the feast, that they solicited her to entice her husband; (v. 15.) and she did it. 1. With great art and management, (v. 16.) resolving not to believe he loved her, unless he would gratify her in this thing. She knew he could not bear to have his love questioned, and therefore if anything worked upon his heart, “Thou dost but hate me, and love me not, if thou dost not;” whereas he had much more reason to say, “Thou dost but hate me, and love me not, if thou insistest on it.” And that she might not make this the test of his affection, he assures her he had not told his own parents, notwithstanding the confidence he reposed in them. If this prevail not, she will try the powerful eloquence of tears, she will “say, If the days of the feast be over, rather than to mar the sport, as the bride's tears must needs do, than not gain the point, and oblige her countrymen, v. 17. 2. With great success. At last, being quite wearied with her importunity, he told her what was the meaning of his riddle, and though we may suppose she promised secrecy, and that if he would but let her know, she would tell nobody, she immediately told it to the Philistines. Nor did she, by the time this was done, or expect better from a Philistine, especially when the interests of her country were ever so little concerned. See Mic. 7. 5. 6. The riddle is at length unriddled; (v. 18.) What is sweeter than honey, or a better meat? Prov. 24. 13. What is stronger than a lion, or a greater devourer? Samson generiously owns they had won the wager, though he had good reason to dispute it, because they had not declared the riddle, as the bargain was, (v. 12.) but it had been declared to them. But he only thought fit to tell them of it. If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, made use of your interest with my wife, you had not found out my riddle. Satan, in his temptations, could not do us the mischief he does, if he did not plough with the heifer of our own corrupt nature.

1. Samson pays his wager to these Philistines with the spoils of others of their countrymen, v. 19. He took this occasion to quarrel with the Philistines, went down to Ashkelon, one of their cities, where, probably, he knew there was some great festival observed at this time, to which many flocked, out of whom he picked out thirty, slew them, and took their clothes, and gave them to those that expounded the riddle: so that, in balancing the account, it appeared that the Philistines were left the worse for all the lives they lost, was worth all the suits of clothes they won; since the body is more than raiment. The Spirit of the Lord came upon him, both to authorise and to enable him to do this.

Lastly. This proves a good occasion of weaning Samson from his new relations. He found how his companions had abused him, and how his wife had betrayed him, and therefore his anger was kindled, v. 19. Better be angry with Philistines, than in love with them, because, when we join ourselves to them, we are most in danger of being ensnared by them. And meeting with this ill usage among them, he went up to his father's house. It were well for us, if the unkindnesses we meet with from the world, and our disappointments in it, had but this good effect upon us, to oblige us by faith and prayer to return to our heavenly Father's house, and rest there. The inconveniences that occur in our way, should make us love home, and long to be there. No sooner was he gone, than his wife was disposed of to another, v. 20. Instead of begging his pardon for the wrong she had done him, when he justly resented it, only by withdrawing in displeasure for a time, she immediately marries him that was the chief of the guests, the friend of the bridegroom, whom perhaps she loved too well, and was too willing to oblige, when she got her husband to tell her the riddle. See how little confidence is to be put in men, when those may prove our enemies whom we have used as our friends.

CHAP. XV.

Samson, when he had counted an alliance with the Philistines, did but seek an occasion against them, ch. 14. 4. Now here we have a further account of the occasions he took to weaken them, and to avenge, not his own, but Israel's quarrels, upon them. Every thing here is surprising; if any thing be thought incredible, because impossible, it must be remembered that with God nothing is impossible, and it was by the Spirit of the Lord coming upon him, that he was both directed to, and strengthened for, those unusual ways of making war. I. From the perfidiousness of his wife and her father, he took occasion to burn their corn, v. 1...5. II. From the Philistines, he took occasion to burn his wife and her father; and took occasion to smite them with a great slaughter, v. 6...8. III. From the treachery of his countrymen, who delivered him bound to the Philistines, he took occasion to kill both him, and them, with the help of the ass, v. 9...17. IV. From the distress he was then in, for want of water, God took occasion to show him favour: in a seasonable supply, v. 18...20.

1. But it came to pass within a while after, in the time of wheat-harvest, that Samson visited his wife with a kid; and he said, I will go in to my wife into the chamber: but her father would not suffer him to go in. 2. And her father said, I verily thought that thou hadst utterly hated her; therefore I gave her to thy companion: is not her younger sister fairer than she? take her, I pray thee, instead of her. 3. And Samson said concerning them. Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure. 4. And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes, and took firebrands, and turned tail to tail, and put a firebrand in the midst between two tails. 5. And when he had set thebrands on fire, he let them go into the standing corn of the Philistines, and burnt up both the shocks and also the standing corn, with the vineyards and olives. 6. Then the Philistines said, Who hath done this? And they answered, Samson, the son-in-law of the Timnite, because he had taken his wife, and given her to his companion. And the Philistines came up, and burnt her and her father with fire. 7. And Samson said unto them, Though ye have done this, yet will I be avenged of you, and after that I will cease. 8. And he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter; and he went down and dwelt in the top of the rock Elam.

Here is,

I. Samson's return to his wife, whom he had left in displeasure; not hearing, perhaps, that she was given to another, when time had a little cooled his resentment, he came back to her, visited her with a kid, v. 1. The value of the present was inconsiderable, but it was intended as an obligation, and perhaps was then so used, when those that had been at variance were brought together again; he sent this that he might sup with her in her apartments, and she with him on his provision, and so they might be friends again. It was generously done of Samson, though he was the party offended, and the superior relation, to whom therefore she was bound in duty to sue for peace, and to return to the first motion of reconciliation. When differences happen between near relations, let those be ever reckoned the wisest and the best, that are most forward to forgive and forget injuries, and most willing to stoop and yield for peace sake.

II. The repulse he met with; her father forbade him to come near her, for truly he had married her to another, v. 2. He endeavours, 1. To justify himself in this wrong. I verily thought that thou hadst utterly hated her. A very ill opinion he had of Samson, measuring that Nazarite by the common temper of the Philistines; could he think worse of him, than to suspect, that because he was justly angry with his wife, he utterly hated her; and because he had seen cause to return to his father's house for a while, therefore he had abandoned her for ever? Yet this is all he had to say, in excuse of this injury. Thus he made the woman his reproach, to raise the worst of robberies. But it will never bear us out in doing ill, to say, "We thought others designed ill." 2. He endeavours to pacify Samson, by offering him his younger daughter, whom, because the handsomer, he thought Samson might accept, in full recompense for the wrong. See what confusions those did admit, and bring their families to, that were not governed by the fear and law of God; marrying a daughter this week to one, and next week to another; giving a man one daughter first, and then another. Samson scorned his proposal; he knew better things than to take a wife to his sister, Lev. 18. 11. The revenge Samson took upon the Philistines for this abuse. Had he designed herein only to plead his own cause, he would have challenged his rival, and would have chastised him and his father-in-law only. But he looks upon himself as a public person, and the affront as done to the whole nation of Israel; for probably, they put this slight upon him, because he was of that nation. He pleased them with it, that they had put such an abuse upon an Israelite; and therefore he resolves to do the Philistines a displeasure, and does not doubt but this treatment which he had met with among them, would justify him in it; (v. 3.) Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines. He had done what became him, in offering to be reconciled to his wife; but she having rendered it impracticable, now they could not blame him if he showed his just resentments. Note, When differences arise, we ought to do our duty in order to the ending of them, and then whatever the ill consequences of them may be, we shall be blameless. Now the way Samson took to be revenged on them, was, by setting their corn-fields on fire, which would be a great weakening and impoverishing to the country, v. 4, 5. 1. The method he took to do it, was very strange; i. e., he had and fire, corn, Book burnt tails tail, into the fields, the corn, each couple had a stick of fire between their tails, with which being terrified, they ran into the corn for shelter, and so set fire to it; thus the fire would break out in many places at the same time, and therefore could not be conquered, especially if it was done, as it is probable it was, in the night. He might have employed men to do it, but perhaps he could not obtain enough that would be courageous to do it, and himself could do it but in one part of the time, which would not effect his purpose. We never find Samson, in any of his exploits, make use of any person whatsoever, either servant or soldier, therefore, in this project, he chose to make use of foxes as his incendiaries. They had injured Samson by their subtlety and malice, and now Samson returns the injury by subtle foxes and mischievous flames, which does them more mischief and harm than the animals he employed, to design to put contempt upon the enemies he fought against. This stratagem is often alluded to, to show how the church's adversaries, that are of different interests and designs among themselves, that look and draw contrary ways in other things, yet have often united in a fire-brand, some cursed project or other, to waste the church of God, and particularly to kindle the fire of his enemies. 2. The mischief he hereby did to the Philistines, was very great. It was in the time of wheat harvest, (v. 1.) so that the straw being dry, it soon burnt both the shocks of corn that were cut, and the standing corn, and the vineyards and olives. This was a waste of the good creatures, but where other acts of hostility are lawful, destroying the forage is justly reckoned to be so. If he might take away their lives, he might take away their livelihood; and God was righteous in it, the corn, and the wine, and the oil, which they had prepared for Dagon, to be a meat-offering to him, were thus, in the season thereof, made a burnt-offering to God's justice. IV. The Philistines' outrage against Samson's treacherous wife and her father; understanding that they had provoked Samson to do this mischief to the country, they roused up Samson and burnt him with fire, perhaps in their own house. To Samson himself they durst not attack, and therefore with more justice than perhaps they themselves designed in it, they wreak their vengeance upon those who, they could not but own, had given him cause to be angry. Instead of taking vengeance upon Samson, they took vengeance for him, when he, out of respect to the relation he had stood in to them, was not willing to do it for himself. See his hand in it, to whom vengeance belongs! those that deal treacherously, shall be spoiled and dealt treacherously with, and the Lord is known by these judgments which he executes; especially when, as here, he may take away his people's enemies as instruments for revenging his people's injuries upon another. When a barbarous Philistine sets fire to a treacherous one, the righteous may rejoice to see the divine vengeance, Ps. 58. 10, 11. Thus shall the wrath of man praise thee, Ps. 76. 10. The Philistines had threatened Samson's wife, that if she would not get the riddle out of him, they would burn her and her father's house with fire, ch. 14, 15. 3. The Philistines made all their efforts to save Samson and his wife; and had betrayed his wife, and what come of it? They were very angry that she feared, and sought by sin to avoid, came upon her; and she and her father's house were burnt with fire, and her countrymen, whom she sought to oblige by the wrong she did to her husband, brought it upon her. The mischief we seek to escape by any unlawful practices, we often pull them upon our own heads. He that will thus save his life shall lose it. V. The occasion that Samson took from hence to do them yet a greater mischief, which touched their bone and their flesh; (v. 7, 8.) Though ye have done this to them, and thereby showed what ye would do to me if ye could, yet that shall not deter me from being further vexatious to you. Or, Though ye think, by doing this, ye have made me satisfaction for the affront I received among you, yet have I Israel's cause to plead as a public person, and for the wrongs done to them, I will be avenged on you; and if ye will then forbear your insults, I will cease, aiming at no more than the deliverance of Israel. So he smote them hip and thigh, with a great stroke; so the word is. We suppose the wounds he gave them to have been mortal, as wounds in the hip or thigh often prove, and therefore translate it, with a great slaughter. Some think he only lamed them, disabled them for service, as horses were houghed or lam-strung. It seems to be a phrase used to express a desperate attack; he killed them pell-mell, or routed them home and foot. He smote them with his hip upon thigh, that is, with the strength he had, not in his arms and hands, but in his hips and thighs, for he kicked and spurred at them, and so mortified them, trod them in his anger, and scattered them in his fury, Isa. 63. 3. And, when he had done, he retired to a natural fortress in the top of the rock Etam, where he waited to see whether the Philistines would be tamed by the correction he had given them.

9. Then the Philistines went up, and pitched in Judah, and spread themselves in Lehi. 10. And the men of Judah said, Why are ye come up against us? And they answered, To bind Samson are we come up, to do to him as he has done to us. 11. Then three thousand men of Judah went to the top of the rock Etam, and said to Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us? What is this that thou hast done unto us? And he said unto them, As they did unto me, so have I done unto them. 12. And they said unto him, We are come down to bind thee, that we may deliver thee into the hand of the Philistines. And Samson said unto them, Swear unto me, that ye will not fall upon me yourselves. 13. And they spake unto him, saying, No; but we will bind thee fast, and deliver thee into their hand: but surely we will not kill thee. And they bound him with two new cords, and brought him up from the rock. 14. And when he came unto Lehi, the Philistines shouted against him: and the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him; and the cords that were upon his arms became as flax that was burnt with fire, and his hands loosed from off his hands. 15. And he found a new jaw-bone of an ass, and put forth his hand and took it, and slew a thousand men therewith.

16. And Samson said, With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, with the jaw of an ass have I slain a thousand men.

17. And it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking, that he cast away the jaw-bone out of his hand, and called that place Ramath-lehi.

Here is,

I. Samson violently pursued by the Philistines. They went up in a body, a more formidable force than they had together when Samson smote them hip and thigh, and they pitched in Judah, and spread themselves up and down the country to find out Samson, who, they heard, was come this way.

v. 9. When the men of Judah, who had tamely submitted to their yoke, pleaded that they had paid their tribute, and that none of their tribe had given them any offence, they freely own they designed nothing in this invasion but to seize Samson; they would fight neither against small nor great, but only that Judge of Israel, (v. 10.) to do to him, as he has done to us. This is, to smite him and the like, as he did our; an eye for an eye. Here was an army, come against one man, for indeed he was himself an army. Thus a whole band of men was sent to seize our Lord Jesus, that blessed Samson, though a tenth part would have served now that his hour was come, and ten times as many would have done nothing, if he had not yielded.

II. Samson basely betrayed and delivered up by the men of Judah, v. 11. Of Judah were they? Degenerate branches of that valiant tribe! Utterly unworthy to carry in their standard the Lion of the tribe of Judah. Perhaps they were disaffected to Samson because he was not of their tribe; out of a foolish fondness for their forfeited preceptitude, they would rather be oppressed by Philistines, than rescued by a Deliverer. Often has the church's deliverance been obstructed by such jealousies, as not only have hindered, but so far stood against the Lord's own purposes.

v. 10. If they had had the least spark of ingenuity and courage remaining in them, having so brave a man as Samson was, to head them, they would now have made one bold struggle for the recovery of their liberty; but no marvel if they that had debased themselves to hell in the worship of their dunghill-gods, (Isa. 57. 9.) thus debased themselves to the dust, in submission to their insulating oppressors. Sin dispirits men, nay, it incapacitates them for all acts that belong to their peace. Probably, Samson went into the border of that country to offer his service, supposing his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them, as M. ses did, Acts 7, 25. But they thrust him from them, and very disingenuously, I. Blamed him for what he had done against the Philistines, as if he had done them a great injury. Their grateful returns have those often received, that have done the greatest service imaginable to their country. Thus our Lord Jesus did many good works, and for those they were ready to stone him. 2. They begged of him that he would suffer them to bind him, and deliver him up to the Philistines. Cowardly, unhumble wretches! Fond of their fetters, and in love with servitude! Thus the Jews delivered up our Saviour, though they knew of a fear lest the Romans should come, and take away their place and nation. With what a solrid servile spirit do they argue? Knowest thou not that the Philistines rule over us? And whose fault was that? They knew they had no right to rule over them, nor had they been sold into their hands, if they had not first sold themselves to work wickedness.

III. Samson tamely yielding to be bound by his countrymen, and delivered into the hands of his enraged enemies, v. 12, 13. How easily could he have beaten them off, and kept the top of his rock against these three thousand men, and none of them all could, or durst, have lain hands on him; but he patiently submitted. 1. That he might give an example of great meekness, mixed with great strength and courage; as one that had rule over his own spirit, he knew how to yield, as well as how to conquer. 2. That by being delivered up to the Philistines, he might have an opportunity of making a slaughter of them. 3. That he might be a type of Christ, who when he had showed what he could do in striking those down that came to seize him, yielded to be bound and led as a Lamb to the slaughter.

Samson justified himself in what he had done against the Philistines; "As they did to me, so I did to them." It seems, he knew he that had ought not to retaliate it upon me, for they began." He covenants with the men of Judah, that if he put himself into their hands, they should not fall upon him themselves, because then he should be tempted to fall upon them, which he was very loath to do. This they promised him, (v. 13.) and then he surrendered. The men of Judah, being his betrayers, were, in effect, his murderers; they would not do him these kindness, but they did that which was worse, they delivered him into the hands of the uncircumcised Philistines, who, they knew, would do worse than kill him, would abuse and torment him to death. Perhaps they thought, as some think Judas did, when he betrayed Christ, that he would by his strength, deliver himself out of their hands; but if he had, that was no thanks to them, and if they thought otherwise, they might think it again, that he could and would have delivered them too, if they would have adhered to him, and made him their head. Justly is their misery prolonged, who to oblige their worst enemies, thus abuse their best friend. Never were men so infatuated, except those who thus treated our blessed Saviour.

IV. Samson, with singing his part good against the Philistines, even then when he was delivered into their hands, fast pinioned with two new cords. The Philistines, when they had him among them, shouted against him, v. 14. So, triumphing in their success, and insulting over him; if God had not tied their hands faster than the men of Judah had tied this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hand of the uncircumcised? 19. But God clave a hollow place that was in the jaw, and there came water thereout; and when he had drunk, his spirit came again, and he revived: wherefore he called the name thereof En-hakkore, which is in Lehi unto this day. 20. And he judged Israel, in the days of the Philistines, twenty years.

Here is,

1. The distress Samson was in, after this great performance, v. 18. He was sore athirst. It was a natural effect of the great heat he had been in, and the great pains he had taken; his zeal consumed him, ate him up, and made him forget himself, till, when he had time to pause a little, he found himself reduced to the last extremity for want of water, and ready to faint. Perhaps there was a special hint of God at this time of his power and goodness, and God would hereby keep him from being proud of his great strength and great achievements, and let him know that he was but a man, and liable to the calamities that are common to men. And Josephus says, It was designed to chastise him for not making mention of God and his hand, in his memorial of the victory he had obtained, but taking all the praise to himself; I have slain a thousand men, even now that he is ready to die for thirst, he is under a sensible conviction that his own arm could not have saved him, without God's right hand and arm. Samson had drank largely of the blood of the Philistines, but blood will never quench any man's thirst. Providence so ordered it, that there was no water near him, and he was so fatigued that he could not go far to seek it: the men of Judah, one would think, should have met him, now that he was come off a conqueror, with bread and wine, as Melchizedek did Abram, to atone for the injury he had done him; but so little notice did they take of their deliverer, that he was ready to perish for want of a draught of water. Thus are the greatest slights often put upon those that do the greatest services. Christ, on the cross, said, I thirst.

2. His prayer to God in this distress. Those that forget to seek them who do good services, may perhaps be compelled to attend him with their prayers. Afflictions are often sent to bring unthankful people to God. Two things he pleads with God in this prayer; 1. His having experienced the power and goodness of God in his late success; Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant. He owns himself God's servant in what he had been doing, "Lord, wilt thou not own me, and be poor servant of thine, and have me in thy service? I am thine, save me." He calls this victory a deliverance, a great deliverance; for if God had not helped him, he had not only not conquered the Philistines, but had been swallowed up by them. He owns it to come from God, and now corrects his former error, in assuming it too much to himself; and this he pleads in his present strait. Note, If a prayer of praise is not so easy as a prayer of petition, yet experience makes this a very excellent pleas in prayer for further mercy. "Lord, thou hast delivered often, wilt thou not deliver still?" Ps. 56. 13. 2. His being now exposed to his enemies: "Irst I fall into the hands of the uncircumcised, and then they will triumph, will tell it in Gath, and in the streets of Ashkelon; and will, it not redound to God's dishonour, if his champion become so easy a prey to the uncircumcised?" The best pleas are those taken from God's glory.

III. The seasonsable relief God sent him. God heard his prayer, and sent him water, either out of the well, or out of the earth through the bone, v. 19. That bone which he made an instrument of God's service, God, to recompense him, made an instrument of his supply. But I rather incline to our marginal reading, God clave a hollow place that was in Lelihi: the place of this action was, from the jaw-bone, called Lelihi: even before the action we find it so called, v. 9, 14. And there, in the field or hill, or plain, or whatever it was, that was so called, God caused a fountain suddenly and seasonably to open just by him, and water to spring up out of it in abundance, which continued a well ever after. Of this fair water he drank, and his spirits revived. We should be more thankful for the mercy of water, did we consider how ill we can spare it. And this instance of Samson's relief should encourage us to trust in God, and seek to him, for, when he pleasures, he can often rivers in high places. See Isa. 41. 17, 18.

IV. The memorial of this, in the name which Samson gave this upstart fountain, En-hakkore, the well of him that cried, thereby keeping in remembrance, both his own distress, which occasioned him to cry, and God's favour to him, in answer to his cry. Many a spring of comfort God gives to his people, which not only rendered by his name, it is the well of him that cried. Samson had given a name to that place, which denoted him great and triumphant, Ramath-lehi, the lifting up of the jaw-bone; but here he gives it another name, which denotes him wanting and dependant.

Lastly, The continuance of Samson's government after these achievements, v. 20. At length, Israel submitted to him, and committed themselves to his care. Now we have no dispute that God was with him, so that henceforward they all owned him, and were directed by him as their judge; the stone which the builders refused, became the head-stone. It intimates the low condition of Israel, that the government was dated by the days of the Philistines; yet it was a mercy to Israel, that though they were oppressed by a foreign enemy, yet they had a Judge that was not corrupted, and kept them from ruining one another. Twenty years his government continued according to the usage of the Judges' administration; but of the particulars we have no account, save of the beginning of his government in this chapter, and the end of it in the next.

CHAP. XVI.

Samson's name (we have observed before) signifies a little sun: (sol pares.) we have seen this sun rising very bright, and his morning-ray standing near; and on the contrary, we take it for granted, that the middle of the day was proportionably illustrious, while he judged Israel twenty years; but the melancholy story of this chapter gives us such an account of his evening, as doth not commence till the day is spent. This little sun set under a cloud, and yet, just in the setting, darted forth one such strong and glorious beam, as made him then a type of Christ, conquering by death. Here is,

1. Samson's journey to Gaza, and his adventure there. He had a harlot, and hardly escaping, v. 1-3. II. Samson quite ruined by his familiarity with another harlot, Delilah. Observe, 1. How he was betrayed by her to his swoon; and also, (1.) By her means got it out of him at last where his great strength lay, v. 5-17. (2.) Then robbed him of his strength, by taking from his head the crown of his separation, v. 18-20. (3.) Then seized him, blinded him, imprisoned him, and at solemn festival made a show of him, v. 21-25. 2. How he avenged himself of them, by pulling down the theatre upon their heads, and so dying with them, v. 26-31.

1. THEN went Samson to Gaza, and saw there a harlot, and went into unto her. 2. And it was told the Gazites, saying, Samson is come hither. And they com passed him in, and laid wait for him all night in the gate of the city, and were quiet all the night, saying, In the morning, when it is day, we shall kill him. 3. And Samson lay till midnight, and arose at midnight, and took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them up to the top of a hill that is before Hebron.

Here is,

1. Samson's sin, v. 1. His taking a Philistine to wife, in the beginning of his time, was, in some degree, excusable; but to join himself to a harlot that he accidentally saw among them, was such a profanation of his honour as an Israelite, as a Nazarite, that we cannot but blush to read it. 'Tell it not in Gath. 2. His vile conduct makes the gracious visagio of Nazarite blander than a coal, Lam. 4. 7, 8. We find not that Samson had any business at Gaza; if he went thither in quest of a harlot, it would make one willing to hope, that, as bad as things were otherwise, there were no prostitutes among the daughters of Israel. Some think he went thither to observe what posture the Philistines were in, that he might get some advantages against them; if so, he forgot his business, neglected that, and so fell into this snare. His sin began in his eye, with which he should have made a covenant; he saw there one in the attire of a harlot, and the lust which conceived, brought forth sin, he went in unto her.

2. Samson's danger. Notice was sent to the magistrates of Gaza, perhaps by the treacherous harlot herself, that Samson was in the town, v. 2. Probably, he came in a disguise, or in the dusk of the evening, went into an inn, or public-house, which happened to be kept by this harlot. The gates of the city were hereupon shut, guards set, all kept quiet, that Samson might suspect no danger; now they thought they had him in a prison, and doubted not but to be the death of him the next morning. O that all those who indulge their sensual appetites in drunkenness, uncleanness, or fleshly lusts, would see one of the sin he was now in guilty of, and of himself because of it, and with a pious resolution not to return to it; rose under an apprehension of the danger he was in, that he was as one that slept upon the top of a mast, rise with such thoughts as these; "Is this a bed fit for a Nazarite to sleep in? Shall a temple of the living God be thus polluted? Can I be safe under this guilt?" It was bad that he lay down to sleep; but it could have been worse if he had lain still under them. He makes immediately toward the gate of the city, probably finds the guards asleep, else he had made them sleep their last, stays not to break open the gates, but plucks up the posts, takes them, gates and bar and all, all very large and strong, and a vast weight, yet he carries them on his back several miles up to the top of a
As the story unfolds, we see the Philistines' attempt to secure the victory against Samson, whose strength was paramount.

4. And it came to pass afterward, that he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah. 5. And the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and said unto her, Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him, that we may bind him to afflict him; and we will give thee, every one of us, eleven hundred pieces of silver. 6. And Delilah said to Samson, Tell me, I pray thee, wherein thy great strength lieth, and wherewith thou mightest be bound to afflict thee. 7. And Samson said unto her, If they bind me with seven green withes that were never dried, then shall I be weak, and be as another man. 8. Then the lords of the Philistines brought up to her seven green withes which had not been dried, and she bound him with them. 9. Now there were men lying in wait, abiding with her in the chamber. And she said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he brake the withes as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire: so his strength was not known. 10. And Delilah said unto Samson, Behold, thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: now tell me, I pray thee, wherein with thou mightest be bound. 11. And he said unto her, If they bind me with seven green withes that were never occupied, then shall I be weak, and be as another man. 12. Delilah therefore took seven green withes, and bound him therewith, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And there were lers in wait abiding in the chamber. And he brake them from off his arms like as a thread. 13. And Delilah said unto Samson, Hitherto thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: tell me wherewith thou mightest be bound. And he said unto her, If thou waverest the seven locks of my head with the web. 14. And she fastened it with the pin, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awaked out of his sleep, and went away with the pin of the beam, and with the web. 15. And she said unto him, How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me? thou hast mocked me these three times, and hast not told me wherein thy great strength lieth. 16. And it came to pass, when she pressed him daily with her words, and urged him, so that his soul was vexed unto death, 17. That he told her all his heart, and said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon mine head; for I have been a Nazarite unto God from my mother's womb: if I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and he like any other man.

The burnt child dreads the fire; yet Samson, that has more than the strength of a man, in this comes short of the wisdom of a child; for though he had been more than once brought into the highest degree of mischief and danger by the love of women, and lasting after them, yet he would not take warning, but is here again taken in the same snare, and with such third time pays for all. Solomon seems to refer especially to this story of Samson, so that his caution against uncleanness, he gives this account of a whorish woman, Prov. 7. 26, That she hath cast down many wounded, yet many strong men have been slain by her. And ch. 6. 26, That the adulteress will hunt for the precious life. This bad woman that brought Samson to ruin, is here named Delilah, an infamous name, and fitly used to express the person, or thing, that by flattery or falsehood, brings mischief and destruction on those to whom kindness is pretended. See here,

I. The affection Samson had for Delilah; he loved her, v. 4. Some think she was his wife, but then he would have had her home to his own house; others, that he courted her to make her his wife; but there is too much reason to suspect that it was a sinful affection he had for her, and that he lived in uncleanness with her: whether she was an Israelite or a Philistine, is not certain. If an Israelite, which is scarcely probable, yet she had the heart of a Philistine.

II. The interest which the lords of the Philistines made with her to betray Samson, v. 5. That which they told her they designed, was, to humble him, or afflict him; they would promise not to do him any hurt, only they would disable him to do them any. And so much conscience it should seem they made of this promise, that even then, when he lay ever so much at their mercy, they would not kill him, no, not when the razor that cut his hair, might sooner, and more easily have cut his throat. 2. That which they desired, in order hereunto, was, to know where his great strength lay, and by what means he might be bound. Perhaps they imagined he had some spell or charm which he carried about with him, by the force of which he did all these great things, and doubted not, but if they could get that from him, he would be manageable; and therefore, having had reason enough formerly to know which was his blind side, hoped to find out his riddle a second time; by ploughing with his heifer, they engaged Delilah to get it out of him, telling her what a kindness it would be to them, and, perhaps, assuring her it should not be referred to any real mischief, either to him or her. 3. For this they bid high, promised to give her each of them eleven hundred pieces of silver, fifty-five hundred in all. So many shekels reckoned to above one thousand pounds sterling; with this she was hired to betray one she pretended to love; see how horrid wickedness the love of money is the root of.
Our blessed Saviour was thus overtaken by one whom he called friend, and with a kiss too, for filthy lucre. No marvel if those who are unchaste, as Delilah, be unjust; such as lose their honesty in one instance.

III. The arts by which he put her off from time to time, and kept his own counsel a great while. She asked him _where his great strength lay_, and whether it was possible for him to be bound and afflicted, (v. 6.) pretending that she desired only that he would satisfy her curiosity in that one thing, and that she thought it was impossible he should be bound, otherwise than by her charms. When she urged him very much, he told her, I. That he might be bound with _seven green withes_, v. 7. The experiment was tried, (v. 8.) but it would not do; he _broke the withes_ as easily as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire, v. 9. 2. When she still continued her importunity, (v. 10.) he told her that with two new ropes he might be so cramped and hampered, that he might be as easily dealt with as any other man, v. 11. This experiment was tried too, but it failed; the _new ropes_ broke from off his arm _like a thread_, v. 12. 3. When she still pressed him to communicate the secret, and upbraided him with it as an unkindness, that he had bantered her so long, he then told her that the weaving of the seven locks of his head would make a great alteration in him, v. 13. This came nearer the matter than anything he had yet said, but it would not do; his strength appeared to be very weak after this trial. When, from the trial of this, purely by the strength of his hair, he carried away _the wind of the beam_, and the web.

Now, in the making of all these experiments, it is hard to say, whether there appears more of Samson's weakness, or Delilah's wickedness. (1.) Could any thing be more wicked than her restless and unreasonable importunity with him, to discover a secret, which she knew would endanger his life, if ever it were lodged any where but in his own breast? What could be more base and disingenuous, more false and treacherous, than to lay his head in her lap, as one whom she loved, and at the same time to design the betraying of him to those by whom he was mortally hated? (2.) Could any thing be more weak than for him to continue a parley with one who, he so plainly saw, was aiming to do him a mischief, that he should sit down and converse with the person, and let him create an early question, that she might know _how to do him a mischief_; when he perceived liers in wait for him in the chamber, and that they were ready to apprehend him if they had been able, he did not immediately quit the chamber, with a resolution never to come into it any more; nay, that he should again lay his head in that lap, out of which he had been so often roused with that alarm, _The Philistines are upon thee,_.

IV. The discovery he at last made of this great secret; and if the discovery prove fatal to him, he must thank himself, who had not power to keep his own counsel from one that manifestly sought his ruin. _Surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird, but in Samson's sight is the net spread, and yet he is taken in it._ If he had not been blind, as the Philistines put out his eyes, he might have seen himself before he fell. This signifies a _consumer_, she was so to him. Observe, 1. How she teased him, telling him she will not believe he loved her, unless he will gratify her in this matter; (v. 15.) _How canst thou say I love thee, when thine heart is not with me?_ That is, "when thou canst not trust me with the counsels of thy heart?" Passionate lovers cannot bear to have their love called in question, they would do any thing rather than their sincerity should be suspected; here therefore Delilah had this fond fool (excuse me that I call him so) at an advantage. This expostulation is indeed grounded upon a great truth, That those only have our love, not that have our good words, or our good wishes, but that have our hearts. That is love without dissimulation; but it is falsehood and flattery in the highest degree, to say, We love those with whom our hearts are not. How can we say, We love either our brother whom we have seen, or God, whom we have not seen, if our hearts be not with them? She continued many days vexatious to him with her importunity, so that he had no pleasure of his life with her; (v. 16.) why then did he not leave her? It was because he was captivated to her by the power of love, falsely so called, but truly last. This bewitched him with the force of it, see, 2. How she conquered him; (v. 17.) _he told her all his heart._ God left him to himself to do this foolish thing, to punish him for indulging himself in the lusts of uncleanness. The angel that foretold his birth said nothing of his great strength, but only that he should be a Nazarite, and particularly that no razor should come upon his head, ch. 13. 5. He discovered to God his great strength, for he was to be strengthened according to the glorious power of that Spirit which wrought in him mightily, that his strength, by promise, not by nature, might be a type and figure of the spiritual strength of believers, Col. 1. 11, 29. Therefore the badge of his consecration was the pledge of his strength; if he lose the former, he knows he forfeits the latter. If I be shaven, I am no longer a Nazarite; and then my strength, that is, the kingdom of his bodily strength to depend so much on his hair, which could have no natural influence up on it, either one way or other, teaches us to magnify divine institutions, and to expect God's grace, and the continuance of it, only in the use of those means of grace, wherein he has appointed us to attend upon him, the word, sacraments, and prayer. In these earthen vessels is his treasure.

18. And when Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart, she sent and called for the lords of the Philistines, saying, Come up this once: for he hath shewed me all his heart. Then the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and brought money in their hand. 19. And she made him sleep upon her knees: and she called for a man, and she caused him to shave off the seven locks of his head; and she began to afflict him, and his strength went from him. 20. And she said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awoke out of his sleep, and said, I will go out, as at other times before, and shake myself. And he wist not that the Lord was departed from him.
But the Philistines took him, and put out his eyes, and brought him down to Gaza, and bound him in fetters of brass; and he did grind in the prison-house.

We have here the fatal consequences of Samson's folly in betraying his own strength; he soon paid dearly for it. A whore is a deep ditch; he that is abroad of the Lord shall fall therein. In that pit Samson sinks.

1. What care Delilah took to make sure of the money for herself. She now perceived, by the manner of his speaking, that he had told her all his heart, and the lords of the Philistines that hired her to do this base thing, are sent for; but they must be sure to bring the money in their hands, v. 18. The wages of the light-headed were accordingly produced, unknown to Samson; it would grieve one's heart, to see one of the bravest men then in the world, sold and bought, as a sheep for the slaughter; how does this instance sully all the glory of man, and forbid the strong man ever to boast of his strength!

2. What course she took to deliver him up to them according to the bargain. Many in the world would, for the hundredth part of what was given Delilah, sell those that they pretend the greatest respect for. Trust not in a friend then, but no confidence in a guide. See what a treacherous method she took, (v. 19.) she made him sleep upon her knees. Josephus says, She gave him some intoxicating liquor, which laid him to sleep; what opiates she might steal into his cup, we know not, but we cannot suppose that he knowingly drank wine or strong drink, for that would have been a forfeiture of his Nazariteship, as much as the cutting off his hair. She pretended the greatest kindness then when she designed the greatest mischief, which yet she could not have compassed, if she had not made him sleep. See the fatal consequences of security. Satan ruins men by rocking them asleep, flattering them into a good opinion of their own safety, and so bringing them to mind nothing, and fearing nothing, and then he robs them of their strength and honour, and leads them captive at his will. When we sleep our spiritual enemies do not. When he was asleep, she had a person ready to cut off his hair, which he did so silently and so quickly, that it did not awake him, but plainly affected him; even in his sleep, his spirit manifestly sunk upon it. I think we may suppose, that if this ill turn had been done him in his sleep by some person without his being himself accessory to it, as he was here, it would not have had this strange effect upon him; but it was his own wickedness that corrected him. It was his iniquity, else it had not been so much his infidelity.

3. What little concern he himself was in at it, v. 20. He could not but miss his hair as soon as he awoke, and yet said, "I will shake myself, as at other times, when the Philistines are upon me, to make my part good against them." Perhaps he thought to shake himself the more easily, and that his head would feel the lighter, now that his hair was cut; little thinking how much heavier the burden of guilt was, than that of hair. He soon found in himself some change, we have reason to think so, and yet not to be startled from it. He did not consider that that was the reason of the change.

Note, Many have lost the favourable presence of God, and are not aware of it; they have provoked God to withdraw from them, but are not sensible of their loss, nor ever complain of it. Their souls languish and are grown weak, their gifts wither, every thing goes cross with them; and yet they impugn not this to the right cause, they are not aware that God is departed from them, nor are they in any case to reconcile themselves to him, or to recover his favour. When God is departed, we cannot do as at other times.

4. What improvement the Philistines soon made of their advantages against him, v. 21. The Philistines took the heart of Samson from him; those that have thrown themselves out of God's protection, become an easy prey to their enemies. If we sleep in the lap of our lust, we shall certainly wake in the hands of the Philistines. It is probable they had promised Delilah not to kill him, but they took an effectual course to disable him; the first thing they did when they had him in their hands, and found they could manage him, was, to cut out his eyes by applying fire to them, in the Arabic version. They considered that his eyes would never come again, as perhaps his hair might, and that the strongest arms could do little without eyes to guide him, and therefore if now they blind him, they for ever blind him. His eyes were the inlets of his sin, he saw the harlot at Gaza, and went in unto her, (v. 1.) and now his punishment began there. Now that the Philistines had blinded him, he had time to save something of his own lust which had blinded him. The best preservative of the eyes, is, to turn them away from beholding vanity. They brought him down to Gaza, that there he might appear in weakness, where he had lately given such proofs of his strength, (v. 3.) and be a jest to those to whom he had been a terror. They bound him with fetters of brass, who had before been held in the cords of his own iniquity, and he did grind in the prison-house in their Briddwell, either for their profit, or his punishment, or both. The Devil does thus by sinners, blinds the minds of them which believe not, and so enslaves them and secures them in his interests. Poor Samson, how art thou fallen! How is thine honour hid in the dust! How are the glory and defence of Israel become the drudge and triumph of the Philistines! The crown is fallen from his head, and unto him, for he hath sinned. Let all take warning by his fall, carefully to preserve their purity, and to watch against all fleshly lusts; for all our glory is gone, and our defence departed from us, when the covenant of our separation to God, as spiritual Nazarites, is profaned.

22. Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again after he was shaven. 23. Then the lords of the Philistines gathered them together for to offer a great sacrifice unto Dagon their god, and to rejoice: for they said, Our god hath delivered Samson our enemy into our hand. 24. And when the people saw him, they praised their god; for they said, Our god hath delivered into our hands our enemy, and the destroyer of our country, which slew many of us. 25. And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry, that they said, Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. And they called for Samson out of the prison-house; and he made them sport: and they set him between the pillars. 26. And Samson said unto the lad that held him by the hand, Suffer me that I may feel the pillars whereupon the house standeth, that I may lean upon them. 27. Now the house was full of men and women; and all the lords of the Philistines were there: and there were upon the roof about three thousand men and women, that beheld while Samson made sport. 23. And Samson called unto the Lord, and said, O Lord God, remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O Lord, that I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for my two eyes. 29. And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up, of the one with his right hand, and of the other with his left. 30. And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and upon all the people that were therein: so the dead which he slew at his death, were more than they which he slew in his life. 31. Then his brethren, and all the house of his father, came down, and took him, and brought him up, and buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol, in the burying place of Manoah his father. And he judged Israel twenty years.

Though the last stage of Samson's life was inglorious, and one could wish there were a veil drawn over it, yet this account here given of his death may be allowed to lessen, though it do not quite roll away, the reproof of it, for there was honour in his death. No doubt, he greatly repented of his sin, the dishonour he had by it done to God, and his forfeiture of the honour God had put upon him, for that immediately recoiled to him, appears, 1. By the return of the sign of his Nazariteness; (v. 22.) His hair began to grow again when he was shaven, that is, to be as thick and as long as when it was cut off. It is probable their general thanksgiving to Dagon was not long deferred, before which Samson's hair was thus grown; by which, and the particular notice taken of it, it seems to have been extra-ordinary, and designed for a special indication of the return of God's favour to him upon his repentance. For the growth of his hair was neither cause nor sign of the return of his strength, further than as it was the badge of his consecration, and a token that God accepted him as a Nazarite again, after the interruption, without those ceremonies which were appointed for the restoration of a lapsed Nazarite, which he had not now the opportunity of performing, Numb. 6. 9. It is strange that the Philistines, in whose hands he was, were not jealous of the growth of his hair again, and did not cut it; but perhaps they were willing his great strength should return to him, that they might have so much the more work cut of him, and now he was blind they were in no fear of any hurt from him. 2. By the use God made of him for the destruction of the enemies of his people, and that at a time when it would be most for the honour of God, and the vindication of that, and it served to give the defence and deliverance of Israel. Observe, 1. How insidiously the Philistines affronted the God of Israel. (1.) By the sacrifices they offered to Dagon, his rival. This Dagon they call their god, a god of their own making, represented by an image, the upper part of which was in the shape of a man, the lower part of a fish, purely the creature of fancy; yet it served them to set up in opposition to the true and living God. To this pretend-
2. When they were destroyed; (1.) When they were merry, sure, and jovial, and far from apprehending themselves in any danger. When they saw Samson lay hold on the pillars, we may suppose it served them for a jest, and they made sport with that too; What will this foolish Jew do? How will he entrust the sinners brought to desolation in a moment! They are lifted up in the pride and mirth, that their fall may be the more dreadful. Let us never enjoy the mirth of wicked people, but infer, from this instance, that their triumphing is short, and their joy but for a moment. (2.) It was when they were praising Dagon their god, and giving that honour to him which his own hand had designed for his own treason against the King of kings, his crown and dignity; justly therefore is the blood of these traitors mingled with their sacrifices. Belshazzar was cut off when he was praising his made gods, Dan. 5. 4. (3.) It was when they were making sport with an Israelite, a Nazarite, and insulting over him, persecuting him whom God had smitten. Nothing fills the measure of the iniquity of any person or people faster than mocking and missusing the servants of God, yea, though it is by their own folly that they are brought low. Those know not what they do, nor whom they affront, that make sport with a good man.

3. How they were destroyed; Samson pulled the house down upon them; God, no doubt, putting it into his heart, as a public person, thus to avenge God's people. It was the punishment of his perversity. (1.) He gained strength to do it by prayer, v. 28. That strength which he had lost by sin, he recovers, like a true penitent, by prayer; as David, who, when he had provoked the Spirit of grace to withdraw, prayed, (Ps. 51. 12.) Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free Spirit. We may suppose that this was only a mental prayer, and that his voice was not heard; (for it was made in a noisy clamorous crowd of Philistines;) but though his voice was not heard of men, yet his prayer was heard of God, and graciously answered; and though he lived not to give an account himself of this his prayer, as Nehemiah did of his, yet God not only accepted it in heaven, but, by revealing it to the inspired penman, provided for the registering of it in his church. He prays to God to remember him, and strengthen him this once, thereby owning that his strength for what he had already done, he had from God, and begged it might be afforded to him once more to give them a parting blow. That it was not from a principle of passion or personal revenge, but from a holy zeal for the glory of God and Israel, that he desired to do this, appears from God's accepting and answering the prayer. Samson died praying, so did our blessed Savior; but Samson prayed for vengeance, Christ for forgiveness. (2.) He gained opportunity to do it, by leaning on the two pillars which were the chief supports of the building, and were, it seems, so near together, that he could take hold of them both at one time, v. 26, 29. Having hold of them, he bore them down with all his might, crying aloud, Let me die with the Philistines, v. 30. and there, proved faith in Act 2: during the wound, he died. The vast concourse of people that was upon the roof, looking down through it to see the sport, we may suppose contributed to the fall of it. A weight so much greater than ever it was designed to carry, might perhaps have sunk of itself, at least it made the fall more fatal to those within; and indeed few of either could escape the stroke, for the whole temple was thrown down. This was done, not by any natural strength of Samson, but by the almighty power of God, and is not only marvellous, but miraculous, in our eyes.

Now in this, [1.] The Philistines were greatly mortified. All their lords and great men were killed, and abundance of their people, and this, in the midst of their triumph; the temple of Dagon (as many think the house was) was pulled down, and Dagon buried in it. This would give a great check to the insolence of the survivors; and if Israel had had but so much sense and spirit left them, to improve the advantages of this juncture, they might now have thrown off the Philistines' yoke. (2.) Samson may very well be justified, and brought in not guilty of any sinful murder, either of himself or of the Philistines. He was a public person, a declared enemy to the Philistines, against whom he might therefore take all advantage; they were now in the same situation as his enemies, and making war upon him, all present were aiding and abetting. It mightily die with him. Nor was he a fele de se, or a self murderer, in it, for it was not his own life that he aimed, though he had too much reason to be weary of it, but the lives of Israel's enemies, for the reaching of which he bravely resigned his own, not counting it dear to him, so he might finish his course with honour. [3.] God was very much glorified, in pardoning Samson's great transgressions, of which this was an evidence. It has been said that the prince's giving of a commission to one convicted, amounts to a pardon. Yet though he was a God that forgave him, he took vengeance of his inventions; (Ps. 99. 8.) and by his suffering his champion to die in fetters, warned all to take heed of those lusts which war against the soul. However, we have good hope of the future, that though Samson died with the Philistines, he had not his share inportion with them. The Lord knows them that are his. [4.] Christ was plainly typified. He pulled down the Devil's kingdom, as Samson did Dagon's temple; and when he died, obtained the most glorious victory over the powers of darkness. Then when his arms were stretched out upon the cross, as Samson's to the two pillars, he gave a fatal stroke to the gates of hell, and, like Samson, he had prayed him, that had the power of death, that is the Devil; (Heb. 2. 14, 15.) and herein exceeded Samson, that he not only died with the Philistines, but rose again to triumph over them.

Lastly, the story of Samson concludes, 1. With an account of his burial; his own relations, animated by the glories that attended his death, came and found out where his body was, and brought it home, and placed it in the place of his father's sepulchres; the Philistines being in such a constellation, that they durst not oppose it. 2. With the repetition of the account we had before of the continuance of his government, he judged Israel twenty years; and if they had not been as mean and sneaking as he was brave and daring, he had left them sound, but long before, even soon after the death of Joshua, in the days of Phinehas the son of Eleazar, ch. 20. 98. But it is east here into the latter part of the book, that it might not interrupt the history of the Judges. That it might appear how happy the nation was in the Judges, how happy they were when there was none. 1. Then idolatry began in the family of Micaeh, ch. 17. 11. It spread itself into the tribe of Dan, ch. 18. 11. Then villany was committed by the Nazarite of the tribe of Manasseh, and the Philistines were happy. 10. Then that whole tribe was destroyed for countenancing it, ch. 20. 9. Then strange expedients were adopted to keep up that tribe, ch. 21. Therefore blessed be God for the government we are under. In this chapter we are told how Micaeh an Ephramite furnished himself, I
With an image for his god, ver. 1. 6. 2. With a Levite, such a one as he was, for his priest, v. 7. 13.

1. AND there was a man of mount Ephraim, whose name was Micah.

2. And he said unto his mother, The eleven hundred shekels of silver that were taken from thee, about which thou cursedst, and spakest of also in mine ears, behold, the silver is with me; I took it. And his mother said, Blessed be thou of the Lord, my son.

3. And when he had restored the eleven hundred shekels of silver to his mother, his mother said, I had wholly dedicated the silver unto the Lord, from my hand, for my son, to make a graven image and a molten image; now, therefore, I will restore it unto thee. 4. Yet he restored the money unto his mother; and his mother took two hundred shekels of silver, and gave them to the founder, who made thereof a graven image and a molten image: and they were in the house of Micah.

5. And the man Micah had a house of gods, and made an ephod, and teraphim, and consecrated one of his sons, who became his priest. 6. In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes.

Here we have,

I. Micah and his mother quarrelling. 1. The son robs the mother. The old woman had hoarded, with long scraping and saving, a great sum of money—eleven hundred pieces of silver. It is likely she intended, when she died, to leave it to her son; in the mean time, it did her good to look upon it, and to count it over. The young man has a family of children grown up, for he had one of age to be a priest; (v. 5.) he knows where to find his mother's cash, thinks he has more need of it than she has, cannot stay till she dies, and so takes it away privately for his own use. Though it is a fault in the renters to withhold from the children that is meet, and leads them into temptation to wish them in their graves, yet even that will by no means excuse the wickedness of those children that steal from their parents, and think all their own which they can get from them, though by the most indirect methods. 2. The mother curses the son, or whosoever had taken her money. It should seem she suspected her son; for when she cursed, she spoke in his ears so loud, and with so much passion and vehemence, as made both his ears to tingle. See what mischief the love of money makes, how it destroys the duty and comfort of every relation. It was the love of money that made Micah so unkind to his mother as to rob her; and made her so unkind and void of natural affection to her son as to curse him if he had it and concealed it. Outward losses to good people to their prayers, but bad people to their curses. This woman's silver was her god, before it was made either into a graven or a molten image, else the loss of it would not have put her into such a passion as quite to forget and break through all the laws of decency and piety. It is a very foolish thing for those that are provoked, to throw their curses about, as a madman that casteth firebrands and death; since they know not but they may light upon those that are most dear to them.

II. Micah and his mother reconciled. 1. The son was so terrified with the mother's curses, that he restored the money. Though he had so little grace as to take it, he had so much left as not to dare to keep it, when his mother had sent a curse after it. He could not believe his mother's money would do him any good, without her mother's blessing; no darest he deny the theft when he is charged with it, nor retain the money when it is demanded by the right owner. It is best not to do evil, but if it is next best, when it is done, to undo it again, by repentance, confession, and restitution. Let children be afraid of having the prayers of their parents against them; for though the curse causeth not to come, yet that which is justly deserved, may be justly feared, even though it were passionately and indecently uttered. 2. The mother was so pleased with her son's repentance, that she recalled her curses, and turned them into prayers for her son's welfare; Blessed be thou of the Lord, my son. When those that have been guilty of a fault, appear to be free and ingenuous in owning it, they ought to be commended for their repentance, rather than still be condemned and upbraided for their faults.

III. Micah and his mother agreeing to turn their money into a god, and set up idolatry in their family; and this seems to have been the first instance of the revolt of any Israelite from God and his instituted worship, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that outlived him, and is therefore particularly related. And though this was only the worship of a true God by image, against the second commandment, yet this opened the door to the worship of the other gods, Baalim and the groves, against the first and great commandment. Observe,

1. The mother's contrivance of this matter. When the silver was restored, she pretends she had dedicated it to the Lord; (v. 3.) either before it was stolen, and then she would have thought to be the reason why she was so much grieved at the loss of it, and imprecated evil on him that had taken it, because it was a dedicated, and therefore an accursed, thing; or, after it was stolen, she had made a vow that if she could retrieve it, she would dedicate it to God, and then she would have the providence that had so far favoured her as to bring it back to her hands, to be an example of God's favour. Come to God in the right way; "there is no God like the Lord, thou hast a mind to it: let it be neither mine nor thine, but let us both agree to make it into an image for a religious use." Had she put it to a use that had been indeed for the service and honour of God, it had been a good way of accommodating the matter between them; but as it was, the project was wicked. Probably, this old woman was one of those that came out of Egypt, and would have such images made as she had seen there; now that she began to dote, she called to remembrance the follies of her youth, and perhaps told her son that this way of worshipping God by images, was, to her knowledge, the old religion.

2. The son's compliance with her. It should seem, when she first proposed the thing, he stumbled at it, knowing what the second commandment was; for then (v. 3.) she designed it for her son to make an image of, yet he restored it to his mother, (being loath to have a hand in making the image,) and she gave it to the founder and had the thing done, blaming him perhaps for scrupling it, v. 4. But when the images were made, Micah, by his mother's persuasion, was not only well reconciled to them, but exceedingly pleased and in love with them; so strangely bewitching was idolatry, and so much supported by traditions received from their parents, 1 Pet. 1. 18. Jer. 44. 17. But observe how the old woman's covetousness prevailed, in part, above her superstition; she had wholly de-

7. And there was a young man out of Beth-lehem-judah, of the family of Judah, who was a Levite, and he sojourned there.

3. And the man departed out of the city from Beth-lehem-judah, to sojourn where he could find a place; and he came to mount Ephraim, to the house of Micah, as he journeyed.

9. And Micah said unto him, Whence comest thou? And he said unto him, I am a Levite of Beth-lehem-judah, and I go to sojourn where I may find a place.

10. And Micah said unto him, Dwell with me, and be unto me a father and a priest, and I will give thee ten shekels of silver by the year, and a suit of apparel, and thy victuals.

So the Levite went in. 11. And the Levite was content to dwell with the man; and the young man was taken to him as one of his sons. 12. And Micah consecrated the Levite; and the young man became his priest, and was in the house of Micah.

13. Then said Micah, Now know I that the LORD will do me good, seeing I have a Levite to my priest.

We have here an account of Micah's furnishing himself with a Levite for his chaplain, either thinking his son, because the heir of his estate, too good to officiate, or rather, because not of God's tribe, not good enough.

Observe

1. What brought this Levite to Micah. By his mother's side he was of the family of Judah, and lived at Beth-lehem among his mother's relations, (for that was not a Levites' city,) or, upon some other account, as a stranger or inmate, sojourned there, v. 7. Therefore he went to sojourn where he could find a place, and in his travels came to the house of Micah in mount Ephraim, v. 8. Now, 1. Some think it was his unhappiness that he was under a necessity of removing, either because he was persecuted and abused, or rather neglected and starved, at Bethlehem. God had made plentiful provision for the Levites, but the people withheld their dues, and did not help them into the possession of the cities assigned them; they were reduced to straits, and no care was taken for their relief. Israel's forsaking of God, began with forsaking the Levites, which therefore they are warned against, Deut. 12. 19. It is a sign religion is going to decay, when good ministers are neglected, and at a loss for a livelihood. But, 2. It seems rather to have been his fault and folly, that he loved to wander, the more so as he had forfeited the respect of his friends, and, having a roving head, would go seek his fortune, as we say. We cannot conceive that things were yet come to that bad pass among them, that a Levite should be poor, unless it was his own fault. As these are fit to be pitied, that would fix but may not, so these are fit to be punished, that might fix but will not.

Unsettledness being, one would think, a constant unbusiness, it is strange that any Israelite, especially any Levite, should affect it.
II. What bargain Micah made with him. Had he not been well enough content with his son for his priest, he would have gone or sent abroad to inquire for a Levite; but now he only takes hold of one that dropped into his hands, which showed that he had no great zeal in the matter. It is probable that this rambling Levite heard, in the country, of Micah’s house of gods, his graven and molten image, which, if he had had any thing of the spirit of a Levite in him, would have brought him thither, to reprove Micah for his idolatry, to tell him how directly contrary it was to the law of God, and how it would bring the judgments of God upon him; but instead of this, he began to intrigue such of that sacred tribe, thither he goes, to offer his service, with

Have you any work for a Levite? For I am out of business, and go to sojourn where I may find a place; all he aimed at was to get bread, not to do good, v. 9. Micah courts him into his family, (v. 10.) and promises him, 1. Good preferment; Be unto me a father and a priest. Though a young man and taken up at the door, yet if he take him for a priest, he will respect him as a father, so far is he from setting him among his servants. He asks not for his credentials, takes no time to inquire how he behaved in the place of his last settlement, considers not whether, though he was a Levite, yet he might not be of such a bad character, as to be a plague and scandal to his family, but thinks, though he were ever so great a rake, he might serve for a priest to a graven image. Like Micah’s priest of the lowest of the people, 1 Kings 12. 31. No marvel if they who can make any thing serve for a god, make any thing serve for a priest. - 2. A tolerable maintenance. He will allow him meat, and drink, and clothes, a double suit, so the word is in the margin, a better and a worse, one for every day’s wear, and one for holy days, and ten shekels, about twenty-five shillings a year, for speckled money; a poor salary, in comparison of what God provided for the Levites that behaved well; but those that forsake God’s service, will never mend themselves, nor find a better master. The ministry is the best calling, but the worst trade, in the world.

III. The Levite’s settlement with him, v. 11. He was content to dwell with the man; though his work was superstitious, and his wages scandalous, he objected not to it. Thus we see himself, that he had lighted on so good a house. Micah, thinking himself holier than any of his neighbours, presumed to consecrate this Levite; (v. 12.) as if his building, furnishing, and endowing, this chapel, authorized him, not only to appoint the person that should officiate there, but to confer those orders upon him which he had no right to give, nor the other to receive. And now he shows him respect as a father, and tenderness as a son, and, with that, is willing to make up the deficiency of the coin he gave him.

IV. Micah’s satisfaction in this; (v. 13.) Now I know that the Lord will do me good; that is, he hoped that his new establishment would gain reputation among his neighbours, and that would turn to his advantage, for he would share in the profits of his house, and God would countenance, and bless him in all he put his hand unto, because I have a Levite to be my priest. 1. He thought it was a sign of God’s favour to him and his images, that he had so opportunely sent a Levite to his door. Thus they who please themselves with their own delusions, if Providence unexpectedly bring any thing to their hands, that furthers them in their evil way, are too apt from thence to infer that God takes pleasure with them. 2. He thought now that the error of his priesthood was amended, all was well, though he still retained his graven and molten image. Note, Many deceive themselves into a good opinion of their state, by a partial reformation. They think they are as good as they should be, because, in some particular instance, they are not so bad, and yet they are as bad as ever; the fault would atone for persisting in all the rest. 3. He thought the making of a Levite into a priest was a very meritorious act, which really was a presumptuous usurpation, and very provoking to God. Men’s pride, and ignorance, and self-flattery, will undertake, not only to justify, but magnify and sanctify, the most during impieties and invasions upon the divine prerogatives. With much reason might Micah have said, "Now may I fear that God will curse me, because I have debauched one of his own tribe, and drawn him into the worship of a graven image;” yet, for this, he hopes God will do him good. 4. He thought that having a Levite in the house with him, would of course entitle him to the divine favour. Carnal hearts are apt to build too much upon their external privileges, and to conclude that God will certainly do them good, because they have been sold of God’s part, and, well in praying families, are linked in society with those that are very good, and sit under a lively ministry; whereas all this is but like having a Levite to be their priest, which amounts to no security at all that God will do them good, unless they be good themselves, and make a good use of those advantages.

CHAP. XVIII.

How idolatry crept into the family of Micah we read in the chapter before, how it was translated from thence into the tribe of Dan we have an account in this chapter, and how it gained a settlement in a city of note; for how great a matter doth a little fire kindle! The tribe of Dan had their lot assigned them last of all the tribes, and, it happening to be too strait for them, a considerable city in the utmost corner of Canaan northward was added to it, "Let them get it, and take it;" it was called Laish or Le Beth, Josh. 10. 47. Now here we are told, I. How they sent spies to bring them an account of the place, who, by the way, got acquainted with Micah’s priest, v. 1 - 6. II. What they say to Micah, and his reply, v. 7 - 10. III. What forces were sent to conquer Laish, v. 11. - 13. IV. How they, by the way, plundered Micah’s gods, v. 14. - 25. V. How easily they conquered Laish, v. 27. - 29. and, when they had it, set up the graven image in it, v. 30, 31.

1. In those days there was no king in Israel: and in those days the tribe of the Danites sought them an inheritance to dwell in; for unto that day all their inheritance had not fallen unto them among the tribes of Israel. 2. And the children of Dan sent of their family five men from their coasts. men of valour, from Zorah, and from Eshtaol, to spy out the land, and to search it; and they said unto them, Go, search the land: who, when they came to mount Ephraim, to the house of Micah, they lodged there. 3. When they were by the house of Micah, they knew the voice of the young man the Levite; and they turned in thither, and said unto him, Who brought thee hither? and what maketh thou in this place? and what hast thou here? 4. And he said unto them, Thus and thus dealeth Micah with me, and hath hired me, and I am his priest. 5. And they said unto him, Ask counsel, we pray thee, of God, that we may know whether our way which we go shall be prosperous. 6. And the priest said unto them, Go in peace: before the Lord is your way wherein ye go.

Here is,
1. The eye which these Danites had upon Laish, not the whole tribe of Dan, but one family of them, to whose lot, in the subdivision of Canaan, that city fell. Hitherto this family had sojourned with their brethren, who had taken possession of their lot, which lay between Jud. and the Philistines, and had declined going to their own city, because they was going over to them, v. 1. It lay a great way off, separate from the rest of their tribe: it was entirely in the enemy's land, and therefore they would spunge upon their brethren, rather than go far to provide for themselves. But, at length, necessity forced them to it, and they began to think of an inheritance to dwell in. It is better to have a little of one's own, than always to hang upon others.

2. The inquiry which this family of the Danites made concerning Laish. They sent five men to search the land, (v. 2.) that they might know the character of the country, whether it was an inheritance worth going so far for; and the posture of the people, whether the making of themselves masters of it was a thing practicable, what force was necessary in order thereunto, and which was the best way of making themselves masters upon it. They were sent, were men of valour, who, if they fell into their enemies' hands, knew how to look danger in the face. It is prudent to look before we leap; D.m had the subtlety of a serpent by the way, (Gen. 49. 17.) as well as the courage of a lion's whelp, leaping from Bashan, Deut. 33. 22.

3. The acquaintance which their spies got with Micah's priest, and the improvements they made of that acquaintance. It seems, they had known this Levite formerly, he being, in his rambles, been sometimes in their country; and though his countenance might be altered, they knew him again by his voice, v. 3. They were surprised to find him so far off, inquired what brought him thither, and he told them, v. 4. what business he had there, and what encouragement. They, understanding that he had no oracle in his custody, desired he would tell them whether they should prosper in their present undertaking, v. 5. See their carelessness and regardlessness of God and his providence; they would not have inquired of the Lord at all, if this Levite's mentioning of the teraphim he had with him, had not put it into their heads. Many never think of religion but just when it falls in their way, and they cannot avoid it, like chance-occurrences. See how the Danites looked upon the divine law, that they thought God, who had forbidden the religious use of graven images, would yet own them in consulting an image, and give them an answer of peace. Should he be inquired of by them? Ezek. 14. 3. They seem to have had a greater opinion of Micah's teraphim, than of God's Urim; for they had passed by Shiloh, and, for aught that appears, had not consulted with him, Mic 1. 6. High in their ignorance of the divine law, shabby Levite shall be an oracle to them. He betakes himself to his usual method of consulting his teraphim; and whether he himself believed it or no, he humoured the thing so well, that he made them believe he had an answer from God, encouraging them to go on, and assuring them of good success, v. 6. Go in peace, you shall be safe, and may be easy, for I am with thee, and my spirit is in thy midst. But is he approves it, (as the Lord is said to know the way of the righteous with acceptation,) and therefore L will make it prosperous; his eye will be upon you for: good, he will direct your way, and preserve your going out and coming in. Note, Our great care should be that our way be such as God approves, and if it be so, we may go in peace. If God care for us, on him let us cast our care, and be satisfied that we cannot miss our way, if he go before us.

7. Then the five men departed, and came to Laish, and saw the people that were therein, how they dwelt careless after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure; and there was no magistrate in the land, that might put them to shame in anything; and they were far from the Zidonians, and had no business with any man. 8. And they came unto their brethren to Zorah and Eshtaol; and their brethren said unto them, What say ye? 9. And they said, Arise, that we may go up against them: for we have seen the land, and, behold, it is very good: and are ye still? be not slothful to go, and to enter to possess the land. 10. When ye go, ye shall come unto a people secure, and to a large land: for God hath given it into your hands; a place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth. 11. And there went from thence of the family of the Danites, out of Zorah and out of Eshtaol, six hundred men appointed with weapons of war. 12. And they went up, and pitched in Kirjath-jearim, in Judah: wherefore they called that place Mahaneh-dan, unto this day: behold, it is behind Kirjath-jearim. 13. And they passed thence unto mount Ephraim, and came unto the house of Micah. community shares in the guilt. (2.) See what method must be used for the restraint of wickedness. Sinners must be put to shame, that they who will not be restrained by the shamefulness of the sin before God and their own consciences, may be restrained by the shamefulness of the punishment before men. All ways must be tried to dash sin out of countenance, and cover it with contempt, to make people ashamed of their idleness, drunkenness, cheating, lying, and other sins, by making reputation always appear on virtue's side. (3.) See how miserable, and how near to ruin, those places are, that either have no magistrates, or none that bear the sword to any purpose; the wicked then walk on, and try by the Lord. No happy are we in good laws and a good government.

2. It was ill guarded. The people of Laish dwelt careless, quiet, and secure, their gates left open, their walls out of repair, because under no apprehension of danger, any way; though their wickedness was so great, that they had reason to fear divine vengeance every day. It was a sign that the Israelites, through their sloth and cowardice, were not now so terroriz'd as the Canaanites were, as they had been when they first came among them, else the city of Laish, which, probably, knew itself to be assigned to them, would not have been so very secure. Though they were an open and inland town, they lived secure like the Zidonians, who were surrounded with the sea, and were well fortified both by art and nature; but were far from the zeal of the Lord, and the good of others, ready to help them to the danger which, by debauching their manners, they had helped to bring them into. And lastly, They had no business with any man, which bespeaks either the idleness they affected, they followed no trade, and so grew lazy and luxurious, and utterly unable to defend themselves, or the independency they affected, they scorned to be either in subjection to, or alliance with, any of their neighbours, and so they had none to protect them, or bring in any aid to them. They cared for nobody, and therefore nobody cared for them. Such as these were the men of Laish.

II. The encouragement which from hence they gave to their countrymen that sent them, to prosecute their design upon this city, v. 8 -10. Probably, the Danites had formed notions of the insuperable difficulties of the undertaking, that it would not be possible ever to make themselves masters of Laish, and therefore had kept themselves so long out of the possession of it; perhaps suggesting likewise to one another, in their unbelief, that it was not a country worth going so far and running such a risk for. Which jealousies the spies (and they were not, in this, evil spies) had an eye to in their report.

1. They represented the place as desirable: If ye will trust our judgments, we have seen the land, and we are agreed in our verdict upon the view, that, behold, it is very good, (v. 9.) better than this mountainous country into which we are here crowded by the Philistines. You need not doubt of living here comfortably in it, for it is a place where there is no want of any thing, (v. 10.) See what a good land Canaan was, that this city, which lay furthest of all the rest, in the utmost corner of the country, stood on such a fruitful spot. 2. They represented it as attainable; they do not at all question but, with God's blessing, they may soon get possession of it; for the people are secure, v. 10. And the more secure, always the less safe; "God has given it into your hands, and you may have it for the taking." They stir them up to the undertaking; Arise, that we may go up against them, let us go about it speedily and resolutely. They expostulate with them for their delays, and chide them out for their sluggishness; Are ye still? Be not slothful to go. Men need to be thus stirred up to mind even their interest. Heaven is a very good land where there is no want of any thing; our God has, by the promise, given it into our hands, let us be not slothful then in making it sure, and laying hold on eternal life, but strive to enter.

III. The Danites' expedition against Laish. This particular family of them, to whose lot that city fell, now at length make towards it, v. 11.-13. The military men were but six hundred in all, not a hundredth part of that tribe, for when they entered Canaan, the Danites were above sixty-four thousand, Numb. 23:1, 24:3. It was strange that none of their brethren of their own tribe, much less any other, came in to their assistance; but it was long after Israel came to Canaan, before there appeared among them any thing of a public spirit, or concern for a common interest, which was the reason why they seldom united in a common head, and that kept them low and incomprehensible. It appears, by v. 21, that these six hundred were the whole number that went to settle there, for they had their families and effects with them, their little ones and cattle, so confident were they of success. The other tribes gave them a free passage through their country, their first day's march brought them to Kirjath-jearim; (v. 12.) and such rare things were military encampments now become in Israel, that the place where they rested that night, was from thence called Mahaneh-dan, the camp of Dan; and, probably, the place whence they began their march between Zorah and Eshtaol, was called by the same name, and is meant, ch. 13. 25. The second day's march brought them unto mount Ephraim, near Micah's house, (v. 13.) and there we must pause awhile.

14. Then answered the five men that went to spy out the country of Laish, and said unto their brethren, Do ye know that there is in these houses an ephod, and tera phim, and a graven image, and a molten image? now, therefore, consider what ye have to do. 15. And they turned thitherward, and came to the house of the young man the Levite, even unto the house of Micah, and saluted him. 16. And the six hundred men appointed with their weapons of war, which were of the children of Dan, stood by the entering of the gate. 17. And the five men that went to spy out the land went up, and came in thither, and took the graven image, and the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image: and the priest stood in the entering of the gate with the six hundred men that were appointed with weapons of war. 18. And these went into Micah's house, and fetched the carved image, the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image. Then said the priest unto them, What do ye? 19. And they said unto him, Hold thy peace, lay thy hand upon thy mouth, and go with us, and be to us a father and a priest: is it better for thee to be a priest unto the house of one man, or that thou be a priest unto a tribe and a family in Israel? 20. And the priest's heart was glad; and he took the ephod, and the teraphim, and the graven image, and went in the midst of the people. 21. So they turned and departed, and put the little ones, and the cattle, and the carriage, before them. 22. And when they were a good way from the house of Micah, the men that were in the houses near to Micah's house were gathered together, and overtook the children of Dan. 23. And they cried unto the children of Dan: and they turned their faces, and said unto Micah, What aileth thee, that thou comest with such a company? 24. And he said, Yea have taken away my gods which I made, and the priest, and ye are gone away: and what have I more? and what is this that ye say, unto me, What aileth thee? 25. And the children of Dan said unto him, Let not thy voice be heard among us, lest angry fellows run upon thee, and thou lose thy life with the lives of thy household. 26. And the children of Dan went their way: and when Micah saw that they were too strong for him, he turned, and went back unto his house.

The Danites had sent out their spies to find out a country for them, and they sped well in their search; but here, now that they came to the place, (for till that brought it to their mind, it does not appear that they had mentioned it to their brethren,) they hid themselves with a further discovery, they can tell them where there are gods; "Here in these houses, there are an ephod, and teraphim, and a great many fine things for devotion, such as we have not the like in our country, now therefore consider what ye have to do, v. 14. We consulted them, and had a good answer from them; they are worth having, nay, they are worth stealing, (that is, having upon the went with them,) and if we can but make ourselves masters of these gods, we may the better hope to prosper, and make ourselves masters of Laish." So far they were in the right, that it was desirable to have God's presence with them, but wretchedly mistimed when they took these images for tokens of God's presence, which were fitter to be used in a puppet play, than in acts of devotion. They thought an oracle would be pretty company for them in their enterprise, and instead of a council of war, to advise upon every emergency: and the place they were going to settle in, being so far from Shiloh, they thought they had more need of a house of gods among themselves, than Micah had that lived so near it. They might have made as good an ephod and teraphim themselves as this was, and which would have served their purpose as well, but the reputation which they found this in the possession of (though it had had that reputation but a while,) and not that into strange veneration for it, which they would soon have dropped, if they had had so much sense as to inquire into its original, and whether there was any thing divine in its institution.

Being determined to take these gods along with them, we are here told how they stole the images, and when the priest, frightened Micah from attempting to rescue them.

I. The five men that knew the house, and the avenues to it, and particularly the chapel, went in and fetched out the images, with the ephod and teraphim, and all the appurtenances, while the six hundred men kept the priest in talk at the gate, v. 15. See what little care this sorry priest took of his gods; while thus sauntering at the gate, and gazing at the strangers, his treasure, as such well was, was gone. See how impotent these sorry gods were, that could not keep themselves from being stolen; it is mentioned as the reproach of idols, that themselves are gone into captivity, Isa. 46. 2. O, the sottishness of these Danites! How could they imagine those gods should protect them, that could not keep themselves from being stolen? Yet because they went by the name of gods, if it was not enough that they had with them the presence of the invisible God, nor that they stood in relation to the tabernacle, where there were even visible tokens of his presence, nothing will serve them but they must have gods to go before them, not of their own making indeed, but, which it was bad, of their own stealing. Their idolatry began in theft, a proper prologue for such an opera. In order to the breaking of the second commandment, they begin with the eighth, and take their neighbour's goods to make them their gods. The holy God hates robbery for burnt-offerings, but the Devil loves it. Had these Danites seized the images, to deface and abolish them, and the priest, to punish him, they had done like Israelites indeed, and had appeared jealous for their God, as their fathers had done; Josh. 22. 16. and they should take these for their own use was such a complicated crime, as should show they neither feared God; nor regarded man, but were perfectly lost both to godliness and honesty.

II. They set upon the priest, and flattered him into a good humour, not only to let the gods go, but to go himself along with them; for without him they knew not well how to make use of the gods. Observe, 1. How they tempted him, v. 19. They assigned him various services, which was a plea for the fervent with them than what he now had. It would be more profitable to be chaplain to a regiment, (for they were no more, though they call themselves a tribe,) than to be only a domestic chaplain to a private gentleman. Let him go with them, and he shall have more dependents on him, more sacrifices brought to his altar, and more fees for consulting his teraphim, than he had here. 2. How they won him. A little persuasion, v. 20. The proposal took well enough with him, and being fancy, which would never let him stay long at a place, and gratified his covetousness and ambition. He had no reason to say, but that he was well off, where he was, Micah had not deceived him, or changed his wages, he was not moved with any remorse of conscience for attending on a graven image; had he gone away to Shiloh to minister to the Lord's priests, according to the duty of a Levite, he might have been well off there. (Deut. 18. 6.) and his removal had been commendable; but instead of that, he takes the images with him, and carries the infection of the idolatry into the whole city. It had been very unjust and ungrateful to Micah, if he had only gone away himself, but much more so, to take the images along with him, which, he knew, the heart of Micah was set upon.

A better course was expected of worthy Levite; what house can be sure of him who has forsaken the house of the Lord? Or what friend will he be true to, that has been false to his God? He could not pretend that he was under compulsive force, for he was glad in his heart to go. If ten shekels won him, (as Bishop Hall expresses it,) eleven would lose him; for what can hold those that have made shipwreck of a good conscience? The hireling flees because he is a hireling. The priest and his gods went in the midst of the people, there they placed him, that they might secure him, either from going back himself, if his mind should change, or from being fetched back by Micah; or perhaps in imitation of the order of Israel's march through the wilderness, in which the ark and the priests preceded the host.

III. They frightened Micah back, when he pursued them to recover his gods. As soon as ever he perceived that his chapel was plundered, and his chaplain was run away from him, he mustered all the forces he could, and pursued the robbers, v. 22. His neighbours, and perhaps tenants, that used to join with him in his devotions, were forward to help him on this occasion; they got together, and pursued them, who had stolen his cattle before them, (v. 21.) could make no great haste, so that they soon overtook them; hoping by strength of reason to recover what was stolen, for the disproportion of their numbers was such, that they could not hope to do it by strength of arm. The pursuers called after them, desiring to speak a word with them; they in the rear, (where it is probable they posted the fiercest and strongest of their company, expecting there to be attacked,) turned about, and asked Micah what ailed him to be so much concerned, and what he would have, v. 23. He argues with them, and pleads his right, which he thought should prevail; but they, in answer, plead their might, which, it proved, did prevail; for it is common that might overcomes right.

1. He insists upon the wrong they had certainly done him; (v. 24.) "Ye have taken away my gods, my images of God, which I have such an indifferent, unstable title to, for I made them myself, and which I have such an affection for, that I am undone if I lose them, for what have I more that will do me any good, if these be gone?" Now, (1.) This discovers to us the folly of idolaters, and the power that Satan has over them. What a folly was it for him to call those his gods, which he had made, when he only is to be worshipped by us as a God, that made us? Folly indeed to set his heart upon such silly idle things, and to look upon himself as undone when he had lost them! (2.) This may discover to us our spiritual idolatry; that creature which we place our happiness in, which we set our affections inordinately upon, and which we can by no means find in our hearts to part with, of which we say, "What have we more?" That we make an idol of. That is put in God's place, and is an usurper, which we are conscious of our loss of comfort, our hope, and happiness, and all, were bound up in it. But, (3.) If all people will thus walk in the name of their god, shall we not be in like manner affected towards our God, the true God? Let us reckon the having of an interest in God, and communion with him, incomparably the richest portion, and the loss of God the sorest loss; Woe unto us if he depart, for what have we more? Deserted souls that are left after the Lord, or they will not. Micah did, that you should ask, what ails them? For the tokens of God's favour are suspended, his comforts are withdrawn; and what have they more?

2. They insist upon the mischief they would certainly do him, if he prosecuted his demand. They would not hear reason, nor do justice, nor would so much as offer to pay him the prime cost he had been at; and yet they are not possession so reasonable upon what they had taken, when they had served their present purpose with them in this expedition, and had time to copy them, and make others like them for themselves: much less had they any compassion for a loss he so bitterly lamented; they would not so much as accost him kindly, or give him good words, but resolve to justify their robbery with murder; if he did not immediately let fall his claims; (v. 25.) "Take heed, lest angry fellows run upon thee, and thou lose thy life; and that is worse than losing thy gods." Wicked and unreasonable men reckon it a great provocation to be asked to do justice, and support themselves by their power against right and reason. Micah's crime is asking his own; yet, for this, he is in danger to lose his life, and the lives of his household. Micah has not courage enough to venture his life for the rescue of his gods, so little opinion had he of their being able to protect him and bear him out, and therefore tamely gives them up, v. 26. He turned, and went back to his house: and if the loss of his idols did but convince him (as, one would think, it should) of their vanity and impotency, and of his own folly in setting his heart upon them, and send him back to the true God from whom he had revolted, he that lost them, had a much better bargain than they that by force of arms carried them off. If the loss of our idols cure us of the love of them, and make us say, What have we to do any more with idols? the loss will be unspeakable gain. See Isa. 2. 20.—30. 22.

27. And they took the things which Micah had made, and the priest which he had, and came unto Laish, unto a people that were at quiet and secure: and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the city with fire. 28. And there was no deliverer, because it was far from Zidon, and they had no business with any man; and it was in the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob. And they built a city, and dwelt therein. 29. And they called the name of the city Dan, after the name of Dan their father, who was born unto Israel: howbeit, the name of the city was Laish at the first. 30. And the children of Dan set up the graven image: and Jonathan the son of Gershom, the son of Maunasseh, he and his sons were priests to the tribe of Dan until the day of the captivity of the land. 31. And they set them up Micah's graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh.

I. Laish is conquered by the Danites. They proceeded on their march, and, because they met with no disaster, perhaps concluded they had not done amiss in robbing Micah; many justify themselves in their impiety by their prosperity. Observe, 1. What posture they found the people of Laish in, both of those of the city, and those of the country about; they were quiet and secure, not jealous of the five spies that had been among them to search out the land, nor had they any intelligence of the approach of this enemy, which made them a very easy prey to this little handful of men that came upon them, v. 27. Note, Many are brought to destruction by their security. 2. Satan gets advantage against us when we are careless and off our guard; it is, therefore, the man that feareth always. 2. What a complete victory they obtained over them; they put all the people to the sword, and burnt down so much of the city as they thought fit to rebuild, (v. 27, 28,) and, for aught that appears herein, they met with no resistance; for the measure of the iniquity of the Canaanites was full, that of the Danites was but beginning to fill. 3. How the con-
They bu it the city, or much of it, anew, (the old buildings being gone to decay,) and called the name of it Dim, to be a witness for them that they were Danites by birth, though separated so far off from their brethren, which might hereafter, by reason of their distance, be called in question. We should feel concerned not to lose the privilege of our relation to God's Israel, and therefore should take all occasions to own it, and preserve the remembrance of it to our's after us.

II. Idolatry immediately set up there. God had graciously performed his promise, in putting them in a place which fell to their lot, and oblong them thereby to be faithful to him who had been so to them: they inherited the labour of the people, that they might observe his statutes, Ps. 105. 44, 45. But the first thing they do after they are settled, is, to break his statutes; as soon as they began to settle themselves, they set up the graven image, v. 30. perversely attracting their success to that idol, which, if God had not been infinitely patient, would have been their ruin. Thus a prosperous idolaer goes on to offend, imputing this his power unto his god, Heb. 1. 11. Their Levite, who officiated as priest, is at length named here, Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh. The w rd Manasseh, in the original, has the letter Nun set over the head, which, some of the Jewish Rabbins say, is an intimation that it should be left out, and then Manasseh will be Moses, and this Levite, they say, was grandson to the famous Moses, who indeed had a son, named Gershom; but, say they, the historian, in honour of Moses, by a half interposition of that letter, turned the name into Manasseh. The vulgar Latin reads it Moses. And if indeed Moses had a grandson that was rakish, and was picked up as a fit tool to be made use of in the setting up of idolatry, it is not the only instance (which is not the unhappy degenerating of the posterity of great and good men. Children's children are not always the crown of old men. But the learned Bishop Patrick takes this to be an idle conceit of the Rabbins, and supposes this Jonathan to be of some other family of the Levites. How long these corruptions continued, we are told in the close. 1. That the posterity of this Jonathan continued to act as priests, or Levites, till the death of Laish, and in the country about, till the captivity, v. 30. After Micah's image was removed, that family retained the character of priests, and had respect paid them as such by that city, and it is very probable that Jeroboam had an eye to them, when he set up one of his calves there, (which they would welcome to Dan, and put some reputation upon, when the priests of the Lord would have nothing to do with them,) and that his family officiated as some of his priests. 2. That these images continued till Samuel's time, for so long the ark of God was at Shiloh; and, it is probable, in his time effectual care was taken to suppress and abolish this idolatry. See how dangerous it is to adorn an infection, for spiritual distempers are not so soon cured as caught.

CHAP. XIX.

The three remaining chapters of this book contain a most tragical story of therackensnedness of the men of Gibeah, patronised by the tribe of Benjamin, for which that tribe was severely chastised, and almost entirely cut off by the rest of the tribes. This seems to have been done, not long after the death of Jerahmeel, for it was then they was no king, no judge in Israel; (v. 1. and ch. 21. 25.) and Phinehas was then High Priest, ch. 20. 28. These particular iniquities, the Danites' idolatry, and the Benjamites' immorality, let in that general apostasy, ch. 3. 7. The abuse of the Levites' concubine is here very particularly related. 1. Her adulterous elopement from him, v. 1. 2. His reconciliation to her, and the journey he took to fetch her home, v. 3. III. Her father's kind entertainment of him, v. 4. 5. IV. The abuse he met with at Gibeah, where, being benighted, he was forced to take up. 1. He was neglected by the men of Gibeah, (v. 10. 15.) and entertained by an Ephraimitc that squatted among them, v. 16. 21. They set upon him in his quarters, as the Sodomites did on Lot's guests, v. 22. 23. 24. 3. They villanously forced his concubine to death, v. 23. 24. 25. The course he took, to send notice of this to all the tribes of Israel, v. 29. 30. 1. AND it came to pass in those days, when there was no king in Israel, that there was a certain Levite sojourning on the side of mount Ephraim, who took to him a concubine out of Beth-lehem-judah. 2. And his concubine played the whore against him, and went away from him unto her father's house to Beth-lehem-judah, and was there four whole months. 3. And her husband arose, and went after her, to speak friendly unto her, and to bring her again, having his servant with him, and a couple of asses; and she brought him into her father's house; and when the father of the damsel saw him, he rejoiced to meet him. 4. And his father-in-law, the damsel's father, retained him; and he abode with him three days: so they did eat and drink, and lodged there. 5. And it came to pass on the fourth day, when they arose early in the morning, that he rose up to depart: and the damsel's father said unto his son-in-law, Comfort thine heart with a morsel of bread, and afterward go your way: 6. And they sat down, and did eat and drink both of them together: for the damsel's father had said unto the man, Be content, I pray thee, and tarry all night, and let thine heart be merry. 7. And when the man rose up to depart, his father-in-law urged him; therefore he lodged there again. 8. And he arose early in the morning on the fifth day to depart: and the damsel's father said, Comfort thine heart, I pray thee. And they tarried until afternoon, and they did eat both of them. 9. And when the man rose up to depart, he and his concubine and his servant, his father-in-law, the damsel's father, said unto him, Behold now, the day draweth toward evening; I pray you tarry all night: behold, the day groweth to an end; lodge here, that thine heart may be merry; and to-morrow get you early on your way, that thou mayest go home. 10. But the man would not tarry that night, but he rose up and departed, and came over against Jebus, which is Jerusalem: and there were with him two asses saddled; his concubine also was with him. 11. And when they were by Jebus, the day was far spent; and the servant said unto his master, Come, I pray thee, and let us turn in unto this city of the
When he came to fetch her back. Thus God promises concerning adulterous Israel, (Hos. 2. 14.) I will bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably to her.

III. Her father bid him very welcome, and, by his extraordinary kind to him, endeavoured to make him for that the Levite was so contented with his lodging, and to confirm him in his disposition to be reconciled to her. 1. He entertains him kindly, rejoices to see him, v. 3. treats him generously for three days, v. 4. And the Levite, to show that he was perfectly reconciled, accepted his kindness, and we do not find that he upbraided him or his daughter with what had been amiss, but was very civil and as pleasant as at his first wedding-feast. It becomes, being Levites, to forgive as God does. Every thing among them gave a hopeful prospect of their living comfortably together for the future; but could they have foreseen what befell them within one day or two, how would all their mirth have been imber-icted and turned into mourning! When the affairs of our families are in the best posture, we ought to rejoice with trembling; because we know not what troubles one day may bring about. We cannot foresee what evil is near us, but we ought to consider, what may be, that we may not be secure, as if to-morrow must needs be as this day, and much more abundant, Isa. 56. 12. 2. He is very earnest for his stay, as a further demonstration of his hearty welcome: the affection he had for him, and the pleasure he took in his company, proceeded, 1. From a civil regard to him as his son-in-law and an ingrafted branch of his own house. Love and duty are owing to those whom we are by marriage related to, as well as to those who are bone of our bone; and they that show kindness, as this Levite did, may expect, as he did, to receive kindness.

And, 2. From a pious respect to him as a Levite, a servant of God's house; if he were such a Levite as he should be (and nothing appears to the contrary,) he is to be commended. This during his stay, finding his conversation profitable, and having opportunity to learn from him the good knowledge of the Lord; hoping also that the Lord will do him good, because he has a Levite to be his son-in-law, and will bless him for his sake. (1.) He forces him to stay the fourth day, and that was kind, not knowing when they might be together again, he engages him to stay as long as he possibly could. The Levite, though all was lost, was not without a heart, and becomes man's heart is where his business is, for as a bird that wanders from her nest, so is a man that wanders from his place. It is a sign a man has either little to do at home, or little heart to do what he has to do, that can take pleasure in being long abroad where he has nothing to do. It is especially good to see a Levite willing to go home to his few sheep in the wilderness. Yet this Levite was much by it; for honor and kind management to stay longer than he intended, v. 5. 7. We ought to avoid the extremes of an over-easy yielding, to the neglect of our duty on the one hand, and that of moroseness and willfulness to the neglect of our friends and their kindnesses on the other hand. Our Saviour, after his resurrection, was prevailed upon to stay with his friends longer than he first intimated to be his purpose, Luke 24. 29. (2.) He forces him to stay till the afternoon of the fifth day, and that, as it proved, was unkind, v. 8, 9. He would by no means let him go before dinner, promises him he shall have dinner early, designing thereby, as he had done the day before, to detain him another night; but the Levite was intent on the house of the Lord at Shiloh, v. 18, and being impatient to get thither, would stay no longer. Had they set out early, they might have reached some better lodging place than that which they were now constrained to take up with, nay, they might have got to Shiloh. Note, Our friends' designed kindnesses often prove, in the event, real injuries; what is meant for our welfare, becomes a trap. Who knows what is good for a man in this life? The Levite was unaware in setting out so late; he might have got home better, if he had staid a night, as the day the Lord had before him.

IV. In his return home, he was forced to lodge at Gibeah, a city in the tribe of Benjamin, afterward called Gibeah of Saul, which lay on his road toward Shiloh and mount Ephraim. When it drew toward night, and the shadows of the evening were stretched out, they began to think (as it behoves us to do when we observe the day of our life hastening toward a peri-) where they would lodge for the night. They got no lodging there, the inn they met with pursued their journey; he that walketh in darkness, knoweth not whither he goes: they could not but desire rest, for which the night was intended, as the day for labour. 1. The servant proposed that they should lodge in Jebus, afterwards Jerusalem, but as yet in the possession of the Jebusites. "Come," (said the servant,) "let us lodge in this city of the Jebusites," v. 11. And if they had done so, it is probable they had had much better usage than they met with; in Gibeah of Benjamin. Debouched and profitteer Israelites are worse and much more dangerous than Cannanites themselves. 2. But the master, as became one of God's tribe, would by no means quarter, no, not one night, in a city of strangers, (v. 12.) not because he questioned his safety among them, but he was not willing, if he could possibly avoid it, to have so much intimacy and familiarity with them as a night's lodging came to, nor to be so much beholden to them. By shunning this place, he would witness against the wickedness of those that contrated friendship and familiarity with those who devoured nations. Let Israelites, Levites especially, associate with Israelites, and not with the sons of the stranger. 3. Having passed by Jebus, which was about five or six miles from Beth-lehem, (the place whence they came,) and not having daylight to bring them to Ramah, they stopped at Gibeah; (v. 13.- 15.) there they sat down in the street, nobody offering them a lodging. In these countries, at that time, there were no inns, or public houses, in which, as with us, travellers might have entertainment for their money; but they carried entertainment along with them, as this Levite did here, (v. 19.) and depended upon the courtesy and hospitality of the inhabitants for a lodging. Let us take occasion from hence, when we are in neys, to thank God for this, among other conveniences of travelling, that there are inns to entertain strangers, and in which they may be welcome, and well accommodated, for their money. Surely there is no country in the world wherein one may stay at home with more satisfaction, or go abroad with more comfort, than in our own nation. This traveller, then, the Levite, (and to those of that tribe God had particularly commanded his people to be kind upon all occasions,) met with very cold entertainment at Gibeah, no man took them into his house; if they had any reason to think he was a Levite, perhaps that made those ill-disposed people the more shy of him. There are those who will have this laid to their charge at the great day, I was a stranger, and ye took me not in.

16. And, behold, there came an old man from his work out of the field at even, which was also of mount Ephraim; and he sojourned in Gibeah: but the men of the place were Benjamites. 17. And when he had lifted up his eyes, he saw a way-faring man in the street of the city: and the old man said, Whither goest thou? and whence comest thou? 18. And he said unto him, We are passing from Beth-lehem-judah toward the side of mount Ephraim; from thence am I: and I went to Beth-lehem-judah, but I am now going to the house of the Lord; and there is no man that receiveth me to house. 19. Yet there is both straw and provender for our asses; and there is bread and wine also for me, and for thy handmaid, and for the young man which is with thy servants: there is no want of any thing. 20. And the old man said, Peace be with thee: howsoever, let all thy wants lie upon me; only lodge not in the street. 21. So he brought them into his house, and gave provender unto the asses: and they washed their feet, and did eat and drink.

Though there was not one of Gibeah, yet it proved there was one in Gibeah, that showed some civility to this distressed Levite, who was glad that any one took notice of him. It was strange that some of those wicked people, who, when it was dark, designed some harm to him and his companion, did not make pretence of kindness, invite them in, that they might have a fairer opportunity of perpetrating their villany; but either they had not wit enough to be so designing, or not wickedness enough to be so deceiving. Or, perhaps, none of them separately thought of such a wickedness, till in the black and dark night they got together to contrive what mischief they should do. Bad people in confederacy make one another much worse than any one of them would be by themselves. When the Levite, and his wife, and servant, were beginning to fear that they must lie in the street all night, (and as good have lain in a den of lions,) they were at length invited into a house. And we are here told,

1. Who that kind man was, that invited them. 1. He was a man of mount Ephraim, and only sojourner in Gibeah, v. 16. Of all the tribes of Israel, the Ephraimites had most reason to be kind to poor travellers, for their ancestor, Benjamin, was born upon the road, his mother then upon a journey, and very near to this place, Gen. 35. 16, 17. Yet they were hard-hearted to a traveller in distress, while an honest Ephraimite had compassion on him, and no doubt, was the more kind to him, when, upon inquiry, he found that he was his countryman, of mount Ephraim likewise. He that was himself but a sojourner in the land, was more compassionate to a wayfaring man, for he knew the heart of a stranger, Exod. 23. 9. Deut. 10. 19. Good people that look upon themselves but as strangers and sojourners in this world, should, for this reason, be tender one to another, because they all belong to the same better country, and are not at home here. 2. He was an old man, one that was grown gray, and had seen the improving virtue of the Israelite; the rising generation was entirely corrupted; if there was any good remaining among them, it was only with those that were old and going off. 3. He was coming home from his work out of the field at even. The evening calls home labourers, Ps. 104. 23. But, it should seem, this was the only labourer that this evening brought home to Gibeah. The rest had given up themselves to sloth.
and luxury, and no marvel there was among them, as in Sodom, abundance of uncleanness, when there was among them, as in Sodom, abundance of idleness, Ezek. 16. 49. But he that was honestly diligent in his business, all day, was disposed to be generously hospitable to them. See how generous the Levite was, not to give his substance, that they may have to give, Eph. 4. 28. It appears, from v. 21. that he was a man of some substance, and yet had been himself at work in the field. No man's estate will privilege him in idleness.

II. How free and generous he was in his invitation; he did not stay till they applied themselves to him to beg for a night's lodging, but when he saw them, (v. 17.) inquired into their circumstances, and presented them with his kindness: thus our good God answers before we call. Note, A charitable disposition expects only opportunity, not inutility, to do good, and will succour, upon sight, unsought unto. Hence we read of a bountiful eye, Prov. 22. 9. If Gibeah was like Sodom, this old man was like Lot in Sodom, who sat in the gate to invite strangers, Gen. 19. 1. Thus Job opened his doors to the traveller, and would not suffer him to lodge in the street, Job 31. 32. Observe, 1. How ready he was to give credit to the Levite's account of himself, when he saw no reason at all to question the truth of it. Charity is not apt to distrust, but hopeth all things, (1 Cor. 13. 7.) and will not make use of Nabab's excuse for his churlishness to David, Many servants now-a-days break from their master, 1 Sam. 25. 16. The Levite, in his account of himself, pretends that he was not going to the house of the Lord, (v. 18.) for there he designed to attend, either with a trespass-offer for the sins of his family, or with a peace-offering for the mercies of his family, or both, before he went to his own house. And if the men of Gibeah had any intimation of his being bound that way, probably they would therefore be disinclined to entertain him; the Samaritans would not receive Christ, because his face was toward Jerusalem, Luke 9. 53. But for that reason, because he was a Levite, and was now going to the house of the Lord, this good old man was the more kind to him. Thus he received a disciple in the name of a disciple, a servant of God for his Master's sake.

2. How free he was to give him entertainment. The Levite was himself provided with all necessaries, (v. 19.) wanted nothing but a lodging, but his generous host would be himself at the charge of his entertainment, (v. 20.) Let all thy wants be upon mee; so he brought him into his house, v. 21. Thus God will, some way or other, raise up friends for his people and ministers, even when they seem forlorn.

22. Now, as they were making their hearts merry, behold, the men of the city, certain sons of Belial, beset the house round about, and beat at the door, and spake to the master of the house, the old man, saying, Bring forth the man that came into thine house, that we may know him. 23. And the man, the master of the house, went out unto them, and said unto them, Nay, my brethren, nay, I pray you, do not so wickedly; seeing that this man is come into mine house, do not this folly. 24. Behold, here is my daughter, a maiden, and his concubine; then I will bring out now, and humble ye them, and do with them what seemeth good unto you: but unto this man do not so vile a thing. 25. But the men would not hearken to him; so the man took his concubine, and brought her forth unto them; and they knew her, and abused her all the night until the morning: and when the day began to spring, they let her go. 26. Then came the woman, in the dawning of the day, and fell down at the door of the man's house where her lord was, till it was light. 27. And her lord rose up in the morning, and opened the doors of the house, and went out to go his way: and, behold, the woman his concubine was fallen down at the door of the house, and her hands were upon the threshold. 28. And he said unto her, Up, and let us be going: but none answered. Then the man took her up upon an ass, and the man rose up, and gat him unto his place. 29. And when he was come into his house, he took a knife, and laid hold on his concubine, and divided her, together with her bones, into twelve pieces, and sent her into all the coasts of Israel.

30. And it was so, that all that saw it said, There was no such deed done nor seen from the day that the children of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt unto this day: consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds.

Here is,

I. The great wickedness of the men of Gibeah. One could not imagine that ever it should enter into the heart of men that had the use of human reason, of Israelites that had the benefit of divine revelation, to be so very wicked. "Lord, what is man!" said David, "what a mean creature is he!" "Lord, what is man," may we say, upon the reading of this story, "what a vile creature is he, when he is given up to his own heart's lusts!" 1. The sinners are here called the sons of Belial, that is, ungodly men, men that would endure no yoke. Children of the Devil, for he is Belial, resembling him, and joining himself in rebellion against God and his government. Sons of Benjamin, of whom Moses had said, The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him, (Deut. 33. 12.) are become such sons of Belial, that an honest man cannot lodge in safety among them. 2. The sufferers were a Levite and his wife, and that kind man that gave them entertainment. We are strangers upon earth, and must expect strange usage. It is said they were making their hearts merry when this trouble came upon them, v. 22. If the mirth was innocent, it teaches us of what uncertain continuance all our creature-comforts and enjoyments are; when we are ever so well pleased with our friends, we know not how near our enemies are; nor, if it be well with us this hour, can we be sure it will be so the next. If the mirth was sinful and excessive, let it be a warning to us to keep a strict guard upon ourselves, that we grow not intemperate in the use of lawful things, nor be transported into indecencies by our cheerfulness, for the end of that mirth is heaviness. God can soon change the note of those that are making their hearts merry, and turn their laughter into mourning, and their joy into heaviness. Let us see what the wickedness of these Benjamites was.
1. They made a rude and insolent assault, in the night, upon the habitation of an honest man, that not only lived peaceably among them, but kept a good house, and was a blessing and ornament to their city. They beset the house round, and, to the great terror of those within, beat as hard as they could at the door, v. 22. A man's house is his castle, in which he ought to be both safe and pleased with the freedom to do so; (v. 23.) Seeing that this man is come into my house. They are base and abject spirits, that will trample upon the helpless, and use a man the worse for his being a stranger, whom they know ill of.

2. They designed, in the most filthy and abominable manner, (not to be thought of without horror and detestation,) to abuse the Levite, whom perhaps they supposed to be young and coming to bring him forth, that we may know him. We should certainly have concluded they meant only to inquire whence he came, and to know his character, but that the good man of the house, who understood their meaning too well, by his answer lets us know that they designed the gratification of that most unnatural and worse than brutish lust, which was expressly forbidden by the law of Moses, and called an abomination, Lev. 18. 22. They that are guilty of it are ranked in the New Testament among the worst and vilest of sinners, (1 Tim. 1. 10.) and such as shall not inherit the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6. 9. Now, [1.] This was the sin of Sodom, and from thence is called Sodomy. The dead Sea, which was the standing monument of God's vengeance upon Sodom for its filthiness, was one of the boundaries of Canaan, and lay not many miles off from Gibeah; we may suppose the men of Gibeah had seen it many a time, and yet would not take warning by it, but did worse than Sodom, (Ezek. 16. 48.) and sinned just after the similitude of their transgression. Who would have expected (says Bishop Hall) such extreme abomination to come out of the loins of Jacob? Even the worst pagans were saints to them. What did it avail them that they had the master of the house in their streets; God's law in their fingers, but the Devil in their hearts? Nothing but hell itself can yield a worse creature than a depraved Israelite. (2.) This was the punishment of their idolatry, that sin to which they were, above all other, most addicted. Because they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, therefore he gave them up to those vile affections, by which they did pollute themselves in the lusts of their own heart, and were given over to those abominable lusts which dishonoured him, and turned his glory into shame, Rom. 1. 24, 28. See and admire, in this instance, the patience of God; why were not these sons of Belial struck blind, as the Sodomites were? Why were not fire and brimstone rained from heaven upon their city? It was because God would leave it to Israel to punish them by the sword, and would reserve his own punishment of them for the future, in which, in which those that go after strange flesh, shall suffer the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude 7.

3. They were dead to the reproofs and reasons of the good man of the house, who, being well acquainted (we may suppose) with the story of Lot and the Sodomites, seeing the men of this city imitate the Sodomites, set himself to imitate Lot, v. 23.

4. They were out to them as Lot did, spoke civilly to them, and called them brethren, begged of them to desist, pleaded the protection of his house which his guests were under, and represented to them the great wickedness of their attempt; “Do not so wickedly, so very wickedly,” he calls it folly and a vile thing. But in one thing he confessed too far to Lot’s example, (as we are apt, in offering the way to sin, to follow them, even in their false steps,) in offering them his daughter to do what they would with. He had not power thus to prostitute his daughter, nor ought he to have done this evil that good might come. But this wicked proposal of his, may be in part excused, from the great surprise and terror he was in, his concern for his guests, and his having too close regard to what Lot did in the like case, especially not finding that the angels who were by, reproved him for it. And perhaps he hoped that his mentioning of this as more a natural gratification of their lust, would have sent them back to their common harlots. But they would not hearken to him, v. 25. Headstrong lusts are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, they bear the conscience, and make it insensible.

5. These men, which were the beloved of the inhabitants among them, and abused her to death, v. 25. They slighted the old man’s offer of his daughter to their lust, either because she was not handsome, or because they knew her to be one of great gravity and modesty; but when the Levite brought them his concubine, they took her with them by force to the place appointed for their filthiness. Josephus, in his narrative of this story, makes her to be the person they had a design upon when they beset the house, and says nothing of their villainous design upon the Levite himself. They saw her (he says) in the street, when they came into the town, and were smitten with her beauty; and perhaps, though she was reconciled to her husband, her looks did not speak her to be one of the most modest; many bring mischief of this kind upon themselves by their loose carriage and behaviour; a little spark may kindle a great fire. One would think the Levite should have followed them, to see what became of his wife, but it is probable he durst not, lest they should do him a mischief. In the miserable end of this woman, we may see the righteous hand of God, punishing her for her former uncleanness, when she played the whore against her husband, v. 12. Though her father had countenanced her, and her husband too close regard to what Lot did in the like case, the Levite, in the forgotten now that the quarrel was made up, yet God remembered it against her, when he suffered these wicked men thus wickedly to abuse her; in doing which, how unrighteous soever they were, in permitting it the Lord was righteous. Her punishment answered her sin. Culpa libido siu, funa libido siu—Lust was her sin, and lust was her punishment. By the law of Moses, she was to have had the punishment that her promiscuity deserved; but it was that punishment from men, yet vengeance pursued her; for if there was no king in Israel, yet there was a God in Israel, a God that judgeth in the earth. We must not think it enough to make our peace with men, whom by our sins we have wronged, but are concerned, by repentance and faith, to make our peace with God, who sees not as men see; for so light a sin oftentimes do. The jistice of God in this matter, does not extenuate the horrid wickedness of those men of Gibeah, than which nothing could be more barbarous and inhuman.

II. The notice that was sent of this wickedness to all the tribes of Israel. The poor abused woman made towards her husband’s lodgings, as soon as ever the approach of the day-light obliged the sons of Belial to let her go, (for those works of darkness hate and dread the light,) v. 25. Down she fell at the door, with her hands on the threshold, begging pardon (as it were) for her former transgression, and in the posture of a penitent, with her mouth in the dust, she expired; there she found her, (v. 26, 27.) supposed her asleep, or overcome with shame and confusion; but she had happened, but soon perceived she was dead; (v. 28.) and, therefore, our body, which we may suppose, had all over it marks of the hands, the blows, and other abuses, she had received. On this sad occasion, he wove his purpose of going to Shiloh, and went directly home; he that went out in hopes to return rejoicing, came in again melancholy and disconsolate, sat down and considered, Is this an injury fit to be passed by? He cannot call to mind, from head to foot, the misfortunes of Gibeah, as the Levite did, nor let himself be thereby disposed in the same manner, insulted by the Sodomites. There was no king in Israel, nor (for that there appears) any Sanhedrim, or great council, to appeal to, and demand justice from; Phinehas is High Priest, but he attends closely to the business of the sanctuary, and will be no judge or divider; he has therefore no other way left him, than to appeal to the people: let the Levite judge, though they had no general stated assembly of all the tribes, yet it is probable that each tribe had a meeting of their chiefs within itself; to each of the tribes, in their respective meetings, he sent by special messengers a remonstrance of the wrong that was done him, in all its aggravating circumstances, and with it a piece of his wife’s dead body, (v. 29.) both to confirm the truth of the story, and to affect them the more with it. He divided it into twelve pieces, according to the bones, so some read it, that by the joints, sending one to each tribe, even to Benjamin among the rest, with the hope that some among them would have been moved to join in punishing so great a villany, and the more warmly, because committed by some of their own tribe. It did indeed look very barbarous, thus to mangle a dead body, which, having been so wretchedly dishonoured, ought to have been decently interred; but the Levite designed hereby, 1. To represent their barbarous usage of his wife, whom they had better have cut in pieces thus, than have used as they did. 2. To express his own passionate concern, and thereby to excite the like in them. And it had the desired effect. All that saw the pieces of the dead body, and were told how the matter was, expressed the same sentiments upon it. (1.) That the men of Gibeah had been guilty of a very heinous piece of wickedness, the like of which had never before been known in Israel, v. 30. It was a complicated crime, loaded and blackened with all possible aggravations. They were not such fools as to make a mock at this sin, or turn the story off with a jest. (2.) That a general assembly of all Israel should be called, to debate what was fit to be done for the punishment of this wickedness, which might but add to this thread of impending iniquity in Gibeah, and the wrath of God might not be poured upon the whole nation for it. It is not a common case, and therefore they stir up one another to come together upon the occasion, with this, Consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds. We have here the three great rules by which they that sit in council ought to go in every anxious affair. (1.) Let every man retire into his own house and sit alone; (2.) Let every man take advice of his friend, know his opinion, with his reasons, and weigh them. (3.) Then let every man speak his mind, and give his vote according to his conscience. In the multitude of such counsellors there is safety.

CHAP. XX.

Into the book of the wars of the Lord the story of this chapter must be brought, but it looks as sad and uncomfortable as any article in all that history; for there is nothing in it that looks bright and pleasant, but the pious zeal of Israel against the wickedness of the men of Gibeah, which made them rise on the side of just and holy war; but otherwise the obstinacy of the Benjamites in protecting their criminals, which was the foundation of the war, the vast loss which the Israelites sustained in carrying on the war, and (though the righteous cause was victorious at the last) the issue of the war, in the almost utter extirpation of the tribe of Benjamin, make it, from first to last, melancholy. And yet this happened soon after the glorious settlement of Israel in the land of promise, upon which, one would have expected every thing to be prosperous and serene. In this chapter we have, I. The Levite’s cause heard in a general convention of the tribes, v. 1. 7. II. A unanimous resolution to avenge his quarrel upon the men of Gibeah. v. 8. 11. III. The Benjamites appearing in defence of the criminals, v. 12. 17. IV. The defeat of Israel in the first and second day’s battle, v. 18. 25. V. Their humbling of themselves before God upon that occasion, v. 26. 28. VI. The total rout they gave the Benjamites in the third engagement, by a stragiam, by which they were all cut off, except six hundred men, v. 29. 48. And all this, the effect of the indignities done to one poor Levite and his wife: so little do they that do iniquity, consider what will be the end thereof.

1. THEN all the children of Israel went out, and the congregation was gathered together as one man, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, with the land of Gilead, unto the Lord in Mizpeh. 2. And the chief of all the people, even of all the tribes of Israel, presented themselves in the assembly of the people of God, four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword. 3. (Now the children of Benjamin heard that the children of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh.) Then said the children of Israel, Tell us how was this wickedness? 4. And the Levite, the husband of the woman that was slain, answered and said, I came into Gibeah that belongeth to Benjamin, and my concubine, to lodge: 5. And the men of Gibeah rose against me, and beset the house round about upon me by night, and thought to have slain me; and my concubine have they forced, that she is dead. 6. And I took my concubine, and cut her in pieces, and sent her throughout all the country of the inheritance of Israel: for they have committed lewdness and folly in Israel. 7. Behold, ye are all children of Israel; give here your advice and counsel. 8. And all the people arose as one man, saying, We will not any of us go to his tent, neither will we any of us turn into his house: 9. But now, this shall be the thing which we will do to Gibeah, we will go up by lot against it: 10. And we will take ten men of a hundred throughout all the tribes of Israel, and a hundred of a thousand, and a thousand out of ten thousand, to fetch victual for the people, that they may do, when they come to Gib- eah of Benjamin, according to all the folly that they have wrought in Israel. 11. So all the men of Israel were gathered against the city, knit together as one man.

Here is,

1. A general meeting of all the congregation of Israel, to examine the matter concerning the Levite's concubine, and to consider what was to be done upon it, v. 1, 2. It does not appear that they were summoned by the authority of any one common head, but they came together by the mutual consent and agreement, as it were, of one common heart, fired with a holy zeal for the honour of God and Israel. 1. The place of their meeting was Miz- peh, they gathered together unto the Lord there; for Mizpeh was so very near to Shiloh, that their encampment might very well be supposed to reach from Mizpeh to Shiloh. Shiloh was a small town, and therefore, when there was a general meeting of the people to prevent themselves from being parted, it was well to put their encampment at some distance from it, where they might have convenient quarters to hold the meeting. They were, therefore, to Mizpeh, and the Levite came from thence. 2. The persons that met, were all Israel, from Dan, (the city very lately so called, ch. 18. 29.) in the north, to Beer-sheba, in the south, in the land of Gilead, that is, the tribes on the other side Jordan, all as one man; so unanimous were they in their concern for the public good. Here was an assembly of the people of God; not a convocation of the Levites and priests, though a Levite was the person principally concerned in the cause, but an assembly of the people, to whom the Levite referred himself with an Ap- peal to the people; the people of God were four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword, that is, were armed and disciplined, and fit for service; and some of them, perhaps, such as had known the wars of Canaan, ch. 3. 1. In this assembly of all Israel, the chief (or corners) of the people (for rulers are the corner-stones of the people that keep all together) presented themselves as the representatives of the rest; they ren- dered themselves at their respective posts, at the head of the thousands and hundreds; the fifties and tens, over which they presided; for so much order and government, we may suppose at least, they had among them, though they had no general or commander in chief. So that here was, (1.) A general congress of the states for counsel; the chief of the people presented themselves to lead and direct in this affair. (2.) A general rendez- vous of the forces, the Levite and his men being convened before and were men of war, v. 17. not hirelings or press- ed men, but the best freeholders that went at their own charge. Israel was above six hundred thou- sand when they came into Canaan, and we have reason to think they were, at this time, much in- creased, rather than diminished: but then all be- tween twenty and sixty were military men; now we may suppose more than the one half exempt from military service, for the Levites, though these were as the trained bands. The militia of the two tribes and a half were forty thousand, Josh. 4. 13. but the tribes were many more.

II. Notice given to the tribe of Benjamin of this meeting, v. 3. They heard that the children of Is- rael were gone up to Mizpeh; probably they had a legal summons sent them to appear with their brethren, that the cause might be fairly debated, before any resolutions were taken up upon it, and so the mischief that followed, would have been happily prevented; but the notice they had of this meeting, rather hardened and exasperated them, than awakened them to think of things that belonged to their peace and honour.

III. A summary examination of the crime charged upon the men of Gibeah. A very horrid re- presentation of it had been made by the report of the messengers that were sent to call them to- gether, but it was fit it should be more closely inquired into, because such things are often made worse than really they were; a committee therefore was appointed to examine the witnesses, (upon oath, v. 4.) and report the facts of the case. They had only the testimony of the Levite himself, that is here re- corded, but it is probable his servant and the old man were examined, and gave in their testimony, for that more than one were examined, appears by the original, (v. 3.) which is, Tell ye us; and the law was, that none should be put to death, much less many, upon the testimony of one witness only. The Levite gives a particular account of the mat- ter. That he came into Gibeah only as a traveller, to lodge there, not exciting the least suspicion that he designed them any ill turn, v. 4. That the men of Gibeah, even those that were of substance among them, that should have been a protection to the stranger within their gates, riotously set upon the house where he lodged, and thought to have slain him; he could not, for shame, relate the de- demand which they, without shame, made, ch. 19. Thus they declared their sin as Sodom, even the sin of Sodom, but his modesty would not suffer him to repeat it, it was sufficient to say they would have slain him, for he would rather have been slain than have submitted to their villany; and if they had got him into their hands, they would have abused him to death; witness what they had done to his concubine, they have forced her, that she is dead, v. 5. And to excite in his countrymen an indignation at this wickedness, he had sent pieces of the mangled body to all the tribes which had fetched them together to bear their testimony against the lewdness and folly committed in Israel, v. 6. All lewdness is folly, but especially lewd- ness in Israel; for them to defile their own bodies, who have the honourable seal of the covenant in their flesh; for them to defy the divine-vengeance, to whom it is so clearly revealed from heaven—so God is their own and the Levites their own; he concludes his declaration with an appeal to the judgment of the court, v. 7. Ye are all children of Israel, and therefore ye know law and judge- ment; (Esth. 1. 13.) "Ye are a holy people to God, and have a dread of every thing which will dishonour God, and defile the land; ye are of the same community; members of the same body, and therefore likely to feel from the distempers of it; so God is their own and the Levites their own, they take particular care of the Levites, God's tribe among you, and therefore give here your advice and coun- sel, what is to be done."
JUDGES, XX.

12. And the tribes of Israel sent men through all the tribe of Benjamin, saying, What wickedness is this that is done among you? 13. Now therefore deliver us the men, the children of Belial, which are in Gibeah, that we may put them to death, and put away evil from Israel. But the children of Benjamin would not hearken to the voice of their brethren the children of Israel: 14. But the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together out of the cities unto Gibeah, to go out to battle against the children of Israel. 15. And the children of Benjamin were numbered at that time, out of the cities, twenty and six thousand men that drew sword, besides the inhabitants of Gibeah, which were numbered seven hundred chosen men. 16. Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed; every one could sling stones at a hair breadth, and not miss. 17. And the men of Israel, besides Benjamin, were numbered four hundred thousand men that drew sword: all these were men of war.

Here is,

I. The air and just demand which the tribes of Israel, now encamped, sent to the tribe of Benjamin, to deliver up the malefactors of Gibeah to justice, v. 12, 13. If the tribe of Benjamin had come up, as they ought to have done, to the assembly, and agreed with them in their resolutions, they had had none to deal with but the men of Gibeah only, but they, by their absence, taking part with the criminals, application must be made to them all; the Israelites were zealous against the wickedness that was committed, yet they were disinclined in their zeal, and did not think it would justify them in falling upon the whole tribe of Benjamin, unless they, by refusing to give up the criminals, and protecting them against justice, should make themselves guilty, ex post facto—as accessories after the fact. They desire them to consider how great the wickedness was, that was committed, v. 12, and that it was done among them; and how necessary it was therefore that they should either punish the malefactors with death themselves, according to the law of Moses, or deliver them up to this general assembly, to be so much the more publicly and solemnly punished, that evil might be made a warnings away from Israel, the national guilt removed, the infection stopped by cutting off the gangrent part, and national judgments prevented; for the sin was so very like that of the Sodomites, that they might justly fear, if they did not punish it, God would rain hail from heaven upon them, as he did, not only upon Sodom, but the neighbouring cities. If the Israelites had not made this reasonable demand, they would have had much more reason to apprehend the following desolations of Benjamin. All methods of accommodation must be used before we go to war, or go to law. The demand was like that of Job’s to Abel, 2 Sam. 20. 20, 21. “Only deliver up the the traitor, and we will lay down our arms,” On these terms, and no other, God will be at peace with us, that we may part with our sins, that we mortify and crucify our lusts, and then all shall be well; his anger will be turned away.

II. The wretched obstinacy and perverseness of the men of Benjamin, who seem to have been as unanimous and zealous in their resolutions to stand by the criminals, as the rest of the tribes were to punish them; so little sense had they of their honour, duty, and interest.

They were so prodigiously vile, as to patronise the wickedness that was committed. They would not hearken to the voice of their brethren, v. 13. Either because they apprehended of the tendency of this crime to more vicious and debauched at this time than the rest of the tribes, and therefore would not bear to have that punished in others, which they knew themselves guilty of. Some of the most fruitful and pleasant parts of Canaan fell to the lot of this tribe; their land, like that of Sodom, was as the garden of the Lord, which, perhaps, helped to make the inhabitants, like the men of Sodom, wicked, and to provoke them to this crime before the Lord. Gen. 13. 10, 13. Or, because (as Bishop Patrick suggests) they took it ill that the other tribes should meddle with the concerns of their’s; they would not do that which they knew was their duty, because they were reminded of it by their brethren, by whom they scorned to be taught and controlled. If there were any wise men among them that would have complied with the demand made, yet they were overpowered by the majority, who thus made the crime of the men of Gibeah their own. Thus we have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, if we say A confederacy with those that have, and make ourselves guilty of other men’s sins, by countenancing and defending them. It seems there is no cause so bad but it will find some patrons, some advocates, to appear for it; but woe be to those by whom such offences come. Those will have a great deal to answer for, that obstruct the course of necessary justice, and strengthen the hands of the wicked, by saying, O wicked man, thou shalt not die.

2. They were so prodigiously vain and presumptuous, as to make head against the united force of all Israel. Never, surely, were men so wretchedly infatuated as they were, when they took up arms in opposition (for,) to so good a cause as Israel had. How could they expect to prosper when they fought against justice, and consequently against the just God himself, against them that had the High Priest and the divine oracle on their side, and so acted in downright rebellion against the sacred and supreme authority of the nation? (2.) To so great a force as Israel had. This disproportion of their numbers was much greater than that, Luke 14, 31, 32, where he that had but ten thousand, durst not meet him that came against him with twenty thousand, and therefore desired conditions of peace. There the enemy was but two to one, here above fifteen to one; yet they desisted conditions of peace. All the forces they could bring into the field, were but twenty-six thousand men, beside seven hundred men of Gibeah; (v. 15.) yet with these they will dare to face four hundred thousand men of Israel, v. 17. Thus smirers are infatuated to their own ruin, and provoke him to jealousy, who is so infinitely stronger than they, 1 Cor. 10, 22. But it should seem they depended upon the skill of their men, to make up what was wanting in numbers, especially a regiment of slingers, seven hundred men, who, though left-handed, were so dexterous at slingings stones, that they would not be a hair's breadth beside their mark, v. 16. But these good marksmen were very much out of their aim, when they espoused this bad cause. Benjamin signifies the son of the right hand, yet we find his posterity left-handed.

18. And the children of Israel arose, and went up to the house of God, and asked counsel of God, and said, Which of us shall go up first to the battle against the children of Benjamin? And the Lord said, Judah shall go up first. 19. And the children of Israel rose up in the morning, and encamped against Gibeah. 20. And the men of Israel went out to battle against Benjamin; and the men of Israel put themselves in array to fight against them at Gibeah. 21. And the children of Benjamin came forth out of Gibeah, and destroyed down to the ground, of the Israelites that day, twenty and two thousand men. 22. And the people, the men of Israel, encouraged themselves, and set their battle again in array, in the place where they put themselves in array the first day. 23. (And the children of Israel went up, and went before the Lord until even, and asked counsel of the Lord, saying, Shall I go up again to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother? And the Lord said, Go up against him.) 24. And the children of Israel came near against the children of Benjamin the second day. 25. And Benjamin went forth again against them out of Gibeah the second day, and destroyed down to the ground, of the children of Israel again, eighteen thousand men; all these drew the sword.

We have here the defeat of the men of Israel in their first and second battle with the Benjaminites. 1. Before their first engagement, they ask counsel of God concerning the order of their battle, and were directed, and yet they were sorely beaten. They did not think it was proper to ask of God, whether they should go up at all against Benjamin (the case was plain enough, the men of Gibeah must be punished for their wickedness, and they must do it, or it would not be done,) but "Who shall go first?" (v. 18.) that is, "Who shall be general of our army?" For, whissoever tribe was appointed to go first, the prince of that tribe must be looked upon as commander in chief of the whole body; for if they had meant it of the order of their march only, it had been proper to have asked, "Who shall go next?" and then, "Who next?" But if they know that Judah must go first, they know they must all observe the orders of the prince of that tribe. This appears from the answer which was given to them, v. 17, that the Lord Jesus was to spring from that tribe, 1 Tim. 6, 14, 15. To this day this tribe is to have the pre-eminence. The tribe that went up first had the most honourable post, but withal the most dangerous, and, probably, lost most in the engagement. Who would strive for precedence that sees the peril of it?

Yet though Judah, that strong and valiant tribe, goes up first, and all the tribes of Israel attend them, (And the Lord, (as it is called, Ps. 110, 7.) is too hard for them all. The whole army lay down to Gibeah, v. 19. The Benjaminites advance to raise the siege, and the army prepares to give them a warm reception, v. 20. But between the Benjaminites that attacked them in the front with incredible fury, and the men of Gibeah that sallied out upon their rear, they were put into confusion, and lost twenty-two thousand men, v. 21. Here was no manner of confusion among them, for there was no quarter given, but all put to the sword.

II. Before the second engagement, they again asked counsel of God, and more solemnly than before, for they went before the Lord until even, (v. 23.) lamenting the loss of so many brave men, especially as it was a token of God's displeasure, and would give occasion to the Benjaminites to triumph in the success of their wickedness. Also at this time they did not ask, should they go slow or fast, but, Whether they should go up at all. They intimate a reason, why they should scruple it, especially now that Providence had frowned upon them, because Benjamin was their brother; and a readiness to lay down their arms, if God should order them. God bid them go up, he allowed the attempt; though Benjamin was their brother, he was a gangrened member of their body, and must be cut off. Upon this, they encouraged themselves, perhaps more in their own strength than in the divine commission, and made a second attempt upon the forces of the rebels, in the same place where the former battle was fought, (v. 22.) with the hope of retrieving their credit upon the same spot of ground where they had lost it, which they would not superstitiously change, as if there were anything unlucky in the place; but this time it was second time, and second time, and a brass vessel, with the loss of eighteen thousand men, v. 25. The former day's loss, and this, amounted to forty thousand, which was just a tenth part of the whole army, and the same number that they had drawn out by lot to fetch victuals, v. 10. They decimated themselves for that service, and now God again decimated them for the slaughter.

But what shall we say to these things, that so just and holy God, could possibly be guilty to the worst once and again? Were they not fighting God's battles against sin? Had they not his commission? What, and yet miscarry thus! 1. God's judgments are a great deep, and his way is in the sea. Clouds and darkness are often round about him, but judgment and justice are always the habituation of his throne. We may be sure of the righteousness, when we cannot see the reasons of God's proceedings. 2. God would hereby show them, and us in them, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, that numbers are not to be confided in, which perhaps the Israelites did with too much assurance. We must never lay that weight on an arm of flesh, which the Rock of ages only will bear. 3. God designed hereby to correct Israel for their sins. They did well to show such a zeal against the wickedness of Gibeah; but were there not with them, even with them, sins against the Lord their God? Those must be made to know their own iniquity, that are forward in condemning the iniquity of others. Some think it was a rebuke to them, for not witnessing against the idolatry of Micah and the Danites, by which their religion was corrupted, as they now did against the lewdness of Gibeah and the Benjamites, by which the public peace was disturbed, though God had particularly ordered them to levy war upon idolaters, Deut. 13. 12. &c. 4. God would hereby teach us, not to think it strange, if a good cause suffer worst for a while, nor to judge of the merits of it by the success of it. The interest of grace in the heart, and of religion in the world, may be foiled, and suffer great loss, and seem to be quite run down, but judgment will be brought forth to victory at last. Vinece mur in Jerusalem, sed non in bello.—We are foiled in a battle, but not in the whole campaign. Right may fall, but it shall arise.

26. Then all the children of Israel, and all the people, went up, and came unto the house of God and wept, and sat there before the Lord, and fasted that day until even, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the Lord. 27. And the children of Israel inquired of the Lord, (for the ark of the covenant of God was there in those days;) 28. And Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, stood before it in those days,) saying, Shall I yet again go out to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother, or shall I cease? And the Lord said, Go up; for to-morrow I will deliver them into thine hand. 29. And Israel set liers in wait round about Gibeah. 30. And the children of Israel went up against the children of Benjamin on the third day, and put themselves in array against Gibeath, as at other times. 31. And the children of Benjamin went out against the people, and were drawn away from the city; and began to smite of the people and kill, as at other times, in the highways, of which one goeth up to the house of God, and the other to Gibeah in the field, about thirty men of Israel. 32. And the children of Benjamin said, They are smitten down before us, as at the first. But the children of Israel said, They be flees, and draw them from the city unto the highways. 33. And all the men of Israel rose up out of their place, and put themselves in array at Baal-tamar; and the liers in wait of Israel came forth out of their places, even out of the meadows of Gibeath. 34. And there came against Gibeath ten thousand chosen men out of all Israel, and the battle was sore: but they knew not that evil was near them. 35. And the Lord smote Benjamin before Israel: and the children of Israel destroyed of the Benjamites that day twenty and five thousand and a hundred men: all these drew the sword. 36. So the children of Benjamin saw that they were smitten: for the men of Israel gave place to the Benjamites, because they trusted unto the liers in wait which they had set beside Gibeath. 37. And the liers in wait hasted, and rushed upon Gibeath; and the liers in wait drew themselves along, and smote all the city with the edge of the sword. 38. Now there was an appointed sign between the men of Israel and the liers in wait, that they should make a great flame with smoke rise up out of the city. 39. And when the men of Israel retired in the battle, Benjamin began to smite and kill of the men of Israel about thirty persons; for they said, Surely they are smitten down before us, as in the first battle. 40. But when the flame began to arise up out of the city with a pillar of smoke, the Benjamites looked behind them, and behold, the flame of the city ascended up to heaven. 41. And when the men of Israel turned again, the men of Benjamin were amazed: for they saw that evil was come upon them. 42. Therefore they turned their backs before the men of Israel unto the way of the wilderness; but the battle overtook them: and them which came out of the cities they destroyed in the midst of them. 43. Thus they inclosed the Benjamites round about, and chased them, and trode them down with ease, over against Gibeath toward the sun-rising. 44. And there fell of Benjamin eighteen thousand men: all these were men of valour. 45. And they turned, and fled toward the wilderness unto the rock of Rimmon: and they gleaned of them in the highways five thousand men; and pursued hard after them unto Gidon, and slew two thousand men of them. 46. So that all which fell that day of Benjamin were twenty and five thousand men that drew the sword: all these were men of valour. 47. But six hundred men turned, and fled to the wilderness unto the rock Rimmon, and abode in the rock Rimmon four months. 48. And the men of Israel turned again upon the children of Benjamin, and smote them with the edge of the sword, as well the men of every city as the beast, and all that came to hand: also they set on fire all the cities that they came to.

We have here a full account of the complete victory which the Israelites obtained over the Benjamites in the third engagement: the righteous cause was victorious at last, when the managers of it amended what had been amiss; for when a good cause suffers, it is for want of good management.
Observe then how the victory was obtained, and how it was pursued.

1. How the victory was obtained. Two things they had trusted too much to in the former engagements, the goodness of their cause, and the superior numbers; it was true, that they had both right and strength on their side, which were great advantages. But they depended too much upon them, to the neglect of those duties, which now, this third time, when they see their error, they apply themselves to.

2. They, previously, so confident of the goodness of their cause, that they thought no need of God, depend only on God for his presence and blessing; they took that for granted, and, perhaps they concluded that he owed them his favour, and could not in justice withhold it, since it was in defence of virtue that they appeared, and took upon arms. But God having showed them that he was under no obligation to prosper their enterprise, that he neither needed them nor was tied to them, that they were more indebted to him for the honour of being ministers of his justice, than he to them for the service, now they became humble petitioners for success. Before, they only consulted God's oracle, _Who shall go up first?_ And, _Shall we go up?_ But now they implored his favour, fastened and prayed, and offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, v. 26, to make an atonement for sin, and an acknowledgment of their dependence upon God, as an expression of their desire toward him. We cannot express the evident signs of conscience, unless we thus seek it in the way he has app-inted. And when they were in this frame, and thus sought the Lord, that he not only ordered them to go up against the Benjamites the third time, but gave them a promise of victory, _To-morrow I will deliver them into thine hand_, v. 28.

3. They were, previously, so confident of the greatness of their strength, that they thought it needless to use any art, to lay any ambush, or form a stratagem, not doubting but to conquer them purely by a strong hand; but now they saw it was requisite to use some policy, as if they had an enemy to deal with them, that had been superior in number; accordingly they set _lairs in wait_, v. 29, and gained their point, as their fathers did before Ai; Josh. 8. stratagems of that kind being most likely to take the Benjamites by surprise. It does not signify that they had trained the enemy, and made the pretended flight the less suspected. The management of this artifice is here very largely described. The assurance God had given them of success in this day's action, instead of making them remiss and presumptuous, set all hands and hands on work for the effecting of what God had promised. Observe the method they took; the body of the army faced the city of Gibeah, as they were in the front, advancing toward the city gates, v. 30. TheBenjamites, the body of whose army was now quartered at Gibeah, sallied out upon them, charged them with great bravery; the besiegers gave back, retired with precipitation, as if their hearts failed them upon the sight of the Benjamites, which they were willing to believe, who proudly conceived that by their former success they had vanquished the less formidable; sorry reflection the Israelites sustained in this instance of flight, about thirty men were cut off in their rear, v. 31, 39. But when the Benjamites were all drawn out of the city, the ambush seized the city, v. 37, gave a signal to the body of the army, v. 38, 40, which immediately turned upon them, v. 41, and, it should seem, another considerable party that was posted at Beth-taan came upon them at the same time; v. 33, so that the Benjamites were quite surround- ed, which put them into the greatest consternation that could be: a sense of guilt now disheartened them, and the higher their hopes had been raised, the more grievous was this confusion. At first, _the battle was sore_, v. 34. the Benjamites fought with fury, but when they saw what a snare they were drawn into, they thought one pair of heels (as we say) was worth two pair of hands, and they made the best of their way toward the wilderness, v. 42, but in vain, _the battle overtook them_, and, to complete their distress, _they which came out of the cities of Israel_, that waited to see the event of the battle, joined with the pursuers and helped to cut them off. Every man's hand was against them.

Observe, in this story, 1. That the Benjamites, in the beginning of the conflict, were more confident that the day was their own. _They are better men before us_, v. 32, 39. Sometimes God suffers wicked men to be lifted up in successes and hopes, that their fall may be the sorer. See how short their joy is, and their triumphing but for a moment. _Let not him that girdeth on the harness boast_, except he has reason to boast in God. 2. Evil was near them, and they did not know it; v. 34. but v. 41. they saw, when it was too late to prevent it, _that evil was come upon them_. What evils may at any time be near us, we cannot tell, but the less they are feared, the heavier they fall; sinners will not be persuaded to see evil near them, but how dreadful will it be when it comes, and there is no escaping! 1 Thess. 5. 3. (3.) Though the men of Israel played their parts so well in this engagement, yet the victory is ascribed to God; v. 35. _The Lord smote Ben- jamin before Israel_, not only the Benjamites, but also God, was the success. 4. _They trampled down men of Benjamin with ease_, when God fought against them, v. 43. It is an easy thing to trample upon those who have made God their enemy. See Mal. 4. 3.

II. How the victory was prosecuted and improved in a military execution done upon these sinners against their own souls. 1. Gibeah itself was destroyed in the first place, that nest of lewdness. The ammab center of the city by surprise, drew themselves along, that is, dispersed themselves into several parts of it, which they might easily do, now that all the men of war were sallied out, and had very presumptuously left it defenceless, and smote all they found, even women and children, _with the sword_, v. 37, and set fire to the city, v. 40. Sin brings ruin upon cities. 2. The army in the field was quite routed and cut off, eighteen thousand men of Benjamin were slain, v. 35. Those that escaped from the field were pursued, and cut off in their flight, to the number of seven thousand, v. 45. It is to no purpose to think of out-running divine vengeance. _Evil pursues sinners_, and it will overtake them. 4. Even they that tarried at home, were involved in their ruin. _They let their sword devour for ever_, not considering that it was the better part, _the contrite heart_, as Ab- ramm pleads long after, when he was at the head of an army of Benjamites, probably with an eye to this very story, 2 Sam. 25. 26, 26. They put to the sword all that breathed, and set fire to _all the cities_, v. 48. So that all of the tribe of Benjamin, for aught that appears, there remained none alive but six hundred men that took shelter in the rock Rimmon, and lay close there four months, v. 47. Now, 1. It is a sad token of God's justice. The whole tribe of Benjamin was culpable; but must they therefore be used as devoted Ca- manites? That it was done in the heat of war—That this was the way of prosecuting victories which the sword of Israel had been accustomed to—That the Israelites were extremely exasperated against the Benjamites for the slaughter they had made among them in the two former engagements—will go far to a little way to excuse the cruelty of this execution. It is true, they had sworn that whosoever did not come up to Mizpeh, should be put to death: ch. 21. 5. but that, if it was a justifiable oath, yet extended only to the men of war, the rest were not expected to come. Yet, (2.) It is easy to justify the hand of God in it; Benjamin had sinned against him, and God had threatened, that if they forgot him, they should perish as the nations that were before them perished, Dent. 8. 20. who were all in this manner cut off. It is easy likewise to improve it for warning against the beginnings of sin, they are like the letting forth of water, therefore leave it off before it be meddled with, for we know not what will be in the end thereof. The eternal ruin of souls will be worse, and more fearful, than all these desolations of a tribe. This affair of Gibeah is twice spoken of by the prophet Hosea, as the beginning of the corruption of Israel, and a pattern to all that followed, ch. 9. 5. They have deeply corrupted themselves as in the days of Gibeah, and ch. 10. 9. Thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah, and it is added, that the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not that is, did not at first, overtake them.

CHAP. XXI.

The ruins of the tribe of Benjamin we read of in the foregoing chapter; now here we have, I. The lamentation which Israel made over these ruins, v. 1. . 4. 6. 15. II. The provision they made for the repair of them out of the six hundred men that escaped, for whom they procured wives. I. Of the origin of the inhabitants of Gibeon, which they destroyed that city for not sending to the general rendezvous, v. 5. 7. . 14. 2. Of the daughters of Shiloh, v. 16. . 25. And so this melancholy story concludes.

1. NOW the men of Israel had sworn in Mizpeh, saying, There shall not any of us give his daughter unto Benjamin to wife. 2. And the people came to the house of God, and abode there till even before God, and lifted up their voices, and wept sore; 3. And said, O Lord God of Israel, why is this come to pass in Israel, that there should be to-day one tribe lacking in Israel? 4. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the people rose early, and built there an altar, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings. 5. And the children of Israel said, Who is there among all the tribes of Israel that came not up with the congregation unto the Lord? For they had made a great oath concerning him that came not up to the Lord to Mizpeh, saying, He shall surely be put to death. 6. And the children of Israel repented them for Benjamin their brother, and said, There is one tribe cut off from Israel this day. 7. How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing we have sworn by the Lord, that we will not give them of our daughters to wives? 8. And they said, What one is there of the tribes of Israel that came not up to Mizpeh to the Lord? And, behold, there came none to the camp from Jabesh-gilead to the assembly. 9. For the people were numbered, and, behold, there were none of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead there. 10. And the congregation sent thither twelve thousand men of the valiantest, and commanded them, saying, Go and smite the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead with the edge of the sword, with the women and the children. 11. And this is the thing that ye shall do, ye shall utterly destroy every male, and every woman that hath lain by man. 12. And they found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead four hundred young virgins, that had known no man by lying with any male: and they brought them unto the camp to Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan. 13. And the whole congregation sent some to speak to the children of Benjamin that were in the rock Rimmon, and to call peaceably unto them. 14. And Benjamin came again at that time; and they gave them wives which they had saved alive of the women of Jabesh-gilead: and yet so they sufficed them not. 15. And the people repented them for Benjamin, because that the Lord had made a breach in the tribes of Israel.

We may observe, in these verses,

I. The ardent zeal which the Israelites had expressed against the wickedness of the men of Gibeah, as it was countenanced by the tribe of Benjamin. Occasion is here given to mention two instances of their zeal on this occasion, which we did not meet with before.

1. While the general convention of the states was gathering together, and was waiting for a full house before they would proceed, they bound themselves with the great excretion, which they called the Cherum, utterly to destroy all those cities that should not send in their representatives and their quota of men upon this occasion; or, had sentenced them to that curse, who should thus refuse; (v. 3.) for they were to look upon such refusers, as having no indignation at the crime committed, no concern for the securing of the nation from God's judgments by the administration of justice, nor any regard to the authority of a common consent, by which they were summoned to meet.

2. When they were met, and had heard the cause, they made another solemn oath, that none of all the thousands of Israel, then present, nor any of those whom they represented, (not intending to bind their posterity,) should, if they could help it, marry a daughter to a Benjamite, v. 1. This was made an article of the war, not with any design to extirpate the tribe, but because in general they would treat them who were then actors and abettors of this villany, in all respects as they treated the devoted nations of Canaan, whom they were not only obliged to destroy, but with whom they were forbidden to marry; and because in particular, they judged them unworthy to match with a daughter of Israel, that had been so very barbarous and abusive to one of the tender sex, than which nothing could be done more base and villainous, nor a more certain indication of a mind perfectly lost to all honour and virtue. We may suppose that the Levite's sending the mangled pieces of his wife's body to the several tribes, helped very much to inspire them with all this fury, and much more than a bare narrative of the fact, though ever so well attested, would have done. So much does the eye affect the heart.

II. The deep concern which the Israelites did express for the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin when it was accomplished. The tide of their anger against Benjamin's crime, did rise even higher and the magnitude of their grief for Benjamin's destruction, ran as high and as strong after. They repented for Benjamin their brother, v. 6. 15. They did not repent of their zeal against the sin; there is a holy indignation against sin, the fruit of godly sorrow, which is to salvation, not to be repented of; 2 Cor. 7. 10, 11. But they repented of the sad consequences of what they had done, that they had carried the matter further than was either just or necessary; it had been enough to test out evil. They, when found in arms, they needed not to have cut off the husbandmen and shepherds, the women and children. Note, 1. There may be over-doing in well-doing. Great care must be taken in the government of our zeal, lest that which seemed supernatural in its causes, prove unnatural in its effects. That is no good divinity, which swallows up humanity. Many a war is ill ended which was well begun. 2. Even necessary justice is to be done with compassion. God does not punish with delight, nor should men.

3. Strong passions make work for repentance. What we say and do in a heat, our calmer thoughts commonly wish undone again. 4. In a civil war, (according to the usage of the Romans,) no victories ought to be celebrated with triumphs, because, whichever side gets, the community loses, as there is a tribute cut off from Israel. What the latter is the body for one member's crumbling another?

Now, how did they express their concern? (1.) By their grief for the breach that was made; they came to the house of God, for thither they brought all their doubts, all their counsels, all their cares, and all their sorrows. There was to be heard on this occasion, not the voice of joy and praise, but one of lamentation, and deep complaint. They lifted up their voices and wept sore, (v. 2.) not so much for the forty thousand which they had lost, (those would not be so much missed out of eleven tribes,) but for the entire destruction of one whole tribe; for this was the complaint they poured out before God, (v. 3.) There is one tribe lacking. God had taken care of every tribe; their number twelve was that which they were known by; every tribe had its place in the muster-roll. They were in the High Priest's breast-plate; every tribe had his blessing, both from Jacob and Moses, and it would be an intolerable reproach to them, if they should drop any out of this illustrious jury, and lose one out of twelve; especially Benjamin, the youngest, who was particularly dear to Jacob their common ancestor, and whom all the rest ought to have been in a particular manner tender of. Benjamin is not, was not, then will become so? Benjamin became a Benjamite, the son of the right hand, a son of sorrow! In this trouble they built an altar, not in competition, but in communion, with the appointed altar at the door of the tabernacle, which was not large enough to contain all the sacrifices they designed; for they offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, to give thanks for their victory, and also to atone for their own folly in the pursuit of it, and to implor their in their present strait. Every thing that grieves us, should bring us to God. (2.) By their amicable treaty with the poor distressed refugees that were hidden in the rock Rimmon, to whom they sent an act of indemnity, assuring them, upon the public faith, that they would now no longer treat them as enemies, but receive them as brethren, v. 15. The falling out of friends should thus be the renewing of friendship. Even those that have sinned, if at length they repent, must be forgiven and comforted, 2 Cor. 2, 7.

(3.) By the care they took to provide wives for them, that their tribe might be built up again, and the ruins of it repaired. Had the men of Israel been as indigent; the Lord would not have been pleas'd with the exterminating of the family of Benjamin, because then the land allotted to them would eschew to the rest of the tribes, ob defectum sanguinis— for want of heirs, and be easily seized for want of occupants; but these have not the spirit of Israelites, who aim to raise themselves upon the ruins of their neighbours. They were so far from any design of this kind, that all heads are at work and the young men are means for the repopulating of this tribe. All the women and children of Benjamin were slain; they had sworn not to marry their daughters to any of them; it was against the divine law that they should match with the Canaanites; to oblige them to that, would be, in effect, to bid them go serve other gods.

What must they do then for wives for them? While the poor distressed Benjamites that were hidden in the rock feared their brethren were contriving to ruin them, they were at the same time upon a project to prefer them; and it was this;

[1.] There was a piece of necessary justice to be done upon the city of Jabesh-Gilead, which belonged to the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan. It was found, upon looking over the muster-roll, (which was taken, ch. 20. 2.) that none appeared from that city, upon the general summons, (v. 8, 9.) and it was resolved upon as just that they should not be missed. If it was found, upon the city were absent, that whatever city of Israel should be guilty of such a contempt of the public authority and interest, that city should be an anathema; Jabesh-Gilead lies under that severe sentence, which might by no means be dispensed with. They that had spared the Canaanites in many places, who were devoted to destruction by the divine command, could not find in their hearts to spare their brethren, who were devoted by their own curse. Why did they not now send men to root the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, to avoid whom the poor Levite had been forced to go to Gibeah? ch. 19. 11, 12. Men are commonly more zealous to support their own authority than God's. A detachment is therefore sent of twelve thousand men, to execute the sentence upon Jabesh-Gilead. Having found, that when the whole body of the army went against them, they were not able to deliver them into their hands, on this expedition they sent but a few, v. 10. Their commission is, to put all to the sword, men, women, and children, (v. 11.) according to that law, (Lev. 27. 29.) Whosoever is devoted of men, by those that have power to do it, shall surely be put to death.

[2.] An expedition is from hence formed for providing the Benjamites with wives. When Moses sent the same number of men to enquire the Lord of Midian, the same orders were given, as here, that all married women should be slain with their husbands, as one with them, but that the virgins should be saved alive, Numb. 31. 17, 18. That precedent was sufficient to support the distinction here made between a wife and virgin, v. 11, 12. Four hundred virgins that were marriageable, were found in Jabesh-Gilead, and these were married to so many of the surviving Benjamites, v. 14. Their fathers were not present when the vow was made, not to marry with Benjamites, so that they were not under any colour of obligation by it; and besides, being a prey taken in war, they were at the disposal of the conquerors. Perhaps the alliance now contracted between Benjamin and Jabesh-Gilead, made Saul, who was a Benjamite, the more concerned for that place, (1 Sam. 11. 4.) though then inhabited by new families.
said, How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing the women are destroyed out of Benjamin? 17. And they said, There must be an inheritance for them that be escaped of Benjamin, that a tribe be not destroyed out of Israel. 18. Howbeit we may not give them wives of our daughters: for the children of Israel have sworn, saying, Cursed be he that giveth a wife to Benjamin. 19. Then they said, Behold, there is a feast of the Lord in Shiloh yearly, in a place which is on the north side of Beth-el, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Beth-el to Shechem, and on the south of Lebanon. 20. Therefore they commanded the children of Benjamin, saying, Go and lie in wait in the vineyards; 21. And see, and, behold, if the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances, then come ye out of the vineyards, and catch you every man his wife of the daughters of Shiloh, and go to the land of Benjamin. 22. And it shall be, when their fathers or their brethren come unto us to complain, that we will say unto them, Be favourable unto them for our sakes; because we reserved not to each man his wife in the war: for ye did not give unto them at this time, that ye should be guilty. 23. And the children of Benjamin did so, and took them wives according to their number, of them that danced, whom they caught: and they went and returned unto their inheritance, and repaired the cities, and dwelt in them: 24. And the children of Israel departed thence at that time, every man to his tribe, and to his family; and they went out from thence every man to his inheritance. 25. In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes.

We have here the method that was taken to provide the two hundred Benjamines that remained, with wives. And though the tribe was reduced to a small number, they were only in care to provide each man with one wife, not with more, under pretence of multiplying them the faster. They may not bestow their daughters upon them; but to save their oath, and yet do them a kindness, by getting them to them, they put them into a way of taking them by surprise, and marrying them, which should be ratified by their parents' consent, ex post facto—afterward. The less consideration is used before the making of a vow, the more, commonly, there is need of after, for the keeping of it.

I. That which gave an opportunity for the doing of this, was, a public ball at Shiloh, in the fields which all the young ladies of that city, and the parts adjacent, were so disposed, met to dance, in honour of a feast of the Lord then observed; probably the feast of tabernacles, (v. 19.) for that feast (Bishop Patrick says,) was the only season wherein the Jewish virgins were allowed to dance; and that, not so much for their recreation, as to express their holy joy, as David, when he danced before the ark; otherwise, the present melancholy posture of public affairs would have made dancing unseasonable, as Isa. 22, 12, 13. The dancing was very modest and chase, it was not mixed dancing; no men danced with these daughters of Shiloh, nor did any married women so far forget their gravity as to join with them. Here, at their own desire and design, made them an easy prey to those that had a design upon them. Whence, Bishop Hall observes, that the ambuses of evil spirits carry away many souls from dancing to a fearful deviation.

II. The elders of Israel gave authority to the Benjamines to do this, to lie in wait in the vineyards which surrounded the green they used to dance on, and, when they were in the midst of their sport, to come upon them, and catch them for himself, and carry them straight away to their own country, v. 20, 21. They knew that none of their own daughters would be there, so that they could not be said to give them, for they knew nothing of the matter. A sorry salvo is better than none, to save the breaking of an oath: it were much better to be cautious in making vows, that there be not occasion afterward, as there was here, to say before the angel, that it was an error. Here was a very preposteros way of match-making, when both the mutual affection of the young people and the consent of the parents must be presumed to come after; the case was extraordinary, and may by no means be drawn into a precedent. Over-hasty marriages often occasion a leisurely repentance; and what comfort can be expected from a match made either by force or fraud? The virgins of Jabez-Gilead were taken out of the midst of blood and slaughter, but these of Shiloh out of the midst of mirth and joy; the former had reason to be thankful that they had their lives for a prey, and the latter, it is to be hoped, had no cause to complain, after a while, when they found themselves matched, not to men of broken and desperate fortunes, as they seemed to be, who were lately fetched out of a cave, but to men of the best and largest estates in the nation, as they must needs be, when left to the whole tribe of Benjamin, which consisted of forty-five thousand six hundred men, (Num. 26. 41.) came to be divided again among six hundred, who had all by survivorship.

III. They undertook to pacify the fathers of these young women: as to the infringement of their paternal authority, they would easily forgive it, when they considered to what fair estates their daughters were matched, and that every man a wife, in every man a wife they were likely to be; but the oath they were bound by, not to give their daughters to Benjamines, might perhaps stick with some of them, whose consciences were tender; yet as to that, this might satisfy them: 1. That the necessity was urgent, (v. 22.) We reserved not to each man his wife; now owning that they did ill to destroy all the women, and desiring to atone for their too rigorous construction of their vow, in order to destroy all the Benjamines also, for they had a very absurd, and, in the same construction of their vow not to match with them. “And therefore, for our sakes, who were too severe, let them keep what they have got.” For, 2. In strictness it was not a breach of their vow; they had sworn not to give them their daughters, but they had not sworn to fetch them back if they were forcibly taken. So that if there was any fault, the oath must be limited, and not to themselves, nor to their posterity, but to the nation. He pronounces a very easy quod fieri non debuit, factum vate—That which ought not to have been done, is yet valid when it is done. The thing was done, and is ratified only by conivance, according to the law, Num. 30. 4.

Lastly. In the close of all, we have, 1. The setting of the tribe of Benjamin again. The few that remained, returned to the inheritance of that tribe, v. 25. And soon after from among them sprang Eshub, who was famous in his generation, the second Judge of Israel, ch. 3. 15. 2. The disbanding and dispersing of the army of Israel, v. 24. They did not set up for a standing army, nor pretend to make any alterations or establishment in the government; but when the affair was over, for which they were called together, they quietly departed in God's peace, every man to his family. Public services must not make us think ourselves above our own private affairs, and the duty of providing for our own house. 3. A repetition of the cause of these confusions, v. 25. Though God was their King, every man would be his own master, as if there was no king. Blessed be God for magistracy.
AN

WITH

RUTH.

This short history of the domestic affairs of one particular family, fitly follows the book of Judges, (the events related here, happening in the days of the Judges,) and fitly goes before the books of Samuel, because in the close it introduces David: yet the Jews, in their Bibles, separate it from both, and make it one of the five Megilloth, or Volumes, which they put together toward the latter end; in this order, Solomon's Song, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. It is probable that Samuel was the penman of it. It relates, not miracles or laws, wars or victories, or the revolutions of states, but the afflictions first, and afterward the comfort, of Naomi; the conversion first, and afterward, the preference, of Ruth. Many such events have happened, which perhaps we may think as well worthy to be recorded. But these God saw fit to transmit the knowledge of to us; and even common historians think they have liberty to choose their subject. The design of this book is,

I. To lead to providence; to show us how conversant it is about our private concerns, and to teach us in them all to have an eye to it, acknowledging God in all our ways, and in all events that concern us. See 1 Sam. 2. 7. 8. Ps. 113. 7-9.

II. To lead to Christ, who descended from Ruth, and part of whose genealogy concludes the book, from whence it is fetched into Math. 1. In the conversion of Ruth the Moabitess, and the bringing of her into the pedigree of the Messiah, we have a type of the calling of the Gentiles in due time into the fellowship of Christ Jesus our Lord. The affections of Naomi and Ruth we have an account of, ch. 1. Instances of their industry and humility, ch. 2. The bringing of them into an alliance with Boaz, ch. 3. And their happy settlement thereby, ch. 4. And let us remember the scene is laid in Beth-lehem, the city where our Redeemer was born.

RUTH, I.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter we have Naomi's afflictions. I. As a distressed housekeeper, forced by famine to remove into the land of Moab, v. 1. 2. II. As a mournful widow and mother, bewailing the death of her husband and her two sons, v. 3-5. III. As a careful mother-in-law, desirous to be kind to her two daughters, but at a loss how to be so, when she returns to her own country, v. 6-13. Orpah she parts with in sorrow, v. 14. Ruth she takes with her in fear, v. 15-18. IV. As a poor woman sent back to the place of her first settlement, to be supported by the kindness of her friends, v. 19-22. All these things were melancholy, and seemed against her, and yet all were working for good.

1. NOW it came to pass, in the days when the judges ruled, that there was a famine in the land. And a certain man of Beth-lehem-judah went to sojourn in the country of Moab, he, and his wife, and his two sons. 2. And the name of the man was Elimelech, and the name of his wife Naomi, and the name of his two sons Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah. And they came into the country of Moab, and continued there. 3. And Elimelech, Naomi's husband, died; and she was left, and her two sons. 4. And they took them wives of the women of Moab; the name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other Ruth: and they dwelled there about ten years. 5. And Mahlon and Chilion died also both of them; and the woman was left of her two sons and her husband.

The first words give all the date we have of this story. It was in the days when the Judges ruled, v. 1. not in those disorderly times when there was no king in Israel. But under which of the judges these things happened, we are not told, and the conjectures of the learned are very uncertain. It must be toward the beginning of the judges' time, for Boaz, who married Ruth, was born of Rahab, who received the spices in Joshua's time. Some think it was in the days of Ehud, others of Deborah; the learned Bishop Patrick inclines to think it was in the days of Gideon, because in his days only we read of a famine by the Midianites' invasion, Judges 6. 3, 4. While the judges were ruling, one city, and some another, Providence takes particular cognizance of Beth-lehem, and has an eye to a King, to Messiah himself, who should descend from two Gentle mothers, Rahab and Ruth.

I. A famine in the land; in the land of Canaan, that land flowing with milk and honey. This was one of the judgments which God had threatened to bring upon them for their sins, Lev. 26. 19, 20. He has many arrows in his quiver; in the days of the judges they were oppressed by their enemies; and when by that judgment they were not reformed, God tried this, for when he judges, he will overcome. When the land had rest, yet it had not plenty; even in Beth-lehem, which signifies the house of bread, there was scarcity. A fruitful land is turned into barrenness, to correct and restrain the luxury and wantonness of them that dwell therein.

II. An account of one particular family distress-ed in the famine; it is that of Elimelech. His name signifies my God a King; agreeable to the state of Israel when the judges ruled, for the Lord was their king. The land of Moab was only in their affliction, that God was their's, and that he reigns for ever. His wife was Naomi, which signifies my amiable or pleasant one. But his sons' names were Mahlon and Chilion, sickness and consumption, perhaps because weakly children, and not likely to be long-lived. Such are the productions of our pleasant things, weak and infirm, fading and dying. Elimelech was one of the three sons of Jesse, and came from Bethlehem, into the country of Moab, on the other side Jordan, for subsistence, because of the famine, v. 1, 2. It seems there was plenty in the country of Moab, when there was scarcity of bread in the land of Is-rael. Common gifts of providence are often be-stowed in greater plenty upon those that are strangers to God, than upon those that know and worship him. Moab is at ease from his youth, while Israel is oppressed. And, 4. 11. not because God loves Moabites better, but because they have their portion in this life. Thither Elimelech goes, not to settle for ever, but to sojourn for a time, during the drought, as Abraham, on the like occasion, went into Egypt, and Isaac into the land of the Philistines. Now here, 1. Elimelech's care to provide for his family, and his taking his wife and children with him, were, without doubt, commendable. He removed not only for famine, but because he had denied the faith, 1 Tim. 5. 8. When he was in his straits, he did not forsake his house, go seek his fortune himself, and leave his wife and children to shift for their own maintenance, but, as became a tender husband and a loving father, where he went, he took them with him, not as the ostrich, Job 39. 16. But, 2. I see not how his removal into the country of Moab, upon this occasion, could be justified. Abraham took away his sojourners in Canaan, and it was agreeable to their condition to remove; but the seed of Israel were now fixed, and ought not to remove into the territories of others, the law of God had obliged his neighbours to relieve him; (Lev. 25. 35.) but that was not his case, for he went out full, v. 21. By those who tarried at home, it appears the famine was not so extreme, but that there was sufficient to keep life and soul together; and his charge was but small, only five sons. But if he could not be content with the short allowance which he took up with, and in the day of famine could not be satisfied, unless he kept as plentiful a table as he had done formerly, if he could not live in hope that there would come years of plenty again in due time, or could not with patience wait for these years, it was his fault, and he did by it dishonour God, and the good land he had given them, 4. 11. awoken the hands of his brethern, in whom he should have been willing to take his lot, and in the famine examined himself to others. If all should do as he did, Canaan would be despoiled. Note, It is an evidence of a discontented, distrustful, unstable spirit, to be weary of the place in which God hath set us, and to be for leaving it immediately, whenever we meet with any uneasiness or inconvenience in it. It is folly to think of escaping that cross which, being laid in our way, we ought to take up. It is our wisdom to make the best of that which is, for it is seldom that changing our place is mending it. Or if he would remove, why to the country of Moab? If he had made inquiry, it is probable he would have found plenty in some of the tribes of Israel, those, for instance, on the other side Jordan, that bordered on the land of Moab; if he had that zeal for God and his worship, and that affection for his brethren, which became an Israelite, he would not have persuaded himself so easily to go to sojourn among Moabites.

IV. The marriage of his two sons to two of the daughters of Moab after his death, v. 4. All agree that this was ill done; the Chaldee says, They transgressed the decree of the word of the Lord, in taking strange wives. If they would not stay unmarried till their return to the land of Israel, they were not so off for but that they might have fetched them wives from thence. Little did Elimelech think, when he went to sojourn in Moab, that ever his sons should thus join in affinity with Moabites. But those that bring young people into bad acquaintance, and take them out of the way of public ordinances, though they may think them well-principled, and armed against temptation, know not what they do, nor what will be the end thereof. It does not appear that the Moabitess were either proselyted to the Jewish religion, for Orpah is said to return to her gods, v. 15. the gods of M°ab were her's still. It is a groundless tradition of the Jews, that Ruth was the daughter of Eglon king of Moab, yet the Chaldee paraphrast inserts it; but this and their other tradition, which he inserts likewise, cannot agree that Boaz, who married Ruth, was the same with Jizan who judged Israel two hundred years after the death of Elimelech, Judges 12.

V. The death of Elimelech and his two sons, and the disconsolate condition Naomi was thereby re-duced to. Her husband died, v. 3. and her two sons, v. 5. soon after their marriage; and the Chaldee says, Their days were shortened, because they transgressed the law in marrying strange wives. See here, 1. That wherever we go, we cannot cut our own death, whose fatal arrows fly in all places. 2. That we have no expectation to escape the death out of the way of our duty. He that will save his life by any indirect courses shall lose it. 3. That death, when it comes into a family, often makes breach upon break. One is taken away, to prepare another to follow soon after; one is taken away, and that affliction is not duly improved, and therefore God sends another of the same kind. When Naomi had lost her husband, she took so much the more complacency, and put so much the more confidence, in her sons; under the shadow of those surviving comforts, she thinks she shall live among the heathen; and exceedingly glad she was
of these gourds, but, behold, they wither presently, green and growing up in the morning, cut down and dried up before night; buried soon after they were married, for neither of them left any children.
So uncertain and transient are all our enjoyments here. It is therefore our wisdom to make sure of those comforts that will be made sure, and which death cannot rob us of. But how desolate was the condition, and how disconsolate the spirit, of poor Naomi, when the woman was left of her two sons, and her husband! When these two things come upon her in a moment, come upon her in her perfection, by whom shall she be comforted? Lose of children and widowhood! Isa. 47. 9.—51. 19. It is God alone who has wherewithal to comfort those that are cast down.
6. Then she arose, with her daughters-in law, that she might return from the coun try of Moab: for she had heard in the country of Moab how that the Lord had visited his people in giving them bread.
7. Wherefore she went forth out of the place where she was, and her two daughters-in law with her: and they went on the way to return unto the land of Judah. 8. And Naomi said unto her two daughters-in-law, Go, return each to her mother's house: the Lord deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead, and with me. 9. The Lord grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband. Then she kissed them; and they lifted up their voice and wept. 10. And they said unto her, Surely we will return with thee unto thy people. 11. And Naomi said, Turn again, my daughters, why will you go with me? are there yet any more sons in my womb, that they may be your husbands?
12. Turn again, my daughters, go your way; for I am too old to have a husband.
If I should say, I have hope, if I should have a husband also to-night, and should also bear sons; 13. Would ye tarry for them till they were grown? would ye stay for them from having husbands? nay, my dughters; for it grieveth me much, for your sakes, that the hand of the Lord is gone out against me. 14. And they lifted up their voice, and wept again: and Orpah kissed her mother-in-law, but Ruth clave unto her. 15. And she said, Behold, thy sister-in-law is gone back unto her people, and unto her gods: return thou after thy sister-in-law. 16. And Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from fol lowing after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. 17. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me. 18. When she saw that she was steadfastly minded to go with her, then she left speaking unto her.

See here,
The good affection Naomi bore to the land of Israel, 7. 6. Though she could not stay in it while the famine lasted, she would not stay out of it when the famine ceased; though the country of Moab had afforded her shelter, and supply in time of need, yet she did not intend it should be her rest for ever, no land should be that but the holy land, in which the sanctuary of God was, of which he had said,
This is my rest for ever. Observe,
1. God, at last, returned in mercy to his people for though he contended long, he will not continue always. As the judgment of oppression, under which they often groaned in the time of the judges, still came to an end, after a while, when God had raised them up a deliverer; so here, the judgment of famine: at length God graciously visited his people in giving them bread. Plenty is God's gift, and it is his visitation which, by bread, the staff of life, holds our souls in life. Though this mercy be the more striking when it comes after famine, yet if we have constantly enjoyed it, and never knew what famine meant, we are not to think it the less valua ble.
2. Naomi then returned, in duty to her people.
She had often inquired of their state, what harvest they had, and how the markets went, and still the tidings were discouraging; but like the prophet's servant, who, having looked seven times and seen no sign of rain, at length discerned a cloud, no big ner than a man's hand, which soon overspread the heavens; so Naomi, at last, has good news brought her of plenty in Beth-lehem, and then she can think of no other than returning thither again. Her new alliances in the country of Moab could not make her forget her relation to the land of Israel. Note.
Though there be a reason for our being in bad places, yet when the reason ceases, we must by no means continue in them. For reason, when lost, are great afflictions, but when the force ceases, and it is continued of choice, then it be comes a great sin. It should seem, she began to think of returning immediately upon the death of her two sons: (1.) Because she looked upon that affliction to be a judgment upon her family for lingering in the country of Moab: and hearing this voice to be the voice of the rod, and of him that afflicted it, she obeys and returns. Had she returned upon the death of her husband, perhaps she might have saved the life of her sons; but when God judgeth, he will overcome, and if one affliction prevail not to awaken us to a sight and sense of sin and duty, anoth er shall. When death comes into a family, it ought to be improved for the reforming of what is amiss in the family: when relations are taken away from us, we are put upon inquiry, whether, in some instance or other, we are not out of the way of our duty, that we may return to it. God calls our sins to remembrance when he stays a son, 1 Kings 17. 18.
And if he thus hedge up our way with thorns, it is that he may oblige us to say, We will go and re turn to our first Husband, as Naomi here to her country, Hos. 2. 7. (2.) Because the land of Moab was now become a melancholy place to her. It is with little pleasure that she can breathe in that air in which her husband and sons had expired; or walk on that ground in which they lay buried out of her sight, but not out of her thoughts; now she will go to Canaan again. Thus God takes away from us the comforts we stay ourselves too much upon, and solace ourselves too much in, here in the land of our sojournings, that we may think more of our home in the other world, and 'by faith and hope may hasten towards it. Earth is imbritered to us, that heaven may be endeared.

RUTH, I.

II. The good affection which her daughters-in-law, and one of them especially, bore to her, and her great return to them, the good affection.

1. They were both so kind as to accompany her, some part of the way at least, when she returned toward the land of Judah. Her two daughters-in-law did not go about to persuade her to continue in the land of Moab, but if she was resolved to go home, would pay her all possible civility and respect at parting; and this was one instance of it, they would bring her on her way, at least, to the utmost limits of their country, and help to carry her luggage as far as they went, for it does not appear she had any servant to attend her, v. 7. By this we see both that Naomi, as became an Israelite, had been very kind and obliging to them, and had won their love, in which she is an example to all mothers-in-law; and that Orpah and Ruth had a just sense of her kindness, for they were willing to return in such far. It was a sign they had dwelt together in unity, though they were dead, by whom they lived, and how they lived. Though they retained an affection to the gods of Moab, (v. 15,) and Naomi was still faithful to the God of Israel, yet that was no hinderance to either side from love and kindness, and all the good offices that the relation required. Mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law are too often at variance, (Matth. 10. 33,) and therefore it is the more commendable if they live in love; let all in that relation aim at the praise of despotic charity.

2. When they had gone a little way with her, Naomi, with a great deal of affection, urged them to go back; (v. 8, 9,) Return each to her mother's house. When they were dislodged by a sad providence from the house of their husbands, it was a mercy to them that they had their parents yet living, that they had their houses to go to, where they might be welcome and easy, and were not turned out to the world. Naomi suggests that their own mothers would be more agreeable to them than a mother-in-law, especially when their own mothers had houses, and their mother-in-law was not sure she had a place to lay her head in, which she could call her own.

She dismisses them, (1.) With commendation: that is a debt owing to those who had conducted themselves well in any relation, they ought to have the praise of it, Ye have dealt kindly with the dead and with me; that is, 'Ye were good wives to your husbands that are gone, and have been good daughters to me; and not wanting to your duty in either relation. Note, When we and our relations are parting, by death or otherwise, it is very comfortable, if we have both their testimony, and the testimony of our own consciences for us, that while we were together, we carefully endeavour to do our duty in the relation. This will help to allay the bitterness of parting; and while we are together we should labour so to conduct ourselves, as that when we part, we may not have cause to reflect with regret upon our miscarriages in the relation. (2.) With prayer. It is very proper for friends, when they part, to part with prayer. She sends them home with her blessing; and the blessing of a mother-in-law is not to be slighted. In this blessing she twice mentions the name Jehovah, Israel's God, and the kinsman-redeemer; that is, her daughters to look up to him as the only Fountain of all good. To him she prays in general, that he would recompense to them the kindness they had showed to her and her's. It may be expected and prayed for in faith, that God will deal kindly with those that have dealt kindly with their relations, He that waterveth, shall be watered also himself; and, in particular, that they might be happy in marrying again; The Lord grant that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband. Note, [1.] It is very fit, that according to the apostle's direction, (1 Tim. 5. 14,) the younger women, and he that looks after them, should marry, bear children, and guide the house. And it is as just that those who have approved themselves good wives, should not again be blessed with good husbands, especially those that, like these widows, have no children. [2.] The married state is a state of rest, such rest as this world affords, rest in the house of a husband, more than can be expected in the house of a mother, or a mother-in-law. [3.] This rest is God's gift, and will not be found in our outward condition, God must be acknowledged in it. There are those that are unequally yoked, that find little rest even in the house of a husband. Their affliction ought to make those the more thankful, to whom the relation is comfortable; yet let God be the Rest of the soul, and no perfect rest thought of on this side heaven. (3.) She dismissed them with great affection; she kissed them; she placed that on them that better to give them, but silver and gold she has none. Here is a right and kind kiss shall be the seal of such a true friendship, (as though she never saw them more,) she will, while she lives, retain the pleasing remembrance of. If relations must part, let them thus part in love, that they may (if they never meet again in this world) meet in the world of everlasting love.

3. The two young widows could not think of parting with their good mother-in-law, so much had they been accustomed to their protection; they were drawn upon them; they not only lifted up their voice and wept, as loath to part, but they professed a resolution to adhere to her; (v. 10,) 'Surely we will return with thee unto thy people, and take our lot with thee.' It is a rare instance of affection to a mother-in-law, and an evidence that they had, for her sake, conceived a good opinion of the people of Israel. Even Orpah, who afterward went back, preferred it to her going over with her head to God, (v. 10,) and so went good ward with Naomi. The sad ceremony of parting, and the tears shed on that occasion, drew from her this protestation, but it did not hold. Strong passions, without a settled judgment, commonly produce weak resolutions.

4. Naomi sets herself to dissuade them from going along with her, v. 11-13. If she had had any sons in Canaan, or any near kinsmen, whom she could have expected to marry the widows, to raise up seed to them that were gone, and to redeem the mortgaged estate of the family, it might have been some encouragement to them to hope for a comfortable settlement at Beth-lehem. But she had no sons, nor could she think of any near kinsman, likely to do the kinsman's part, and therefore argues that she was never likely to have any sons to be husbands for them, for she was too old to have a husband; it became her age to think of dying and going out of the world, not of marrying and beginning the world again. Or, if she had a husband, she could not expect to have children, nor if she had sons, could she think that these young widows would stay unmarried, till her sons that should be yet born, would grow up to be marriageable. Yet this was not all, she could not only not propose to herself to marry them like themselves, but she knew not how to maintain them like themselves. The greater part of the poor condition, to which she was reduced, was, that she was not in a capacity to do for them as she would. It grieved me more for your sakes, than for my own, that the hand of the Lord is gone out against me. Observe, (1.) She judges herself chiefly amid at the aspect that God's quarrel was principally with her, "The hand of the Lord is gone out against me." I am the sinner, it is with me that God has a controversy, it is with me that he is contending, I take it to myself." This will become us when we are under affliction; though many others share in the trouble, yet we must hear the voice of the rod, as if it spoke only against us, and to us, not bilitating the rebukes of it on other people's houses, but as asking them to ourselves. (2.) She laments most the trouble that redounded to them from it.
She was the sinner, but they were the sufferers, It grieveth me much for your sakes. A gracious gencinous spirit can better bear its own burthen, than it can bear to see it a grievance to others, or others drawn any ways into trouble by it. Naomi could more easily want herself, than see her daughters-fortified from going, They that love thee, my daughters, for alas, I am in no capacity to do you any kindness."

But did Naomi do well, thus to discourage her daughters from going with her, when, by taking them with her, she might save them from the idolatry of Moab, and bring them to the faith and worship of the God of Israel? Naomi, no doubt desired to do that. But, [1.] If they did come with her, she would not have them to come upon her account, to take upon them a profession of religion, only in compliance to their relations, to oblige their friends, or for the sake of company, will be converts of small value and of short continuance. [2.] If they did come with her, she would have them to make it their deliberate choice, and to sit down first and count the cost, as it concerns these to do, that may take up a profession of religion. It is good for young women, especially for our Saints, when course with him who, in the heat of zeal, spoke that bold word, Master, I will follow thee whithersover thou goest; Come, come," says Christ, "canst thou fare as I fare? The Son of man has not where to lay his head; know that, and then consider whether thou canst find in thy heart to take thy lot with me," Matti.
8. 19, 20. Thus Naomi deals with her daughters-in-law. Thoughts promoted by the allurements by serious consideration, are likely to be kept always in the imagination of the heart; whereas what is soon ripe, is soon rotten.

5. Orpah was easily persuaded to yield to her own corrupt inclination, and to go back to her country, her kindred, and her father's house, now when she stood fair for an effectual call from it.
They both lifted up their voices and wept again, (v. 14.) being more affected with the tenderer side, then Naomi had said; but it had a different effect upon them; to Orpah it was a saviour of death unto death; the representation Naomi had made of the inconveniences they must count upon, if they went forward to Canaan, sent her back to the country of Moab, and served her as an excuse for her apostasy.
But, on the contrary, it strengthened Ruth's resolution, and her good affection to Naomi, with whose wisdom and goodness she was never so charmed, as she was upon this occasion; thus to her it was a saviour of life unto life. 1. Orpah kissed her mother-n-law; that is, took an affectionate leave of her, bid her farewell for ever, without any purpose to follow her hereafter as he that said he would follow Christ, when he had buried his father, or bidden them farewell that were at home. Orpah's kiss showed she had an affection for Naomi, more loving and tender towards her; yet she did not love her well enough to leave her country for her sake.
Thus, many have a value and affection for Christ, and yet come short of salvation by him, because they cannot find in their hearts to forsake other things for him. They love him, and yet leave him, because they do not love him enough, but love other things better. Thus the young man that went away from Christ, went away sorrowful, Matt. 19. 22.
But, (2.) Ruth clave unto her. Whether, when she came from home, she was resolved to go forward with her or no, does not appear; perhaps she was before determined what to do, out of a sincere affection to the God of Israel, and to his law, of which, by the good instructions of Naomi, she had some knowledge.

6. Naomi persuades Ruth to go back, urging, as a further inducement, her sister's example; v. 15, Thy sister-in-law is gone back to her people, and therefore of course gone back to her gods; for whatever she might have done while she lived with her mother-in-law, it would be next to impossible for her to show any respect to the God of Israel, when she went to live among the worshippers of Clemosh. Those that forsake the communion of saints, and return to the people of Moab, will certainly break off their communion with God, and embrace the idols of Moab. Now, return thou, after thy sister; that is, "If ever thou wilt return, return now.
This is the greatest trial of thy constancy; stand this trial, and thou art mine for ever." Such offences as that of Orpah's revolt, must needs come, that the example of her faith and constancy, may be made manifest, as Ruth was upon this occasion.

7. Ruth puts an end to the debate, by a most solemn profession of her immovable resolution never to forsake her, nor to return to her own country and her old relations again, v. 16, 17.
Nothing could be said more fine, more brave, than this; she seems to have had another spirit, and another speech, now that her sister was gone, and it is an instance of the purity of her heart, and the resolute choice of the better part. Draw me thus, and we will run after thee. Her mother's dissuasions make her the more resolute; as when Joshua said to the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord, they said it with the more vehemence, Nay, but we will.

1. She begs of her mother-in-law to say no more against her going, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return after thee; for all thy entreaties now cannot shake that resolution which thy instructions formerly have wrought in me; and therefore let me hear no more of them." Note, It is a great vexation and uneasiness to those that are resolved for God and religion, to be tempted and solicited to alter their resolution. They that would not think of it, would not hear of it. Entreat me not. The margin reads it, Ye are not against me. Note, It is a wretched thing to reckon those against us, and really our enemies, that would hinder us in our way to the heavenly Canaan. Our relations they may be, but they cannot be our friends, that would dissuade us from, and discourage us in the service of God, and the work of religion.

2. She is very particular in her resolution to leave to her, and never to forsake her; and she speaks the language of one resolved for God and heaven. She is so in love, not with her mother's beauty, or riches, or gaiety, (all those were withered and gone,) but with her wisdom, and virtue, and grace, which remained with her, even in her present poor and melancholy condition, that she resolves to cleave to her. [1.] She will travel with her;

I never saw, and which I have been trained up in love. Nor to be at home in the country of my mother; yet with thee every road shall be pleasant.
[2.] She will dwell with her; "Where thou though it be no better a lodging than Jacob had, when he had the stones for his pillow. Where thou settest up thy staff, I will set up mine, be it where it will be. (5.) She will twine interests with her, "They people shall be my people." From Naomi's character she concludes certainly, that that great nation was a wise and understanding people; she judges of them all by her good mother, who, whenever she went, was a credit to her country, (as all those should study to be, who profess relation to the better country, that is, the heavenly,) and therefore she will think herself happy if she may be numbered one of that. "Thy people shall be mine to associate with, or to be comfortable to, and to be concerned for." (4.) She will join in religion with her; thus she determined to be her's, usque ad aras—to the very altars, "Thy God shall be my God, and farewell to all the gods of Moab, which are vanity and a lie. I will adore the God of Israel, the only living and true God, trust in him alone, serve him, and in every thing be ruled by him; this is to be the Lord for ever." (5.) She will gladly die in the same bed, Where thou diest will I die: she takes it for granted they must both die, and that, in all probability, Naomi, as the elder, would die first, and resolves to continue in the same house, if it might be, till her days also were fulfilled; intimating likewise a desire to partake of her happiness in death; she wishes to die in the same place, in token of her dying after the same manner, and return to the God of Naomi, and let my last end be like hers. (6.) She will desire to be buried in the same grave, and to lay her bones by her's; There will I be buried; not desiring to have so much, as her dead body carried back to the country of Moab, in token of any remaining kindness for it; but Naomi and she having joined souls, she desires they may mingle dust, in her company, lying together, and being together for ever in the other world.

3. She backs her resolution to adhere to Naomi with a solemn oath; The Lord do so to me, and more also, (which was an ancient form of imprecation,) if ought but death part thee and me. An oath for confirmation was an end of this strife, and would leave a lasting obligation upon her, never to forsake that good way she was now making choice of. (1.) It is plain what Naomi desired; that she should separate between them, and for a time. She could promise to die, and be buried in the same place, but not at the same time; it might so happen, that she might die first, and that would part them. Note, Death parts those whom nothing else will part. A dying hour is a parting hour, and should be so thought of by us, and prepared for. (2.) It is resolved that nothing else should part them; not any kindness from her own people, nor any other influence, nor any zeal for the people among them; nor any unkindness from Israel, nor the fear of poverty and disgrace among them. "No, I will never leave thee." Now this is a pattern of a resolute convert to God and religion; thus must we be at a point. First, We must take the Lord for our God. "This God is my God for ever and ever:" I have avouched him for mine, and I will not go back again. Secondly, We must take his people for our people in all conditions; though they be a poor despised people, yet, if they be his, they must be our's. Thirdly, Having cast in our lot among them, we must be willing to take our lot with them, and to fare as they fare. We must submit to the same yoke, and draw in it faithfully; take up the same cross, and carry it cheerfully; go where God would have us to go, though it should be into humiliation, and to lodge where he would have us to lodge, though it be in a prison; die where he will have us to die, and lay our bones in the graves of the upright, who enter into peace, and rest in their beds, though they be but the graves of the common people. Fourthly, We must resolve to continue and persevere, and herein our adherence to Christ must be closer than that of Ruth to Naomi; she resolved that nothing but death should separate them; but we must resolve that death itself shall not separate us from our happiness in Christ, and then we may be sure that death itself shall not separate us from our happiness in Christ. Fifthly, We must bind our souls with a bond never to break these pious resolutions, and swear unto the Lord that we will cleave them. Fast bind, fast find. He that means honestly, does not start at assurances.

Lastly, Naomi was hereby silenced, r. 18. When she saw that Ruth was steadfastly minded to go with her, (which was the very thing she aimed at in all that she had said, to make her of a steadfast mind in going with her,) when she saw that she had gained her point, she was well satisfied, and left off speaking to her. She could desire nothing else than that solemn protestation which Ruth had just now made. See the power of resolution, how it puts temptation to silence. Those that are resolved, and go in religious ways without a steadfast mind, tempt the tempter, and stand like a door half open, which invites a thief; but resolution shuts and bolts the door, resists the Devil, and forces him to fly.

The Chaldee paraphrase thus relates the debate between Naomi and Ruth. Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee, for I will be a proselyte; Naomi said, We are commanded to keep sabbaths, and good days, on which we may not travel above a thousand cubits; (a sabbath-day's journey:) Well, says Ruth, whither thou goest, I will go. Naomi said, We are commanded not to tarry all night with Gentiles; Well, says Ruth, where thou lodgest, I will lodge. Naomi said, We are commanded to keep six hundred and thirteen sweatiefs; Well, says Ruth, whatever thy people keep, I will keep, for they shall be my people. Naomi said, We are forbidden to worship any strange god; Well, says Ruth, thy God shall be my God. Naomi said, We have four sorts of deaths for malefactors, stoning, burning, strangling, and slaying with the sword; Well, says Ruth, where thou diest, I will be buried, in the house of Sephukre; And there said, Ruth, will I be buried.

19. So they two went until they came to Beth-lehem. And it came to pass, when they were come to Beth-lehem, that all the city was moved about them; and they said, Is this Naomi? 20. And she said unto them, Call me not Naomi, call me Mara: for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. 21. I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me hither again empty: why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me? 22. So Naomi returned, and Ruth the Moabitess, her daughter-in-law, with her, which returned out of the country of Moab: and they came to Beth-lehem in the beginning of barley-harvest.

Naomi and Ruth, after many a weary step, (the fatigue of the journey, we may suppose, being somewhat relieved by the good instructions Naomi gave to her proselyte, and the good discourse they had together,) came at last to Beth-lehem. And they came very seasonably, in the beginning of the barley harvest, which was the first of their harvests, that of wheat following after. Now Naomi's own eyes might convince her of the truth of what she had heard. 2. How old acquaintance gathered about her, to inquire concerning her state, and to bid her welcome to Beth-lehem again. Or perhaps, they were moved about her, lest she should be a charge to the town, she looked so bare. By this it appears that she had formerly lived respectively, else there had not been so much notice taken of her. If those that have been in a high and prosperous condition, break, or fall into poverty or disgrace, their fall is the more remarkable, and they said, Is this Naomi? The woman of the city said it, for the word is feminine. They with whom she had formerly been intimate were surprised to see her in this condition; she was so much broken and altered with her afflictions, that they could scarcely believe their own eyes, or think that this was the same person whom they had formerly seen, so fresh and fair, and gay; Is this Naomi? So unlike is the rose, when it is withered, to the rose that was blooming. What a poor figure does Naomi make now, compared with what she made in her prosperity! If any asked this question in contempt, upbraiding her with her miseries, ("Is this she that could not be content to fare as her neighbours did, but must ramble to a strange country? See what she has got by it") their temper was very base and sordid: nothing more barbarous than to triumph over those that are fallen. But we suppose it was when it was asked, with compassion and commiseration; "Is this she that lived so plentifully, and kept so good a house, and was so charitable to the poor? How is the gold become dim?" They that had seen the magnificence of the first temple, wept, when they saw the meanness of the second; so these here. Note, Afflictions will make great and surprising changes in a little time. When we see how sickness and old age can change the fittest creature, we may think of what the Beth-lehemites said, Is this Naomi? One would not take it to be the same person. God, by his grace, fits us for all such changes, especially the great change!

II. Of the composure of Naomi's spirit. If some upbraided her with her poverty, she was not moved against them, as she would have been, if she had been poor and proud; but, with a great deal of pious patience, bore that, and all the melancholy effects of her affliction; (v. 20, 21.) Call me not Naomi, call me Mara, &c. Naomi signifies pleasant or amiable; but all my pleasant things are laid waste; call me Mara, bitter, or bitterness, for I am now a woman of a sorrowful spirit. Thus does she bring her mind to her condition, which we all ought to do, when our condition is not in every thing agreeable to us. And in this there is a pious and good reason; if we were emptied of; a good part which shall not be taken from those that have it. (2.) She acknowledges the hand of God, his mighty hand, in the affliction. "It is the Lord that has brought me home again empty; it is the Almighty that has afflicted me." Note, Nothing conduces more to a gracious soul under an affliction, than the consideration of the hand of God in it. It is the word, 1 Sam. 3. 18. Job 1. 21. Especially to consider, that he who afflicts us, is Shaddai, the Almighty, with whom it is folly to contend, and to whom it is our-duty and interest to submit. It is that name of God by which he enters into covenant with his people, I am God Almighty, God All-sufficient, Gen. 17. 1. He afflicts as a God in covenant, and his all-sufficiency may be our support and supply under all our afflictions. He that empowers us of the creature, knows how to fill us with himself. (3.) She speaks very feebly of the impression which the affliction had made upon her; He has dealt very bitterly with me. The cup of affliction is a bitter cup; and even that which afterward yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness, yet for the present, is not joyous, but grievous, Heb. 12. 11. Job complains, Thou writest bitter things against me, Job. 13. 26. (4.) She owns the affliction to come from God as a controversy; The Lord hath testified against me. Note, When God corrects us, he testifies against us, and contends with us, (Job 10. 17.) intimating that he is displeased with us. Every rod has a voice, the voice of a witness.

2. The composure of her spirit with this change. "Call me not Naomi, for I am no more pleasant, either to myself or to my friends, but call me Mara, a name more agreeable to my present state." Many that are debased and impoverished, yet affect to be called by the empty names and titles of honour they have formerly enjoyed. Naomi did not so; her humility regards not a glorious name in a dejected state; if God deal bitterly with her, she makes application to herself, and is willing to be called Mara, bitter. Note, It well becomes us to have our hearts humbled under humbling providence; one word spoken down to our comfort, and we are humbled down, and our spirits should be brought down with it. And then our troubles are sanctified to us, when we thus comport with them; for it is not an affliction in itself, but an affliction righteously borne, that does good. Perfidisti tota, si nondum miseris esse deditis!—So many calamities have been lost upon you, if you have not yet learned how to suffer. Sen. ad Helv. Tribulation works patience.

CHAP. II.

There is scarcely any chapter in all the sacred history, that supplies us so fully as this to the thoughts into which a person as Ruth, a poor Moabish widow, so mean an action as her gleaning corn in a neighbour's field, and the minute circumstances thereof. But all this was in order her being grafted into the line of Christ, and taken in among his ancestors, that she might be secure of the espousals of the Gentle church to Christ, Isa. 54. 1. And this makes the story remarkable; and many of the passagems of it are instructive, and very improving. Here 1. Ruth's humility and industry in gathering corn, Providence directing her to Boaz's field, v. 1. 9. II. The great favour which Boaz showed to her in many instances, v. 4. 16. III. The return of Ruth to her mother-in-law, v. 18. 22.

1. And Naomi had a kinsman of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth, of the family of Elimelech; and his name 213 And Ruth the Moabitess said unto Naomi, Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn after him in whose sight I shall find grace. And she said unto her, Go, my daughter. 3. And she went, and came, and gleaned in the field after the reapers: and her lap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech.

Naomi had now gained a settlement in Bethlehem among her old friends; and here we have an account.

I. Of her rich kinsman, Boaz, a mighty man of wealth, v. 1. The Chaldee reads it, mighty in the law; if he was both, it was a most rare and excellent conjuction, to be mighty in wealth, and mighty in the scriptures too; those that are so, are mighty indeed. He was grandson of Nahshon, that was prince of the tribe of Judah in the wilderness, and son of Salmon, probably a younger son, by Rahab, the harlot of Jericho; he carries might in his name, Boaz, in him is strength; and he was of the family of Elimelech, that family which was now reduced and brought so low. Observe, 1. Boaz, though a rich and a great man, had poor relations; every branch of the tree is not a top branch. Let not, therefore, the rich in this world be ashamed to own their kindred that are mean and despised, lest they be found therein proud, scornful, and unnatural. 2. Naomi, though a poor contemptible widow, had rich relations, whom yet she neither boasted of, nor was burthensome to, nor expected any thing from, when she was returning to Beth-lehem in distress. Those that have rich relations, while they themselves are poor, ought to know that it is the wise providence of God that makes the difference, (in which we ought to acquiesce,) and that to be proud of our relation to such, is a great sin, and to trust it, is great folly.

II. Of her poor daughter-in-law, Ruth. 1. Her condition was very low and poor; which was a great trial to the faith and constancy of a young proselyte. The Beth-lehemites had done well, if they had cited Naomi and her daughter-in-law first to one good house, and then to another; (it would have been a great support to an aged widow, and a great encouragement to a new convert;) but, instead of tasting the dainties of Canaan, they have no way of getting necessary food, but by gleaning corn; and otherwise, for ought that appears, they might have starved. Note, God has chosen the poor of this world; and poor they are like to be, for though God has chosen them, commonly men overlook them. 2. Her character, in this condition, was very good; v. 2. She said to Naomi, not, “Let me now go to the land of Moab again, for there is no living here; here there is want, but in my father's house there is bread enough;” no, she is not mindful of the country from which she came out, otherwise she had now a fair occasion to return; the God of Israel shall have God, and though he slay not, yet will she trust in him and never forsake him. But her request is, Let me go to the field and glean ears of corn. Those that are well born, and have been well brought up, know not what straits they may be reduced to, nor what mean employments they may be obliged to get their bread by, Lam. 4. 5. When the case is thus melancholy, let Ruth be remembered, who is a great example.

I. Of humility: when providence had made her poor, she did not say, “To glean, which is in effect to beg, I am ashamed;” but cheerfully stoops to the meanness of her circumstances, and accommodates herself to her lot. High spirits can more easily starve than stoop; Ruth was none of those. She does not tell her mother she was never brought up to live upon crumbs. Though she was not brought up to it, she is brought down to it, and is not easily at it. Nay, it is her own motion, not her mother's injunction; humility is one of the brightest ornaments of youth, and one of the best omens. Before Ruth's honour was this humility. Observe, how humbly she speaks of herself, in her expectation of leave to glean; “Let me glean after him, in whose sight I shall find grace.” She does not say, “I will go glean, and surely nobody will deny me the liberty;” but, “I will go glean, in the hope that somebody will allow me the liberty.” Note, Poor people must not demand kindness as a debt, but humbly ask it, and take it as a favour, though in ever so small a matter. It becomes the poor to use entreaties.

2. Of industry. She does not say to her mother-in-law, “Let me now go a visiting to the ladies of the town, or go a walking in the fields to take the air, and be merry, I cannot sit all day moping with you;” no, it is not sport, but business, that her heart is upon, “Let me go glean and glean ears of corn, and that will turn to some good account.” She was one of those virtuous women that love not to eat the bread of idleness; she loved to take pains. This is an example to all people, let the least be expected to play a part in the providence of the world, and let their hands find to do, do it with their might; a disposition to diligence bodes well, both for this world and the other. Love not sleep, love not sport, love not sauntering, but love business. It is also an example to poor people to work for their living, and not beg that which they are able to earn. We must not be shy of any honest employment, though it be mean, Job 19:21—22:14, which by some are thought to be a reproach. Sin is not so abominable, but we must not think anything else so at Providence calls us to.

3. Of regard to her mother; though she was but her mother-in-law, and though, being loosed by death from the law of her husband, she might easily suppose herself thereby loosed from the law of her husband's mother, yet she is dutifully observant of her. She will not go out without letting her know, as in the days of her husband, to ask permission. This is not hypocrisy, but common honesty; they ought to show to their parents and guardians; it is a part of the honour due to them. She did not say, “Mother, if you will go with me, I will go glean;” but, “Do you sit at home, and take your ease, and I will go abroad, and take pains.” Juniores ad Labores—Youth should work. Let young people take advice from the aged, but not put them upon toil.

4. Of dependence upon Providence; intimated in that, I will glean after him, in whose sight I shall find grace. She knows not which way to go, nor whom to inquire for, but will trust Providence to raise her up some friend or other that will be kind to her. Let us always keep up good thoughts of the Divine Providence, and believe, that while we do well, it will do well for us. Let us be careful to end it did well for Ruth; for when she went out alone, without guide or companion, to glean, her hap was to light on the field of Boaz, v. 3. To her it seemed casual, she knew not whose field it was, nor had she any reason for going to that more than any other, and therefore it is said to be her hap; but Providence directed her steps to this field. Note, God wisely orders small events; and those that seem altogether contingent, serve his own glory, and the good of his people. Many a great affair is brought about by a little turn, which seemed forfutitous to us, but was directed by Providence with design.

And, behold, Boaz came from Beth-
RUTH, II.

1. He had a servant that was set over the reapers, v. 6. In great families, it is requisite there should be one to oversee the rest of the servants, and appoint to each his portion, both of work and meat. Ministers are such servants in God's house, and it is requisite that they be both wise and faithful, and show their Lord all things, as he here, which is his own business not to do.

2. Yet he came himself to his reapers, to see how the work went forward, if he found any thing amiss, to rectify it, and to give further orders what should be done. This was both for his own interest, (he that wholly leaves his business to others, will have it done by halves; the master's eye makes a fat horse,) and it was also for the encouragement of his servants, who would go on the more cheerfully in their work, when their master countenanced them so far as to make them a visit. Masters that live at ease, should think with tenderness of those that toil for them, and bear the burthen and heat of the day.

3. Kind and pious salutations were interchanged between Boaz and his reapers. He said to them, The Lord be with you; and they replied, The Lord bless thee, v. 4. Hereby they expressed, (1.) Their esteem for one another, by addressing each other thus: the reapers one to another, the servants one to another, and their servants to him, as a good master. When he came to them, he did not fall a chiding them, as if he came only to find fault and exercise his authority, but he prayed for them; “The Lord be with you, prosper you, and give you health and strength, and preserve you from any disaster;” nor did they, as soon as ever he was out of hearing, fall a cursing him, as some ill-natured servants that hate their master, and think it a matter of course to return him his courtesy, and boisterously make the appearance of blessing, Lord bless thee, and make our labours serviceable to thy prosperity!” Things are likely to go on well in a house where there is such good-will as this between masters and servants. (2.) Their joint dependence upon the divine providence; they expressed their kindness to each other by praying one for another. They show not only their courtesy, but their piety, and an acknowledgment that all good things come from God, and are a dispensation of his grace. They therefore should value and desire above any thing else, both for ourselves and others. Let us from hence learn to use, [1.] Courteous salutations, as expressions of a sincere good-will to our friends. [2.] Pious ejaculations, lifting up our hearts to God for his favour, in such short prayers as these. Only, we must take heed that they do not degenerate into formality, lest in them we take the name of the Lord our God in vain; but if we be sincere in them, we may in them keep up our communion with God, and fetch in mercy and grace from him. It appears to have been the usual custom, thus to wish reapers good speed, Ps. 129. 7, 8.

4. He took an account from his reapers concerning a stranger he met with in the field, and gave necessary orders concerning her, that they should not touch her, v. 9, nor reproach her, v. 13. Masters must take care, not only that they do not hurt themselves, but that they suffer not their servants and those under them, to do hurt. He also ordered them to be kind to her, and let fall some of the handfuls on purpose for her; though it is fit that masters should restrain and rebuke their servants' wastefulness, yet they should not tie them up from being charitable, but give them allowance for that, with prudent directions.

II. Boaz was very kind to Ruth, and showed her a great deal of favour, induced to it by the account he had of her, and what he observed concerning
RUTH, II.

1. The steward gave to Boaz a very fair account of her, proper to recommend her to his favour, v. 6, 7. (1.) That she was a stranger, and therefore one of those that by the law of God were to gather the gleanings at the petitioner's request, Deut. 26. 10. 9. 10. She is the Moabitish damsel. (2.) That she was allied to his family; she came back with Naomi, the wife of Elimelech, a kinsman of Boaz. (3.) That she was a proselyte, for she came out of the country of Moab, to settle in the land of Israel. (4.) That she was very modest, and had not grieved till she had asked leave. (5.) That she was very industrious, and so far as may be, she continued to work even until now. And the poor, that are industrious and willing to take pains, are fit to be encouraged. Now, in the heat of the day, she tarried a little in the house or booth, that was set up in the field for shelter from the weather, to repose herself, and some suggest that it is probable she retired for her devotion. But she soon came back to her work, and, except that little intermission, kept close to it all the day. (6.) That she was willing to work with her own hands, or do that work which was neither menial nor base. Servants should be just in the characters and reports they give to their masters, and take heed they do not misrepresent any person, nor without cause discourage their masters' charity.

2. Boaz was hereupon extremely civil to her in divers instances. (1.) He ordered her to attend his reapers in every field they gathered in, and not to glean in another field, for she should not need to go, which would be a breach of rule; (2.) A place where else to mend herself. (2.) He charged all his servants to be very tender of her, and respectful to her, who, no doubt, would be so to one whom they saw their master kind to. She was a stranger, and, it is probable, her language, dress, and mien, differed much from theirs; but he charged them that they should not in any thing affront her, or be abusive to her, (3.) that his servants are too apt to be to strangers. (3.) He bid her welcome to the entertainment he had provided for his servants. He ordered her, not only to drink of the water which was drawn for them, (for that seems to be the liquor he means, v. 9.) drawn from the famous well of Beth-lehem, which was by the gate, the water of which David longed for, 2 Sam. 21. 13.) but at meat-time to eat from of them, and, so he did to her, Thou hast comforted me, for that thou hast spoken friendly to me. These that are great, and in high places, know not how much good they may do to their inferiors with a kind look, or by speaking friendly to them; and so small an expense, one would think, they should not grudge, when it shall be put upon the score of their charity. (4.) When Boaz gave her her dinner with his reapers, she ate so much that it was not wholly sufficient her, and left the rest; and immediately rose up to glean, v. 14. 15. She did not, under pretence either of her want, or of her labour, eat more than was convenient for her, nor so much as to unfit her for work in the afternoon: temperance is a friend to industry; and we must eat and drink to strengthen us for business, and not to indispose us to it.

17. So she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out what she had gleaned: and it was about an ephah of barley. 18. And she took it up, and went into the city; and her mother-in-law saw what she had gleaned: and she brought forth, and gave to her... that she had reserved after she was sufficed. 19. And her mother-in-law said unto her, Where hast thou gleaned to-day? and where wroughtest thou? blessed be he that did take knowledge of thee. And she showed her mother-in-law with whom she had wrought, and said, The man's name with whom I wrought to-day is Boaz. 20. And Naomi said unto her daughter-in-law, Blessed be he of the Lord, who hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. And Naomi said unto her, The man is near of kin unto us, one of our next kinsmen. 21. And Ruth the Moabitess said, He said unto me also, Thou shalt keep fast by my young men, until they have ended all my harvest. 22. And Naomi said unto Ruth her daughter-in-law, It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens, that they meet thee not in any other field. 23. So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz to glean unto the end of barley-harvest, and of wheat-harvest; and dwelt with her mother-in-law.

Here,

I. Ruth finishes her day's work, v. 17. 1. She took care not to lose time, for she gleaned until even. We must not be weary of well-doing, because in due season we shall reap. She did not make an excuse to sit still, or go home, till the evening; let us work the works of him that sent us, while it is day. She scarcely used, much less did she abuse, the kind means that were for her; for though he commanded his servants to leave handfuls for her, she continued to glean the scattered ears. 2. She took care not to lose what she had gathered, but threshed it herself, that she might the more easily carry it home, and might have it ready for use. The slothful man roseth not that which he took in hunting, and so loseseth the benefit of it; but the substance of a diligent man is precious, Prov. 12. 11. Ruth had gathered it ear by ear, but when she had put it all together, it was an ephah of barley, about four pecks. Many a little makes a great deal. It is an encouragement to industry, that in all labour, even that of gathering, there is profit; but the talk of the lips tendeth only to penury. When she had got her corn into as little compass as she could, she took it up herself, and carried it into the city; though, had she asked them, it is likely some of Boaz's harvestmen would have done that for her. We should study to be as little as possible troublesome to those that are kind to us. She did not think it either too hard or too mean a service, to carry her corn herself into the city, but was rather pleased with what she had gotten by her own industry, and careful to secure it; and let us thus take care that we lose not those things which we have wrought, which were gained, 2 John 8.

II. She paid her respects to her mother-in-law; went straight home to her, and did not go to converse with Boaz' servants; showed her what she had gleaned, that she might see she had not been idle. 1. She entertained her with what she had left of the good dinner Boaz had given her. She gave to her that she had reserved, after she was sufficed, v. 18. which refers to v. 14. If she had any thing better than another, her mother should have part with her. Thus, having showed industry abroad, she showed piety at home; so children's maintaining of their parents is called, (1 Tim. 5. 4.) and it is part of their honour due to them by the fifth commandment, Matt. 15. 6. 2. She gave her an account of her day's work, and how a kind providence had favoured her in it, which made it very comfortable to her; for the gleanings that a righteous man hath, are better than the harvests of many wicked, Ps. 37. 16. (1.) Naomi asked her where she had been: Where hast thou gleaned to-day? Note, Parents should take care to inquire into the ways of their children, how, and where, and in what company they spend their time. This may prevent many extravagancies which children, left to themselves, run into, by which they bring both themselves and their parents to shame. If we are not our brethren's, yet surely we are our children's keepers: and we know what a son Adonijah proved, that never had been childen. Parents should examine their children, not to frighten or discourage them, so as to make them hate home, or tempt them not to tell a lie, but to commend them if they have done well, and with mildness to reprove and caution them if they have done otherwise. It is a good question for us to ask ourselves in the close of every day, "Where have I gleaned to-day? What improvements have I made in knowledge and grace? What have I done or gotten, that will turn to a good account?"

(2.) Ruth gave her a particular account of the kindness she had received from Boaz, (v. 19.) and the hopes she had of further kindness from him, he having ordered her to attend his servants throughout all the harvest, v. 21. Note, Children should look upon themselves as accountable to their parents and to those that are over them, and not to think it a disparagement to them to be examined; and to them to make it a matter which is good, and they shall have praise of the same. Ruth told her mother what kindness Boaz had showed her, that she might take some occasion or another to acknowledge it, and return him thanks; but she did not tell her how Boaz had commended her, v. 11. Humility teaches us, not only not to praise ourselves, but not to be forward to publish others' praises of us.

(3.) We are here told what Naomi said to it. She prayed particularly for him that had been her daughter's benefactor, even before she knew who it was; (v. 19.) Blessed be he, whoever he was, that did take knowledge of thee; shooting the arrow of prayer at a venture. But more particularly, when she was told who it was; v. 20, Blessed be he of the Lord. Note, The poor must pray for those that are kind and liberal to them, and thus requite them, when they are not capable of making them return it to others, as Prov. 17. 13. Let us pray for those that refresh them, Job 29. 13. 31. 20. And he that hears the cries of the poor against their oppressors, (Exod. 22. 27.) it may be hoped, will hear the prayers of the poor for their benefactors. She now remembered the former kindnesses Boaz had showed to her husband and sons, and joins those to this, he has not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. If we be the dead, let us show kindness even to those that seem to have forgotten our former favours, perhaps it may help to revive the remembrance, even of those which seem buried.

[2.] She acquainted Ruth with the relation their family was in to Boaz; The man is near of kin to us. It should seem she had been so long in Moab, that she had forgotten her kindred in the land of Moab, till by this providence God brought it to her mind. At least, she had not told Ruth of it, though it might have been some encouragement to a young proselyte. Unlike to humble Naomi, are many, who, though fallen into decay themselves, are continually beasting upon their great relations. Nay, observe the chain of thought here, and in it a chain of providences, bringing about what was designed concerning Ruth. Ruth names Boaz as one that had been kind to her; Naomi bethinks herself that she should be, and presently recalls herself; "The man is near of kin to us; now that I hear his name, I remember him very well." This thought brings her another to our mind; our God, that has the right to redeem our estate that was mortgaged, and therefore from him we may expect further kindness. That is the likeliest man in all Beth-lehem to set us up." Thus God brings things to our mind, sometimes of a sudden, that prove to have a wonderful tendency to our good.

3. She appointed Ruth to continue her attendance in the fields of Boaz; (v. 22.) "Let them not mert thee in any other field, for that will be construed a contempt of his courtesy." Our blessed Saviour is our _Goel_; it is he that has a right to redeem: if we expect to receive benefit by him, let us closely adhere to him, and his fields and his family; let us not go to the world and its fields for that which is to be had with him only, and which he has encouraged us to expect from him. Has the Lord dealt thus with us? Let us not be found in any other field, nor seek for happiness and satisfaction in the creature. Tradesmen take it ill, that those are in their books, go to another shop. We lose divine favours, if we slight them. Some think Naomi gave her daughter-in-law a tacit rebuke; she had spoken (v. 21.) of keeping fast by the young men; "Nay," said Naomi, (v. 22.) *"It is good that thou shutt shutt the young men out, as fishes are finer for them than the young men." But they are too critical: Ruth spake of the young men, because they were the principal labourers, and to them Boaz had given directions concerning her; and Naomi takes it for granted, while she attended the young men, her society would be with the maidens, as was fit.

Ruth dutifully obeyed her mother's directions; she continued to glean to the end, not only of the barley-harvest, but of the wheat-harvest, which followed it, that she might gather food in harvest to serve for winter, Prov. 6. 6-8. She also kept fast by the maidens of Boaz, with whom she afterward cultivated an acquaintance, which might do her service, v. 23. But she constantly came to her mother at night in due time, as became a virtuous woman, that was for working-days, and not for merry nights. And when the harvest was ended, (v. 21.) Bishop Patrick expounds it,) she did not gad abroad, but kept her aged mother company at home. Dinah went out to see the daughters of the land, and we know what a disgrace her vanity ended in; Ruth kept at home, and helped to maintain her mother, and went out on no other errand than to get provision for her; and we shall find afterward what preferment her humility and industry ended in.

Seest thou a woman diligent in her business? Honour is before him.

CHAP. III.

We found it very easy, in the former chapter, to applaud the decency of Ruth's behaviour, aní, to show what good use we may make of the account given us of it; but, in this chapter, we shall have much ado to vindicate it from the imputation of indecency, and to save it from having an ill use made of it; but the goodness of those times was such, as saves what is recorded here from being ill done, and yet the badness of these times is such, that it will not justify any now in doing the like. Here is, I. The direction Naomi gave to her daughter-in-law, how to claim Boaz for her husband, v. 1...5. II. Ruth's punctual observance of these directions, v. 6. 7. III. The kind and honourable treatment Boaz gave her, v. 8. 15. IV. Her return to her mother-in-law, v. 16. 18.

1. THEN Naomi her mother-in-law said unto her, My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee? 2. And now is not Boaz of our kindred, with whose maidens thou wast? behold, he winnoweth barley to-night in the threshing-floor. 3. Wash thyself, therefore, and anoint thee, and put thy raiment upon thee, and get thee down to the floor: _but_ make not thyself known unto the man, until he shall have done eating and drinking. 4. And it shall be, when he hath set down, thou shalt mark the place where he shall lie, and thou shalt go in, and uncover his feet, and lay thee down; and he will tell thee what thou shalt do. 5. And she said unto her, All that thou sayest unto me I will do.

1. Naomi's care for her daughter's comfort, is, without doubt, very commendable, and is recorded for imitation. She had no thoughts of marrying herself, ch. 1. 12. But though she was old, had resolved upon a perpetual widowhood, yet she was far from the thoughts of confining her daughter-in-law to it, that was young. Age must not make itself a standard to youth. On the contrary, she is full of the conveniences to get her daughter well rid. Her wisdom projected that for her daughter, which her daughter's modesty forbade her to project for herself, v. 1. This she did, 1. In justice to the dead, to raise up seed to them that were gone, and to preserve the family from being extinct. 2. In kindness and gratitude to her daughter-in-law, who had conducted herself very dutifully and respectfully to her. "My daughter, this is her father-in-law looking upon her in all respects as her own," _shall I not seek rest for thee_, that is, *"a settlement in the married state; shall I not get thee a good husband, that it may be well with thee," that is, _that thou mayest live pleasantly and pleasantly, and not spend all thy days in the mean and melancholy condition we now live in?_ Note, (1.) A married state is, or should be, a state of rest to young people; wandering affections are then fixed, and the heart must be at rest: it is at rest in the house of a husband, and in his heart, ch. 1. 9. Those are giddily indeed, that marriage does not compose. (2.) That which should be desired and designed by those that enter into a marriage state, is, _that it may be well with them_; in order to which, it is necessary that they chuse well; otherwise, instead of being a rest to them, it may prove the greatest uneasiness. Parents, in disposing of their children, must have, in their eye, _that it may be well with them_. And be it always remembered, _That it is best for us, which is best for our souls_. (2.) It is the duty of parents to seek this rest for their children, and to do all that is fit for them to do, in due time, in order to it. And the more dutiful and respectful they are to them, though they can the worse spare them, yet they should the rather prefer them, and the better. II. The kindness and care of this young woman, in order to her daughter's preferment, was very extraordinary, and looks suspicious. If there was anything improper in it, the fault must lie upon Naomi, who put her daughter upon it, and who knew, or should know, the laws and usages of Israel better than Ruth. 1. It was true, that Boaz, being near of kin to the deceased, and (for aught that Naomi knew to the contrary) the nearest of all now alive, was obliged by the divine law to marry the widow of Mahlon, who was the eldest son of Elimelech, and was dead without issue, v. 2. "Is not Boaz of our kindred, and therefore bound in conscience to take care of our affairs? Why should we not remind him of his duty? This may encourage us to lay ourselves by faith at the feet of Christ, that he is our near kinsman, having taken our nature upon him, he is bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. 2. It was a convenient time to remind him of it, now that he had got so much acquaintance with Ruth, by her constant attendance upon his reapers during the whole harvest, which was now ended; and he also, by the kindness he had shewed to Ruth in lesser matters, had encouraged Naomi to hope that he would not be unkind, much less unjust, in that greater. And she thought it was a good opportunity to apply to him, when he made a winnowing-feast at his threshing-floor, (v. 2.) then and there completing the joy of the harvest, and treating his workmen like a kind master; He winnoweth barley to-night, that is, he makes his entertainment tonight; as Nabul and Absalom had feasts at their sheep-shearing, so Boaz at his winnowing. 3. Naomi therefore orders her daughter-in-law to make herself clean and neat, not to make herself fine; (v. 3.) "Wash thyself and anoint thee, not paint thee, (as Jezebel,) put on thy raiment, but not the attire of the harlot, and go down to the floor, for he is probably the most kind person to herself; and perhaps it was the usage in that country, that in this case the woman should make the demand, so much is intimated by the law, (Deut. 25.) 7. 9. Naomi therefore orders her daughter-in-law to make herself clean and neat, not to make herself fine; (v. 3.) "Wash thyself and anoint thee, not paint thee, (as Jezebel,) put on thy raiment, but not the attire of the harlot, and go down to the floor, for he is probably the most kind person to herself; and perhaps it was the usage in that country, that in this case the woman should make the demand, so much is intimated by the law, (Deut. 25.) 7. 9. Naomi therefore orders her daughter-in-law to make herself clean and neat, not to make herself fine; (v. 3.) "Wash thyself and anoint thee, not paint thee, (as Jezebel,) put on thy raiment, but not the attire of the harlot, and go down to the floor, for he is probably the most kind person to herself; and perhaps it was the usage in that country, that in this case the woman should make the demand, so much is intimated by the law, (Deut. 25.) 7. 9.
servants with extraordinary entertainments, and, for their encouragement, did eat and drink with them. It well becomes those that are rich and great, to be generous to, and also to be familiar with, those that are under them, and employed for them. 3. When Boaz had supped with his workmen, and been a while pleasant with them, he went to bed in due time, so early, that by midnight he had his first sleep, (v. 8.) and thus he would be fit for his morning work. But on the next day, it would not, from this instance, entice the least suspicion of his character, or seem to do so; perhaps blaming himself that he had not offered the service of a kinsman to these distressed widows, and saved her this trouble, and ready to say as Judah concerning his daughter-in-law, She is more righteous than I.

Note, (1.) He commended her, spoke kindly to her, called her by her name, and spoke honourably of her, as a woman of great virtue. She had showed in this instance more kindness to her mother-in-law, and to the family into which she had matched, than in any instance yet. It was very kind to leave her own country, and come along with her mother to the land of Israel, to dwell with her, and help to maintain her; for this he had high comfort (ch. 4. 11.) but not he says, Thou hast showed more kindness in the latter end, than at the beginning. (v. 10.) in that she consulted not her own fancy, but her husband's family, in marrying again. She received not the addresses of young men (much less did she seek them) whether poor or rich, but was willing to marry as the law directed, though it was to an old man, because it was from the honour and interest of the family into which she had matched, and the possession of an entire kindness. Young people must aim, in disposing of themselves, not so much to please their own eye, as to please God and their parents.

(2.) He promised her marriage; (v. 11.) "Fear not that I will slight thee, or expose thee; no, I will do all that thou requir'st, for it is the same that the law requires, from the next of kin, and I have no reason to deny it, for all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman." V. 11.

Note, (1.) Exemplary virtue ought to have its due praise, (Phil. 4. 8.) and it will recommend both men and women to the esteem of the wisest and best. Ruth was a poor woman, and poverty often obscures the lustre of virtue: yet Ruth's virtues, even in a mean condition, were generally taken notice of, and could not be hid; nay, her virtues took away the reproach of her poverty; if poor people be but good people, they shall be known not from God and man. Ruth had been remarkable for her humility, which paved the way to this honour; the less she proclaimed her own goodness, the more did her neighbours take notice of it. (2.) In the choice of yoke-fellows, virtue should especially be regard'd, known approved virtue; let religion determine the choice, and it will certainly crown the choice and make it most valuable: it is better than gold, and when it is said to be good with an inheritance, the meaning is, that an inheritance is worth little without it.

III. The good acceptance Ruth gained with Boaz. What she did, had no ill effect, either one way or other, so that Naomi was not mistaken in her good opinion of her kinsman. He knew her demand was just and honourable, and treated her accordingly, and did not deal with his sister as with a harlot, Gen. 34. 31. For, 1. He did not offer to violate her chastity, though he had all the opportunity that could be for it. The Chaldee paraphrase thus descants upon it, He subdued his concupiscence, and did not approach to her, but did as Joseph the Just, who would not come near to his Egyptian mistress, and as Phallath the Pious, who, when Saul had given him Michal, David's wife, (1 Sam. 25. 44.) put a sword between himself and her, that he might not touch her. Boaz knew it was not any sinful lust that brought her thither, and therefore bravely maintained both his own honour and her's. 2. He did not put any ill construction upon what she did, did not reproach her as an impudent woman, and unfit to make an honest man a wife; she having approved herself well in the facts, and all her conduct having been modest and discreet; he would not, from this instance, entertain the least suspicion of her character, or seem to do so; perhaps blaming himself that he had not offered the service of a kinsman to these distressed widows, and saved her this trouble, and ready to say as Judah concerning his daughter-in-law, She is more righteous than I. promise he backs with a solemn oath, for it was a conditional contract of marriage; (v. 13.) As the Lord liveth. Thus keeping the matter in suspense, he bade her wait till morning. Bishop Hall thus sums up this matter in his Contemplations.

"Boaz, instead of touching her as a wanton, blessed her as a father, encourageth her as a friend, promised her as a kinsman, rewards her as a patron, and sends her away laden with hopes and gifts, no less chaste, more happy, than she came. O admirable temperance, worthy the progenitor of Him in whose lips and heart there was no guile!"

14. And she lay at his feet until the morning; and she rose up before one could know another. And he said, Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor. 15. Also he said, Bring the vail that thou hast upon thee, and hold it. And when she held it, he measured six measures of barley, and laid it on her: and she went into the city. 16. And when she came to her mother-in-law, she said, Who art thou, my daughter? And she told her all that the man had done to her. 17. And she said, These six measures of barley gave he me; for he said to me, Go not empty unto thy mother-in-law. 18. Then said she, Sit still my daughter, until thou know how the matter will fall: for the man will not be in rest, until he have finished the thing this day.

We are here told,

1. How Ruth was dismissed by Boaz. It had not been safe for her to go home in the dead of the night, therefore she lay at his feet (not by his side) until morning; but as soon as ever the day broke, that she had light to go home by, she got away, before one could know another, that if she were seen, yet she might not be known to be abroad so unseasonably. She was not shy of being known to be a gleaner in the field, nor ashamed of that mark of her poverty, lest it should be known to be a night-walker, for her virtue was a greater est honour, and that which she most valued.

Boaz dismissed her. 1. With a charge to keep counsel; (v. 14.) Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor, and lay all night so near to Boaz; not that they needed to care much what people said of them, while they were both conscious to themselves of an unsullied purity, but because few could come so near the fire as they did, and not have been scorched. Had it been known, it would have occasioned suspicions in some, and reflections from others; good people would have been troubled, and bad people would have triumphed, and therefore let it not be known. Note: We must always take care, not only to keep a good conscience but to keep a good name: either we must not do that, which, though innocent, is liable to be misinterpreted, or if we do, we must not let it be known. We must avoid not only sin, but scandal. There was likewise a particular reason for concealment here; if this matter should take wind, it might prejudice the freedom of the other kinsman's choice, and he would make this his reason for refusing Ruth, that Boaz and she had been together. 2. He dismissed her with a good present of corn, which would be very acceptable to her poor mother at home, and an evidence for her, that he had not sent her away in dislike, which Naomi might have suspected, if he had sent her away empty. He gave it her in her vail, or apron, or mantle; gave it her by measure; like a prudent corn master, he kept an account of all he delivered out; it was six measures, that is, six omers, as is supposed, or six of his measure. If this number of measure was, it is probable that he gave her as much as she could well carry, v. 15. And the Chaldee says, Strength was given her from the Lord to carry it; and add that now it was told her by the spirit of prophecy, That from her should descend six of the most righteous men of their age, namely, David, Daniel, his three companions, and the King Messiah.

II. How she was welcomed by her mother-in-law. She wished her, "Who art thou, my daughter? Art thou a bride or no? Must I give thee joy?" So Ruth told her how the matter stood, v. 16, 17. Whereupon her mother, 1. Advised her to be satisfied in what was done; Sit still, my daughter, till thou know how the matter will fall, v. 18. How is decreed in heaven, so the Chaldee reads it, for marriages are made there. She had done all that was fit for her to do, and now she must patiently wait the issue, and not be perplexed about it. Let us learn hence to cast our care upon providence, to follow that and attend the motions of it, composing ourselves into an expectation of the event, with a resolution to acquiesce in it, whatever it be; sometimes that proves best done for us, that is least our own doing: "Sit still therefore, and see how the matter will fall, and say, Let it fall how it will, I am ready for it." 2. She advised her that Boaz, having undertaken this matter, would approve himself a faithful careful friend; He will not be at rest, till he have finished the matter. Though it was a busy time with him in the fields and the floor, yet having undertaken to serve his friend, he would not neglect the business. Naomi believes Ruth has won his heart, and therefore he will not be easy till he knows whether she be his or no. This she gives as a reason why Ruth should sit still and not comp lex herself about it, that Boaz had undertaken it, and he would be sure to manage it well. Much more reason have good Christians to be careful for nothing, but cast their care on God, because he has promised to care for them; and what need have we to care, if he do? "Sit still and we will suggest this matter will fail, for the Lord will perfect that which concerns thee, and will make it to work for good to thee." Ps. 37. 5, 6. 138. 8. Your strength is to sit still. Isa. 30. 7.

CHAP. IV.

In this chapter, we have the wedding between Boaz and Ruth, in the circumstances of which there was something uncommon, which is kept upon record, for the illustration, not only of the law concerning the marrying of a brother's widow, (Deut. 25. 5) &c. for cases help to explain laws, but of the gospel too, for from this marriage descended David, and the Son of David, whose eoussals to the Gentile church were hereby typified. We are here told, 1. How Boaz got clear of his rival, and left Ruth to her mother-in-law. 2. How for this, Ruth was publicly solemnized, and attended with the good wishes of his neighbours, v. 9. 12. III. The happy issue that descended from this marriage. Obed, the grandfather of David, v. 10. And with the accounts of Obed's posterity, 18. 22. Perhaps it was to oblige him, that the blessed Spirit directed the inserting of this story into the sacred canon, he being desirous that the virtues of his great-grandmother, Ruth, together with her Gentile extraction, might be extended to posterity, and the singular providence that attended her.

1. THEN went Boaz up to the gate, and sat him down there; and, behold, the kinsman of Naomi, Boaz spake, came by: unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here. And he
1. Boaz calls a court immediately. It is probable he was himself one of the elders (or aldermen) of the city, for he was a mighty man of wealth; perhaps he was father of the city, and sat chief, for he seems here to have gone up to the gate, as one having authority, and not as a common person; like Job, ch. 29. 7, &c. We cannot suppose him less than a magistrate in his city, who was grandson to Nahshon, prince of Judah; and his lying at the end of a heap of corn in the threshing-floor the night before, was not at all inconsistent, in those days of plainness, with the honour of his sitting judge in the gate. But why was Boaz so hasty, why so fond of the match? Ruth was not rich, but lived upon alms; not honourable, but a poor stranger; she was never said to be beautiful; if ever she had been so, we may suppose that weeping, and travelling, and grieving, had withered her lilies and roses. But that which made Boaz in love with her, and solicitous to expedite the affair, was, that all her neighbours agreed she was a virtuous woman; this set her price with him far above rubies, Prov. 31. 10. And therefore, he thinks, if, by marrying her, he might do her a real kindness, he should also do himself a very great kindness; he will therefore bring it to a conclusion immediately. It was not court-day, but he got ten men of the elders of the city to meet him in the town-hall over the gate, where public business used to be transacted, v. 2. So many, it is probable, by the custom of the city, made a full court. Boaz, though a judge, would not be a judge in his own cause, but desired the concurrence of other elders. Honest intentions dread not a public cognizance.

2. He summons his rival to come and hear the matter that was to be proposed to him; (v. 1.) "Ho, such a one, sit down here." He called him by his name, no doubt, but the divine historian thought not fit to record it, for because he refused to raise up the name of the dead, he deserved not to have his name preserved to his descendants in history. Providence favoured Boaz in ordering it so, that this kinsman should come by thus opportunely, just when the matter was ready to be proposed to him. Great affairs are sometimes much furthered by small circumstances which facilitate and expedite them.

3. He proposes to the other kinsman the redemption of Naomi's land, which, it is probable, had been mortgaged for money to buy bread, and the famine was in the land; (v. 3.) "Naomi has a parcel of land to sell, namely the equity of the redemption of it out of the hands of the mortgagee, which she is willing to part with;" or, as some think, it was her jointure for life, and wanting money, for a small matter she would sell her interest to the heir in law, who was the fittest to be a purchaser. This he gives the kinsman legal notice of, (v. 4.) that he might have the refusal of it. Whoever had it must pay for it, and Boaz might have said, "My money is as good as my kinsman's; if I have a mind to it, why may I not buy it privately, since I had the first proffer of it, and say nothing to my kinsman?" No; Boaz, though fond enough of the purchase, would not do so mean a thing, as to take a bargain over another man's head, that was near unto to it; and the terms are not to be only just and honest, but fair and honourable, in all our dealings, and to do nothing which we are unwilling should see the light, but be above-board.

4. The kinsman seemed forward to redeem the land, till he was told, that if he did that, he must marry the widow, and then he flew off. He liked the land well enough, and, probably, caught at that for more greedily, because he hoped that the poor widow being his brother's wife, if she married it, might have so much the better bargain; "I will redeem it" (said he) "with all my heart;" thinking it would be a fine addition to his estate, v. 4. But Boaz told him there was a young widow in the case, and if he have the land, he must take her with it, Terra transit cum onere.—The estate passes with this incumbrance; either the divine law or the usage of the country, would oblige him to it, or Naomi insisted upon it that she should not be left to beg. Boaz was upon this condition, v. 5. Some think this does not relate to that law of marrying the brother's widow, (for that seems to oblige only the children of the same father, (Deut. 25. 5.) unless by custom it was afterward made to extend to the next of kin,) but it refers to the law of redemption of inheritances (Lev. 25. 24, 25.) for it is a Goel, a redeemer, that were inquired for; and if so, it was not by the law, but by Naomi's own resolution, that the purchaser was to marry the widow. However it was, this kinsman, when he heard the conditions of the bargain, refused it; (v. 6.) "I cannot redeem it for myself, I will not meddle with it upon these terms, lest I mar my own inheritance;" the land, he thought, would be an improvement of his inheritance, but not the land with the woman, that would mar it. Perhaps he thought it would be a disparagement to him to marry such a poor widow that, was come from a strange country, and almost lived upon alms; he fancied it would be a blemish to his family, it would mar his blood, and disgrace his posterity; her eminent virtues were not sufficient in his eye to balance this. The Chaldee paraphrase makes his reason for this refusal to be, that he had another wife, and if he should take Ruth, it was not occasion of grief and contention in his family, and that would mar the comfort of his inheritance. Or, he thought she might bring him a great many children, and they would all expect shares out of his estate, which would scatter it into too many hands, so that his family would make the less figure. This makes many shy of the great redemption, they are not willing to espouse religion; they have heard well of it, and have nothing to say against it; they will give it their good word, but at the same time they will give their good word with it, they are willing to part with it, and cannot be bound for it, for fear of injuring their own inheritance in this world. Heaven they could be saved, but he does they can dispense with; it will not agree with the lusts they have already espoused, and therefore let who will purchase heaven at that rate, they cannot.

5. The right of redemption is fairly resigned to Boaz; if this nameless kinsman lost a good bargain, a good estate, and a good wife too, he may think himself for not considering it better, and Boaz will think himself doing his way clear to that which he valued and desired above anything. In those ancient times it was not the usage to pass estates by writings, as afterwards, (Jer. 32. 10, &c.) but by some sign or ceremony, as with us by livery and seisin, as we commonly call it; that is, the delivery of seisin, seisin of a house by giving the key, of land by giving turf and a twig. The ceremony here used, was, he that surrendered, plucked off his shoe, (1st Chaldee says, it was the glove of his right hand,) and gave it to him who was to receive it. He did this, surrender, intimating thereby, that whatever right he had to tread or go upon the land, he conveyed and transferred it, upon a valuable consideration, to the purchaser; this was a testimony in Israel; v. 7. And it was done in this case, v. 8. If this kinsman was obliged by the law to have married Ruth, and his refusal had been a contempt of that law, Ruth must have plucked off his shoe, and slept in his face. Deut. 25. 9. But though this relation should in some measure oblige him to the duty, yet the distance of his relation might serve to excuse him from the penalty, or Ruth might very well dispense with it, since his refusal was all she desired from him. But Bishop Patrick, and the best interpreters, think this had no relation to that law, and that the drawing off of the shoe was not any disgrace, as there, but a confirmation of the surrender, and an evidence that it was not fraudulently or surreptitiously obtained. Note, Fair and open dealing in all matters of contract and commerce, is what all those must make conscience of, that would approve themselves Israelites indeed, without guile. How much more honourably and honestly does Boaz come by this purchase, than if he had secretly underminded his kinsman, and privately struck up a bargain with Naomi, unknown to him. Honesty will be found the best policy.

9. And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. 10. Moreover, Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day. 11. And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses. The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthy in Ephratah, and be famous in Beth-lehem.

12. And let thy house be like the house of Pharez, (whom Tamar bare unto Judah,) of the seed which the Lord shall give thee of this young woman.

Boaz now sees his way clear, and therefore delays not to perform his promise made to Ruth, that he would do the kinsman's part, but, in the gate of his city, before the elders and all the people, publishes a marriage contract between himself and Ruth the Moabitess, and therewith the purchase of all the estate that belonged to the family of Elimelech. If he had not been (ch. 2. 1.) a mighty man of wealth, he could not have compassed his return with such ceremony, and have done this service to his kinsman's family. What is a great estate for God, even in this world, it enables a man to do much the more good in his generation, and especially to those of his own household, if lie have but a heart to use it so?

Now concerning this marriage, it appears, I. That it was solemnised, or at least published, before many witnesses; (v. 9, 10.) Ye are witnesses, I. "That I have bought the estate; who soever is a part of it, mortgaged to them, let him come to me and shew his name, family, and agree to the value of the land," which was computed by the number of years to the year of jubilee, (Lev. 25. 15.) when it would have returned of course to Elimelech's family. The more public the sales of estates are, the better they are guarded against frauds. 2. "That I have purchased the widow to be my wife;" he had no portion with her; what might have been had, was incumbered, and he could not leave it without full recompense. If she were worth, and therefore he might well say, he purchased her, and yet being a virtuous woman, he reckoned he had a good bargain. House and riches are the inheritance of fathers, but a prudent wife is more valuable, is from the Lord as a special gift. He designed, in marrying her, to preserve the memory of the dead, that the name of Mahlon, though he left no son to heir it up, might not be cut off from the gate of his place, Deut. 25. 9. by thine impiety might be preserved, that it should be inserted in the public register, that Boaz married Ruth the widow of Mahlon, the son of Elimelech, which posterity, whenever they had occasion to consult the register, would take particular notice of. And this history being preserved for the sake of that marriage and the issue of it, that proved an effectual means to perpetuate the name, and to carry it far beyond the thought or intention of Boaz, to the world's end. And observe that because Boaz did this honour to the dead, as well as this kindness to the living, God did him the honour to bring him into the genealogy of the Messiah, by which his family was dignified above all the families in Israel; while the other kinsman, that was so much afraid of diminishing himself, and marring his inheritance, by marrying the widow, has his name expunged, buried in oblivion and disgrace. A tender and generous concern for the honour of the dead, and the comfort of poor widows and strangers, neither of which can return the kindness, (Luke 14. 14.) is what God will be well pleased with, and will surely recompense. Our Lord Jesus is our God, our Redeemer, our everlasting Redeemer; he looked, like Boaz, with compassion on the posterity of fallen mankind; at a vast expense he redeemed the heavenly inheritance for us, which by sin was mortgaged, and forfeited in the hands of divine justice, and which we could never have been able to redeem. He likewise purchased a peculiar people, whom he would espouse to himself, though strangers and foreigners, like Ruth, poor, and despised, that the name of that dead and buried race might not be cut off for ever. He ventured the marrying of his own inheritance, to do this, for though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor; but he was abundantly recompensed for it by his Father, who, because he thus humbled himself, hath highly exalted, and given him a name above every name. Let us own our obligations to him, make sure our contract with him, and study all our days how to do him honour.

Boaz, by making a public declaration of this marriage and purchase, not only secured his title against all pretenders, as it were by a fine with proclamations, but put honour upon Ruth, showed that he was not ashamed of her, and her parentage, and poverty, and left a testimony against clandestine marriages. It is only that which is evil, that hates the light, and comes not to it. Boaz called with a free and liberal hand, for it was a virtue he could justify, and would never disown; and such regard was then had, even to the condemned crowd, that not only the elders, but all the people that were in the gate, passing and re-passing, were appealed to, (v. 9.) and hearten to, (v. 11.) when they said, We are witnesses.

II. That it was attended with many prayers. They were all joined in the supplications when they witnessed to it, wished well to it, and blessed it, v. 11, 12. Ruth, it should seem, was now sent for, for they speak of her (v. 12.) as present, this young woman; and he having taken her to wife, they look upon her as already come into his house. And very heartily they pray for the new-married couple. The senior elder, it is likely, made this prayer, and the rest of the elders, with the people, joined in it, and minister who gives himself to the word of the Lord, and prayer, as he is the fittest person to exhort, so he is the fittest to bless and pray for, those that enter into this relation. 2. We ought to desire and pray for the welfare and prosperity one of another so far from envying or grieving at it. Now here,

(1.) They pray for Ruth; The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and Leah; that is, "God make her a good wife, and deservedly so, with many virtues, and a pleasant companion, and yet needed the prayers of her friends, that by the grace of God she might be made a blessing to the family she was come into. They pray she might be like Rachel and Leah, rather than like Sarah and Rebekah; for Sarah had but one son, and Rebekah but one that was in covenant; the other was Esau, who was rejected: but Rachel and Leah did build up the house of Israel; all their children were in the church, and their offspring was numerous. "May she be a flourishing, fruitful, faithful, vine by thy house side.""

(2.) They pray for Boaz, that he might continue to do worthy in the city, to which he was an ornament, and might there be more and more famous. They desire that the wife might be a blessing, in the private affairs of the house, and the husband a blessing, in the public business of the town; that she in her presence and he in his, might be an ornament, and successful. Observe, The way to be famous, is to do worthy. Great reputation must be got by great merits. It is not enough not to do unworthily, to be harmless and inoffensive, but we must do worthy, be useful and serviceable to our generation; they that would be truly illustrious, must in their places shine as lights.

(3.) They pray for the family; Let thy house be like the house of Pharez; that is, "Let it be very numerous, let it greatly increase and multiply, as the house of Pharez did." The Beth-lehemites were of the house of Pharez, and knew well how numerous it was; in the distribution of the tribes, that grandson of Jacob had the honour which none of the rest had but Manasseh and Ephraim, that his posterity was subdivided into two distinct families, Hezron and Hamul, Numb. 26. 21. Now they pray that the family of Boaz, which was one branch of that stock, might in process of time become as numerous and as great as the whole stock now was.

13. So Boaz took Ruth, and she was his wife: and, when he went in unto her, the Lord gave her conception, and she bare a son. 14. And the women said unto Naomi, Blessed be the Lord, which hath not left thee this day without a kinsman, that his name may be famous in Israel. 15. And he shall be unto thee a restorer of thy life, and a nourisher of thine old age: for thy daughter-in-law which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath borne him. 16. And Naomi took the child, and laid it in her bosom, and became nurse unto it. 17. And the women her neighbours gave it a name, saying, There is a son born to Naomi; and they called his name Obed: he is the father of Jesse, the father of David.

18. Now these are the generations of Pharez: Pharez begat Hezron, 19. And Hezron begat Ram, and Ram begat Amminadab, 20. And Amminadab begat Nahshon, and Nahshon begat Salmon, 21. And Salmon begat Boaz, and Boaz begat Obed, 22. And Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David.

Here is,

1. Ruth a wife; Boaz took her with the usual solemnities, to his house, and she became his wife, v. 13. All the city, no doubt, congratulating the pre- ferment of a virtuous woman, purely for her virtues. We have reason to think that Orpah, who returned from Naomi to her people, and her gods, was never half so well preferred as Ruth was. He that forsakes all for Christ, shall find more than all with him; it shall be recompensed a hundred fold in this present time. Now Orpah wished she had gone with Naomi too; but she, like the other kinsman, stood in her own light. Boaz had prayed that this pious prospelye might receive a full reward of her courage and constancy from the God of Israel, under whose wings she was come to trust; and now he became an instrument of that kindness, which was an answer to his prayer, and helped to make his own words good. Now she had the command of those servants with whom she had associated, and of those fields in which she had gleaned. Thus sometimes, God raised up the poor out of the dust to set them with princes, Ps. 113. 7, 8.

2. Ruth a mother; The Lord gave her conception, for the fruit of the womb is his reward, Ps. 127. 3. It is one of the keys he hath in his hand; and he sometimes makes the barren woman that had been and of which they will say, they have no pleasure in them. Observe, They say of Ruth, that she loved Naomi, and therefore was better to her than seven sons. See how God in his providence sometimes makes up the want and loss of those relations from whom we expected most comfort, in those from whom we expected least. The bonds of love prove stronger than those of nature, and there is a friend that sticks closer than a brother; so here, there was a daughter-in-law, better than an own child. See what wisdom and grace will do.

Now here, [1.] The child is named by the neighbours, v. 17. The good woman would have it called Obed, a servant, either in remembrance of the meanness and poverty of the mother, or in prospect of his being hereafter a servant, and very serviceable, to his grandmother. It is no dishonour to those that are ever so well born, to be servants to God, their friends, and their generation. The motto of the prince of Wales, is, Ich dien—I serve. [2.] The child is nursed by the grandmother, that is, dry nursed, when the mother had weaned him from the breast, v. 16. She laid it in her bosom in token of her tender affection to it, and care of it. Grandmothers are often most fond.

4. Ruth is hereby brought in among the ancestors of David and Christ, which was the greatest honour. The genealogy is here drawn from Pharez, through Boaz and Obed, to David, and so leads toward the Messiah, and therefore not an endless genealogy.
EXPOSITION
UPON THE FIRST BOOK OF S A M U E L.

This book, and that which follows it, bear the name of Samuel in the title, not because he was the pen- man of them, (except of so much of them as fell within his own time, to the twenty-fifth chapter of the first book, in which we have an account of his death,) but because the first book begins with a large account of him, his birth and childhood, his life and government; and the rest of these two volumes that are denominated from him, contains the history of the reigns of Saul and David, who were both anointed by him. And because the history of these two kings takes up the greatest part of these books, the vulgar Latin calls them the first and second Books of the Kings; and the two that follow, the third and fourth, which the titles of our English Bibles take notice of with an alias, otherwise called the first Book of the Kings. The LXX call them the first and second Books of the Kingdoms. It is needless to contend about it, but there is no occasion to vary from the Hebrew verity. These two books contain the history of the two last of the judges, Eli and Samuel, who were not, as the rest, men of war, but priests; and so much of them is an entrance upon the history of the kings. They contain a con- siderable part of the sacred history, are sometimes referred to in the New Testament, and often in the title of David's Psalms, which, it placed in their order, would fall in, in these books. It is uncertain who was the penman of them; it is probable that Samuel wrote the history of his own time, and that, after him, some of the prophets that were with David, (Nathan, as likely as any,) continued it. The first book gives us a full account of Eli's fall, and Samuel's rise and good government, ch. 1-8. Of Samuel's resignation of the government, and Saul's advancement and mai-administration, ch. 9-15. The choice of David, his struggles with Saul, Saul's ruin at last, and the opening of the way for Da- vid to the throne, ch. 16-31. And these things are written for our learning.

I. SAMUEL, I.

CHAP. I.
The history of Samuel here begins as early as that of Sam- son did, even before he was born, as after wards the histo- ry of John the Baptist and our blessed Saviour. Some of the scripture worthies drop out of the clouds, as it were, and their first appearance is in their full growth and lustre. But others are accounted for from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception. It is true of all, what God says of the prophet Jeremiah, Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee, Jer. 1. 5. But some great men were brought into the world with more observation than others, and were more early distinguished from common persons, as Samuel for one. God, in this matter, acts as a free agent. The story of Samson introduces him as a child of promise, Judg. 13. But the story of Samuel introduces him as a child of prayer. Samuel's birth was foretold by an angel to his mother; Samuel was asked of God by his mother; both together intimate what won- ders are produced by the word and prayer. Samuel's mother was Hannah, the principal person concerned in the story of this chapter. I. Here is her affliction, she was childless, and this affliction aggravated by her riv- al's insolence, but in some measure balanced by her hus- band's kindness, v. 1-8. II. The prayer and vow she made to God under this affliction, in which Eli the High Priest at first censured her, and afterward encour- aged her, v. 9-18. III. The birth and nursing of Sa- muel, v. 19-55. IV. The presenting of him to the Lord, v. 24. 28.

1. NOW there was a certain man of Ramathaim-zophim, of mount Ephraim, and his name was Elkanah, the son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu, the son of Zuph, an Ephrathite: 2. And he had two wives; the name of the one was Hannah, and the name of the other Peninnah: and Peninnah had children, but Hannah had no children. 3. And this man went up out of his city yearly to worship, and to sacrifice unto the Lord of hosts in Shiloh. And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, the priests of the Lord, were there. 4. And when the time was that Elkanah offered, he gave to Peninannah his wife and to all her sons and her daughters, portions: 5. But unto Hannah he gave a worthy portion: for he loved Hannah; but the LORD had shut up her womb. 6. And her adversary also provoked her sore, for to make her fret, because the LORD had shut up her womb. 7. And as he did so year by year, when she went up to the house of the LORD, so she provoked her; therefore she wept, and did not eat. 8. Then said Elkanah her husband to her, Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest thou not? and why is thy heart grieved? am not I better to thee than ten sons?

We have here an account of the state of the family into which Samuel the prophet was born. His father's name was Elkanah, a Levite, and of the family of the Kershites, (the most honourable house of that tribe,) as appears, 1 Chron. 6:33, 34. His ancestors, as he himself relates, were born in Ephraim, that is, of Bethlehem-Judah, which was called Ephrathah, Ruth 1.2. There this family of the Levites was first seated, but one branch of it, in process of time, removed to mount Ephraim, from which Elkanah descended: Micah's Levite came from Beth-lehem to Mount Ephraim, Judg. 17. 8. Minister's families are as moveable as any. Perhaps notice is taken of their being originally Ephratites, to show their alliance to David. His Elkanah lived at Ramah, now Ramathaim, which signifies the double Ramah, the higher and lower town, the same with Arimathea of which Joseph was, here called Ramathaim-zophim. Zophim signifies watchmen, probably, they had one of the schools of the prophets there, for prophets are called watchmen: the Chaldean paraphrase calls Elkanah a disciple of the prophets. But it seems to me that it was in Samuel that prophecy was revived. Before this time the being for a great while, no open vision, ch. 3.1. Nor is there any mention of a prophet of the Lord from Moses to Samuel, except Judg. 6.8. So that we have no reason to think that there was any nursery or college of prophets here, till Samuel himself founded one, ch. 19. 19, 20. This is the account of Samuel's parentage, and the place of his nativity.

Let us now take notice of the state of the family. 1. It was a devout family. All the families of Israel should be so, but Levites' families in a particular manner. Ministers should be patterns of family religion. Elkanah went up at the solemn fasts to the tabernacle at Shiloh, to worship and to sacrifice to the Lord of hosts. I think this is the first time in scripture, that God is called the Lord of hosts, Jehovah Sabaoth, a name by which he was afterward very much called and known. Probably, Samuel the Davidian, and, for ought that appears, but a prophet or office which required his high attendance at the tabernacle, but he went up as a common Israelite, with his own sacrifices, to encourage his neighbours and set them a good example. When he sacrifice, he worshipped, joining prayers and thanksgivings with his sacrifices. In this course of religion he was constant, for he went up yearly.

And that which made it the more commendable in him was,

1. That there was a general decay and neglect of religion in the nation; some among them worse shipped other gods, and the generality were remiss in the service of the God of Israel: and yet Elkanah kept his integrity, whatsoever else he, in resolution was, that he and his house should serve the Lord.

2. That Hophni and Phinehas, the sons of Eli, were the men that were now chiefly employed in the service of the house of God; and they were men that conducted themselves very ill in their place, as we shall find afterward; yet Elkanah went up to sacrifice. God had then tied his people to one place, one altar, and forbidden them, under any pretence whatsoever, to their being in pure obedience to that command, he attended at Shiloh; if the priests did not do their duty, he would do his. Thanks be to God, we, under the gospel, are not tied to any one place or family; but the pastors and teachers whom the exalted Redeemer has given to his church, are those only whose ministration tends to the perfecting of the saints, and the edifying of the body of Christ, Eph. 4.12. So that we have many advantages under the gospel, though we are not as those under the Old Testament.

3. That faith; but our obligation is to those that are the helpers of our holiness and joy, not to any that by their scandalous immoralities, like Hophni and Phinehas, make the sacrifices of the Lord to be abhorred; though still the validity and efficacy of the sacraments depend not on the purity of him that administers them.

4. Yet it was a divided family, and the divisions of it carried with them both guilt and grief. Where there is piety, it is pity but there should be unity. The joint devotions of a family should put an end to divisions in it.

1. The original cause of this division, was Elkanah's marrying two wives, which was a transgression of the original institution of marriage, to which our Saviour reduces it, Matt. 19. 5. 8. From the beginning it was not so. It made mischief in Abrahams's family, and Jacob's, and here in Elkanah's: how much better does the law of God provide for our comfort and ease in this world than we should, if we were left to ourselves! It is probable that Elkanah married Hannah first, and because he had no children by her so soon as he hoped, he married Peninannah, who bare him children, indeed, but was in other things a vexation to him. Thus are men often beaten with rods of their own making, and therefore, in pure obedience to that command, he attended at Shiloh; if the priests did not do their duty, he would do his. Thanks be to God, we, under the gospel, are not tied to any one place or family; but the pastors and teachers whom the exalted Redeemer has given to his church, are those only whose ministration tends to the perfecting of the saints, and the edifying of the body of Christ, Eph. 4.12. So that we have many advantages under the gospel, though we are not as those under the Old Testament.

2. That which followed upon this error, was, that the two wives could not agree. They had different blessings; Peninannah, like Leah, was fruitful and had many children, which should have made her easy and thankful, though she was but a second wife, and was less beloved; Hannah, like Rachel, was childless indeed, but she was very dear to her husband, and he took all occasions to let both her and others know that she was so, and many a worthy portion he gave her; ver. 5. and this should have made her easy and thankful. But they were of different temper; Peninannah could not bear the blessing of fruitfulness, but she grew haughty and insolent; Hannah could not bear the affliction of barrenness, but she grew melancholy and discontented; and Elkanah had a difficult part to act between them.

1. Elkanah kept up his attendance at God's altar, notwithstanding this unhappy difference in his family, and took his wives and children with him, that if they could not agree in other things, they might agree to worship God together. If the devotions of a family prevail not to put an end to its divisions, yet let not the divisions put a stop to the devotions.
(2.) He did all he could, to encourage Hannah, and to keep up her spirits under her afflictions, v. 4, 5. At the feasts, he offered peace-offerings, to supplicate for peace in his family; and when he and his house came to enjoy the sacrifices in token of their communion with God and his altar, though he carved to Peninnah and her children competent portions, yet to Hannah he gave a worthy portion, the choicest piece that came to the table, the piece (whatever it was) that used to be given on such occasions to those that were most valued: this he did, in token of his love to her, and to give all possible assurances of it. Observe, [1.] Elkanah loved his wife never the less for her being barren. Christ loves his church, notwithstanding her infirmities, her barrenness; and so ought men to love their wives, Eph. 5. 25. To abate our just love to any relation for the sake of any infirmity which they cannot help, and which is not their sin, but their affliction, is to make God’s providence quarrel with his precept, and very unnaturally to add affliction to the afflicted. [2.] He studied to show his love to her so much, the more, because she was afflicted, insulted, and low-spirited. It is wisdom and duty to support the weakest, and to hold up those that are run down. [3.] He showed his great love to her, by the share he gave her of his peace-offerings. Thus we should testify our affection to our friends and relations, by abounding in prayer for them. The better we love them, the more room let us give them in our prayers.

9. 2. She was also young, and very peevish and provoking. (1.) She upbraided Hannah with her affliction, despaired her because she was barren, and gave her taunting language, as one whom Heaven did not favour. (2.) She envied the interest she had in the love of Elkanah, and the more kind he was to her, the more was she exasperated against her; which was all over base and b barious. (3.) She did this much; when they went up to the house of the Lord, perhaps, because she was no more together than at other times, or because then Elkanah showed his affection most to Hannah. But it was very sinful at such a time to show her malice, when pure hands were to be lifted up at God’s altar without wrath and quarrelling. It was likewise very unkind at that time to vex Hannah, not only because then they were in company, and other women might observe of it, but then Hannah was too much to mind her deprivations. It was to quiet, calm, and composed, and free from disturbance. The great adversity to our purity and peace is then most insidious to ruffle us, when we should be most composed. When the sons of God come to present themselves before the Lord, Satan will be sure to come among them, Job 1. 4. (4.) She continued to do this from year to year, not once or twice, but it was more constant practice; nor was her difference to her husband her companion, nor Hannah, could break her of it; and Lastly, That which she designed, was, to make her fret; perhaps in hopes to break her heart, that she might possess her husband’s heart solely. Or, because she took a pleasure in her un easiness; nor could Hannah gratify her more than by fretting. Note, It is an evidence of a bad disposition, to delight in grieving those that are under trouble, and using a model of a sorrowful spirit, in putting those out of humour, the more they are fret and be uneasy. We ought to bear one another’s burthens, not add to them.

(4.) Hannah (poor woman) could not bear the provocation; she wept, and did not eat, v. 7. It made her uneasy to herself and to all her relations. She did not eat of the feast, her trouble took away her appetite, made her unfit for any company, and a jar in the harmony of family-joy. It was not of the feast upon the sacrifice that she did not eat, for they were not to eat of the holy things in their mourning, Deut. 26. 14. Lev. 10. 19. Yet it was her infirmity, so far to give way to the sorrow of the world, as to unfit herself for holy joy in God. Those that are of a fitful spirit, and are apt to lay provocations too much to heart, are enemies to themselves, and strip themselves very much of the comforts both of life and godliness. We find that God took notice of this ill effect of discontentments and disagreements in the conjugal relation; the parties aggrieved, covered the altar of the Lord with tears, insomuch that he regarded not the offering, Mal. 2. 13.

(5.) Elkanah said what he could to her, to comfort her. She did not upbraid him with his unkindness in marrying another wife, as Sarah did, nor did she render to Peninnah railing for railing, but took the trouble wholly to herself, which made her an object of much compassion. Elkanah showed himself extremely grieved at her grief; (v. 8.) Hannah why weepest thou? [1.] He is much concerned to see her thus overwhelmed with sorrow. They that by marriage are made one flesh, ought thus far to be of one spirit too, to share in each other’s troubles, so that one cannot be easy while the other is uneasy. [2.] He gives her a loving reproof for it, Why weepest thou? And why is thy heart grieved? As many as God loves he rebukes, and so should we. He puts her upon inquiring into the cause of her grief; though she had just reason to be troubled, yet let her consider whether she had reason to be troubled to such a degree; especially so much as to be taken off by it from eating of the holy things. Note, Our sorrow upon any account is then sinful and inordinate, when it diverts us from our duty to God, and hinders our comfort in him; when it makes us unthankful for the mercies we enjoy, and distrustful of the goodness of God to us in further mercies; when it casts a dam upon our joy in Christ and in all the conveniences of our particular relations. [3.] He intimates that nothing should be wanting on his part to balance her grief. “Am not I better to thee than ten sons? Thou knowest thou hast my affection entire, and let that comfort thee.” Note, We ought to take notice of our comforts, to keep us from grieving excessively for our crosses; for, our crosses we deserve, but our comforts we have for our sake. If we could keep the balance even, we must look at that which is for us, as well as that which is against us, else we are unjust to Providence, and unkind to ourselves. God hath set the one over-against the other, (Eccles. 7. 14.) and so should we.

9. So Hannah rose up, after they had eaten in Shiloh, and after they had drunk: (now Eli the priest sat upon a seat by a post of the temple of the Lord:) And after she had drunk: (now Eli the priest sat upon a seat by a post of the temple of the Lord:) 10. And she was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the Lord, and wept sore. 11. And she vowed a vow, and said, O Lord of hosts, if thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thine handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thine handmaid, but wilt give unto thine handmaid a man child, then I will give him unto the Lord all the days of his life, and there shall no razor come upon his head. 12. And it came to pass, as she continued praying before the Lord, that Eli marked her mouth
13. Now Hannah, she spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard: therefore Eli thought she had been drunken. 14. And Eli unto her, How long wilt thou be drunken? put away thy wine from thee. 15. And Hannah answered and said, No, my lord; I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit: I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, but, have poured out my soul before the Lord. 16. Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial: for out of the abundance of my complaint and grief have I spoken hitherto. 17. Then Eli answered and said, Go in peace: and the God of Israel grant thee thy petition that thou hast asked of him. 18. And she said, Let thine handmaid find grace in thy sight. So the woman went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad.

Elikanah had gently reproved Hannah for her inordinate grief, and here we find the good effect of it. I. It brought her to her meat. She ate and drank, v. 9. She did not harden herself in sorrow, nor grow sullen when she was reproved for it; but when she perceived her husband uneasy that she did not come and eat with them, she cheered up her own spirits as well as she could, and came to table. It is as great a piece of self-denial to control our passions, as it is to control our appetites. II. It brought her to her prayers. It put her upon considering, "Do I well to be angry? Do I well to fret? What good does it do me? Instead of binding the burthen thus upon my own shoulders, had I not better ease myself of it, and cast it upon the Lord by prayer?" Elikanah had said, \textit{Am not I better to thee than ten sons?} Which perhaps occasioned her to think with herself, "Whether he be so or no, God is, and therefore to him will I apply myself, and before him will I pour out my complaint, and try what relief that will give me." If ever she will make a more solemn address than ordinary to the throne of grace upon this errand, now is the time. They are at Shiloh, at the door of the tabernacle, where God had promised to meet his people, and which was the \textit{house of prayer}. They had lately offered their peace-offerings, to obtain the favour of God and all good, and in token of their communion with him; and, taking the comfort of their being accepted of him, they had feasted upon the sacrifice, and now it was proper to put up their prayer in virtue of that sacrifice; for the peace-offerings typified Christ's mediation, as well as the sin-offerings, for by it not only atonement is made for sin, but the audience and acceptance of our prayers, and an answer of peace to them, are obtained for us: to that Sacrifice, in all our supplications, we must have an eye.

Now concerning Hannah's prayer, we may observe,

1. The warm and lively devotion there was in it; which appeared in several instances, for our direction in prayer. (1.) She improved the present grief and trouble of her spirit, for the exciting and quickening of her pious affection in prayers. \textit{Being in bitterness of soul, she prayed,} v. 10. This good use we should make of our afflictions, they should make us the more lively in our addresses to God. Our blessed Saviour himself, being in an agony, \textit{prayed more earnestly,} Luke 22. 44. (2.) She mingled tears with her prayers. It was not a dry prayer; she wept sore; like a true Israelite, \textit{She wept and made supplication,} (Hes. 12. 4.) with an eye to the tender mercy of our God, who knows the troubled soul; the prayer came from the heart, and a tear for a word. Which (3.) She was very particular, and yet very modest, in her petition. She begged a child, a man child, that it might be fit to serve in the tabernacle. God gives us leave, in prayer, not only to ask good things in general, but to mention that special good thing which we most need and desire. Yet she says not, as Rachel, \textit{Give me children,} Gen. 30. 1. She will be very thankful for one.

(4.) She made a solemn vow or promise, that if God would give her a son, she would give him \textit{up to God,} v. 11. He would be, by birth, a Levite, and so devoted to the service of God; but he should be, by her vow, a Nazarite, and his very childhood should be sacred. It is probable she had acquainted Elikanah with her purpose before, and had his consent and approbation. Note, (1.) Parents have a right to dedicate their children to God, and to live under the law and spirit of prayer and service. Sacrilege is thereby laid upon them to serve God faithfully \textit{all the days of their life.} (2.) It is very proper, when we are in pursuit of any mercy, to bind our own souls with a bond, that if God give it us, we will devote it to his honour, and cheerfully use it in his service. Not that hereby we can pretend to merit the gift, but thus we are qualified for it, and for the comfort of it. In hope of mercy, let us promise duty. (5.) She spoke all this so softly, that none could hear her. Her lips moved, but \textit{her voice was not heard,} v. 13. Hereby she testified her belief of God's knowledge of the heart and its desires. Thoughts are words with him, nor is he one of those gods that must be cried aloud to, 1 Kings 18. 27. It was likewise an instance of her humility and holy shame-facedness in her approach to God; she was none of those that \textit{made their voice to be heard on high,} Isa. 58. 4. It was a secret prayer, and therefore, though made in a public place, yet was thus made secretly, and not, as the Pharisees prayed, \textit{to be seen of men.} It is true, prayer is not a thing we have reason to be ashamed of, but we must avoid all appearances of ostentation. Let what passes between God and our souls, be kept to ourselves. 2. The hard censure she fell under for it. Eli was now High Priest, and Judge in Israel: he sat upon a seat in the temple, to oversee what was done there, v. 9. The tabernacle is here called the \textit{temple,} because it was now fixed, and served all the purposes of a temple. There Eli sat to receive addresses and give direction, and somewhere, (it is probable,) in a private corner, he espied Hannah at her prayers, and, by her unusual manner, fancied she was drunken, and spoke to her accordingly; v. 14. \textit{How long wilt thou be drunken?} — the very inquisition that Peter and the apostles fell under, when the Holy Ghost gave them utterance, Acts 2. 4. Perhaps in this degenerate age, it was no strange thing to see drunken women at the door of the tabernacle; for, otherwise, one would think the vile lust of Hophni and Phinehas could not have been easy a proof of it. ch. 2. 22. Eli took Hannah for one of these. It is one bad effect of the abounding of iniquity, and its becoming fashionable, that it often gives occasion to suspect the innocent. When a disease is epidemic, every one is suspected to be tainted with it. Now, (1.) This was Eli's fault; and a great fault it was, to pass so severe a censure without better observation or information. If his own eyes were already waxen dim, he should have employed those about him to inquire. Drunkards are commonly noisy and turbulent, but this poor woman was silent and composed. His fault was the worse, that he was the priest of the Lord, who should have had compassion on the ignorant, Heb. 5. 2.

Note. It ill becomes us to be rash and hasty in our censures of others, and to be forward to believe peopple guilty of bad things, while they themselves do that on which the censure is grounded, is doubtful and unproved, or is capable of a good construction. Charity commands us to hope the best concerning all, and forbids censoriousness. Paul had very good information, when he did but partly believe, (1 Cor. 11. 18.) hoping it was not so. Especially we ought to be cautious how we censure the devotion of others, lest we call that hypocrisY, enthusiasm, or superstition, which is really the fruit of an honest zeal, and is accepted of God.

(2.) It was Hannah's affliction; and a great affliction it was, added to all the rest; vinegar to the wounds of her spirit. She had been reproved by Elkanah, because she would not eat and drink; and now to be reproached by Eli, as if she had eaten and drunk too much, was very hard. Note, It is no new thing for those that do well, to be ill thought of. We must not think it strange if at any time it be our lot.

3. Hannah's humble vindication of herself from this crime with which she was charged. She bore it admirably well; she did not retort the charge, and upbraid him with the debauchery of his own sons; did not bid him look at home and restrain them; did not tell him how ill it became one in his place, thus to abuse a poor sorrowful worshipper at the house of prayer. If we are not unjustly censured, we have need to set a double watch before the door of our lips, that we do not recriminate, and return censure for censure. Hannah thought it enough to vindicate herself, and so must we, v. 15, 16. (1.) In justice to herself, she expressly denies the charge; speaks to him with all possible respect, calls him My lord; intimates how very desirous she was to stand well in his opinion, and how loath to lie under his censure. "No, my lord, it is not as you suspect, I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, nor any at all," (though it was proper enough to be given to one of such a heavy heart, Prov. 31. 6.) "much less to any excess; therefore count not thy handmaid for a daughter of Belial," Note. Drunkards are children of Belial, women-drunkards particularly; children of the wicked one; children of disobedience; children that will not endure the yoke; (else they would not be drunk;) they are more especially what has just been stated, when actually drunk. They that cannot govern themselves, will not bear that any one else should. Hannah owns the crime had been very great, if she had indeed been guilty of it, and he might justly have shut her out of the courts of God's house; but the very manner of her speaking in her own defence, was sufficient to demonstrate that she was not drunk. 2. In justice to him, she accounts for the manner which had given occasion to his suspicion. "I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit, dejected and discomposed, and that is the reason I do not look as other people; the eyes are red, not with wine, but with weeping. And at this time, I have not been talking to myself, as drunkards and fools do, but I have been pouring out my soul before the Lord, who hears and understandeth the language of my heart, and of my complaint, and of my abundance of my complaint and grief." She had been, more than usual, fervent in prayer to God, and that, she tells him, was the true reason of the disorder she seemed to be in. Note, When we are unjustly censured, we should endeavour, not only to clear ourselves, but to satisfy our brethren, by giving them a just and true account of that which they misinterpreted.

4. The atonement Eli made for his rash unfriendly censure, by a kind and fatherly benediction, v. 17. He did not (as many are apt to do in such a case) take it for an affront to have his mistake rec-ognized, and to have his censure reproved, but he put him out of humour. But, on the contrary, he now encouraged Hannah's devotions, as much as before he had discomfited them; not only inti- mated that he was satisfied of her innocence by those words, Go in peace, but being High-priest, as one having authority, he blessed her in the name of the Lord, and though he knew not what the particular blessing was, that she had been praying for, yet he puts his Amen to it, so great an opinion he had she now conceived of her prudence and piety. The God of Israel grant thee thy petition, whatever it is, that thou hast asked of him. Note, By our meek and humble carriage toward those that reproach us because they did not know us, we may perhaps make them our friends, and turn their censures of us into prayers for us.

The great satisfaction of mind with which Hannah now went away, v. 18. She begged the continuance of Eli's good opinion of her, and his good prayers for her, and then she went her way, and did eat of what remained of the peace-offerings, (none of which was to be left until the morning,) and her countenance was no more sad; no more as it had been, giving marks of inward trouble and discomposure; but she looked pleasant and cheerful, and all was well. Whence came this sudden happy change? She had by prayer committed her case to God, and left it with him, and now she was no more perplexed about it. She had prayed for herself, and Eli had prayed for her; and she believed that God would either give her the mercy she had prayed for, or make up the want of it to her some other way. Note, Prayer is heart's ease to a gracious soul; the seed of Jacob have often found it so, being confident that God will never say unto them, Seek ye me in vain. See Phil. 4. 6. 7. Prayer will smooth the countenance; it should do so.

19. And they rose up in the morning early, and worshipped before the Lord, and returned, and came to their house to Hannah: and Elkanah knew Hannah his wife; and the Lord remembered her. 20. Wherefore it came to pass, when the time was come about after Hannah had conceived, that she bare a son, and called his name Samuel, saying, Because I have asked him of the Lord. 21. And the man Elkanah, and all his house, went up to offer unto the Lord the yearly sacrifice, and his vow. 22. But Hannah went not up; for she said unto her husband, I will not go up until the child be weaned, and then I will bring him, that he may appear before the Lord, and there abide for ever. 23. And Elkanah her husband said unto her, Do what seemeth thee good; tarry until thou have weaned him; only the Lord establish his word. So the woman did, and gave her son suck until she weaned him. 24. And when she had weaned him, she took him up with her, with three bullocks, and
I. The return of Elkanah and his family to their own habitation, when the days appointed for the feast were over. v. 19. Observe how they improved their time at the tabernacle: every day they were there, even that which was fixed for their journey home, they worshipped God. And they rose up early to do it. It is good to begin the day with God. Let him that is the first, have the first. They had a journey before them, and a family of children to take with them, and yet they would not stir till they had worshipped God together. Prayer androvender do not hinder a journey. They had spent several days now in religious worship, and yet they attended once more. We should not be weary of well-doing.

II. The birth and name of this desired son. At length the Lord remembered Hannah; the very thing she desired; (v. 11.) and more she needed than that, was enough; for then she conceived and bare a son. God seems long to forget his people's burthens, troubles, courts, and prayers, yet he will at length make it to appear that they are not out of his mind. This son the mother called Samuel, v. 20. Some make the etymology of it to be much the same with that of Ishmael, heard of God, because the mother's prayers were remarkably heard, and he was an answer to them. Others, because of the reason she gives for the name, make it to signify asked of God; it comes nearly to the same; she designed by it to perpetuate the rememberance of God's favour to her in answering her prayers. Thus she designed, upon every mention of his name, to take the comfort to herself, and to give God the glory of that gracious condescension. Note, Mercies in answer to prayer, are to be remembered with peculiar expressions of thankfulness, as Ps. 116. 1, 2. How many seasonable deliverances and supplies may we call Samuel, asked of God; and whatever is so, we are in a special manner engaged to devote to him. Hannah intended by this name to put her son in mind of the obligation he was under to be the Lord's, in consideration of this, that he was asked of God, and was at the same time dedicated to him. A child of prayer is in a special manner bound to be a good child. Lennu's mother reminded him that he was the son of her vows, Prov. 31. 2. III. The close attendance Hannah gave to the nursing of him, not only because he was dear to her, but because he was devoted to God, and for him she nursed him. She therefore nursed him herself, and did not hang him on another's breast. We ought to take care of our children, not only with an eye to the law of nature as they are our's, but with an eye to the covenant of grace as they are given up to God. See Ezek. 16. 50, 21. This sanctifies the nursing of them, when it is done as unto the Lord.

Elkanah went up every year to worship at the tabernacle, and particularly to perform his vow; perhaps some vow he had made distinct from Hannah's, if he should give him a son by her, v. 21. But Hannah, though she stood for the courts of God's house, begged leave of her husband to stay at home; for the women were not under any obligation to go up to the three yearly feasts, as the men were. However, Hannah had been accustomed to go, but now desir'd to be excused, 1. Because she would not be so long absent from her nursery. Can a woman forget her sucking child? We may suppose she kept constant at home, for if she had gone any whither, she would have gone to Shiloh. Note, God will have mercy, and not sacrifice. Those that are detained from public ordinances, by the nursing and tending of little children, may take comfort from this instance, and believe, that if they do that with an eye to God, he will graciously accept them therein; and though they tarry at home, they shall divide the spoil. 2. Because she would not go up to Shiloh till her son was big enough, not only to be taken thither, but to be left there; for if once she took him thither, she thought she could never find it in her heart to bring him back again. Note, Those who are steadfastly resolved to pay their vows, may yet see good cause to defer the payment of them. Every thing is beautiful in its season. No animal was accepted in sacrifice, till it had been for some time under its mother, Lev. 22. 27. Fruit is best when it is ripe. Elkanah agrees to what she proposes, v. 23. Do what wemeth thee good. So far was he from de-lighting to cross her, that he referred it entirely to her. Behold, how good and pleasant a thing it is, when yoke-fellows thus draw even in the yoke, and accommodate themselves to one another; each thinking well of what the other does, especially in works of piety and charity. He adds a prayer, Only the Lord establish his word; that is, God preserve the child through the perils of his infancy, that the solemn vow which God signified his acceptance of, by giving us the child, may be performed in its season, and so the whole matter may be accomplished. Note, Those that have in sincerity devoted their children to God, may with comfort pray for them, that God will establish the word sealed to them, at the same time that they were sealed for them.

IV. The solemn entering of this child into the service of the sanctuary. We may take it for granted that he was presented to the Lord at forty days old, as all the first-born were; (Luke 2. 22, 23.) but that is not mentioned, because there was nothing in it singular; but now that he was weaned, he was presented, not to be redeemed. Some think it was as soon as he was weaned from the breast, which, the Jews say, was not till he was two years old. She gave him suck till she had weaned him, v. 23. Others think it was not till he was weaned from childish things, at eight or ten years old. But I see no inconvenience in admitting such an extraordinary child as this, into the tabernacle, at three years old, to be educated among the children of the priests. It is said, v. 24, The child was young; but, being intelligent above his years, he was no trouble. None can begin too soon to be a child of prayer. The child, of age, is a child of prayer. The Hebrew reads it, in his learning-age. For whom shall he teach knowledge, but them that are newly weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts. Isa. 28. 9. Observe how she presented her child. 1. With a sacrifice; no less than three bullocks, with a meat-offering for each, v. 24. A bullock, perhaps, for each year of the child's life. Or, one for a burnt-offering, another for a sin-offering, and

In this chapter, we have, I. Hannah's song of thanksgiving to God for his favour to her, in giving her Samuel, ch. i. 10. II. Their return to their family, with Eli's blessing, v. 11., 20. The increase of their family, (v. 21.) Samuel's growth and improvement, (v. 11., 16., 24., 26.) and the care Hannah took to clothe him, v. 19., 31. To great wickedness of Eli's sons, v. 12., 17., 23., 24. The over-mild reproof that Eli gave them for it, v. 23., 25. V. The justly dreadful message God sent him by a prophet, threatening the ruin of his family for the wickedness of his sons, v. 27., 30.

1. and Hannah prayed, and said, My heart rejoiceth in the Lord; mine horn is exalted in the Lord; my mouth is enlarged over mine enemies; because I rejoice in thy salvation. 2. There is none holy as the Lord: for there is none beside thee; neither is there any rock like our God. 3. Talk no more so exceeding proudly; let not arrogancy come out of your mouth: for the Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed. 4. The bows of the mighty men are broken, and they that stumbled are girded with strength. 5. They that were full have hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased: so that the barren hath borne seven; and she that hath many children is waxed feeble. 6. The Lord killeth, and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. 7. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up. 8. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dung-hill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory: for the pillars of the earth are the Lord's, and he hath set the world upon them. 9. He will keep the feet of his saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness; for by strength shall no man prevail. 10. The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken to pieces; out of heaven shall he thunder upon them; the Lord shall judge the ends of the earth; and he shall give strength unto his king, and exalt the horn of his anointed.

We have here Hannah's thanksgiving, dictated, not only by the spirit of prayer, but by the spirit of prophecy. Her petition for the mercy she desired, we had before, (ch. i. 11.) and here her return of praise; in both, out of the abundance of a heart deeply affected, (in the former, with her own wants, and in the latter, with God's goodness,) her mouth speaks.

Observe in general, 1. When she had received mercy from God, she owned it, with thankfulness to his praise. Not like the nine lepers, Luke 17. 17. Praise is our rent, our tribute, we are unjust if we do not pay it. 2. The mercy she had received, was an answer to prayer, and therefore she thought herself especially obliged to give thanks for it. What we win by prayer, we may wear with comfort, and must wear with praise. 3. Her thanksgiving is here called a prayer; Hannah prayed; for thanksgiving is an essential part of prayer. In every address to God, we must express a grateful regard to him as our Benefactor. Nay, and thanksgiving for mercies received, shall be accepted as a petition for further mercy. 4. From this particular mercy which she had received from God, she takes occasion to recognise an elevated and enlarged heart, to speak glorious things of God, and of his government of the world, for the good of his church. Whatever at any time gives rise to our praises, in this manner they should be raised. 5. Her prayer was mental, her voice was not heard; but in her thanksgiving she spake, that all might hear her. She made her supplication with groanings that could not be uttered, but now her lips were opened with joy to show forth God's praise. 6. This thanksgiving is here left upon record for the encouragement of those of the weaker sex to attend the throne of grace; God will regard their prayers and praises. The virgin Mary's song has great affinity with this of Hannah, Luke 1. 46.

Three things we have in this thanksgiving.

1. Hannah's triumph in God, in his glorious perfections, and the great things he had done for her, v. 27. Observed.

1. What great things she says of God. She takes little notice of the particular mercy she was now rejoicing in, does not commend Samuel for the prettiest child, the most tender and sensible of his age, or that she ever saw, as fond parents are apt to do; no, she overlooks the gift, and praises the Giver; whereas most forget the Giver, and fasten only on the gift. Every stream should lead us to the fountain; and the favours we receive from God, should raise our admiration of the infinite perfections there are in God. There may be other Samuels, but no other Jehovah. There is none beside thee. Note, God is to be praised as a peerless Being, and of unparalleled perfection; this glory is due unto his name, to own, not only that there is none like him, but that there is none beside him. All others were pretenders, Ps. 18. 33. The fear of the Lord here celebrates the glory of. (1.) His unspotted purity. This is that attribute which is most praised in the upper world, by those that always behold his face, Is. 6. 3. Rev. 4. 8. When Israel triumphed over the Egyptians, God was praised as glorious in holiness, Exod. 15. 11. So here, in Hannah's triumph, There is none holy as the Lord. It is the rectitude of his nature, his infinite agreement with himself, and the equity of his government and judgment, in all the administrations of both. At the remembrance of this, we ought to give thanks. (2.) His almighty power. Neither is there any rock (or any strength, for so the word is sometimes rendered) like our God. Hannah had experienced a mighty support by staying herself upon him, and therefore speaks as she had found, and seems to refer that to of Moses, Deut. 33. 29. 30. 31. (3.) His unchangeable dominion. He is the Judge of all, is a God of knowledge; he clearly and perfectly sees into the character of every person, and the merits of every cause, and he gives knowledge and understanding to those that seek it of him. (4.) His unerring justice. By him actions are weighed. His own are so, in his eternal counsels; the actions of the children of men are so, in the balance of his judgment; so that he will render to every man according to his work, and is not mistaken in what any man is, or does.

2. How she solaces herself in these things. What we give God the glory of, we may take the comfort of; Hannah does so, (1.) In holy joy. My heart rejoiceth in the Lord; not so much in her son, as in her God; he is to be the Gladness of our joy, (Ps. 43. 4.) and our joy must not terminate in any thing short of him. I rejoice in thy salvation; not only in this particular favour to me, but in the salvation of thy people Israel, those salvations especially which this child will be an instrument of, and that above all, by Christ, which those are but the types of. (2.) In holy triumph. My horn is exalted; not only my reputation saved by my having a son, but greatly raised by having such a son. We read of some of the singers whom David appointed to lift up the horn, an instrument of music, in praising God; (1 Chron. 25. 5.) so that, My horn is exalted, means this, My praises are very much elevated to an unusual strain. Exalted in the Lord; God is to have the honour of all our exaltations, and in him must we seek all our wisdom. This is; this, Now I have wherewith to answer them that reproached me; he that has his quiver full of arrows, his house full of children, shall not be ashamed to speak with the enemy in the gate, Ps. 127. 5.

3. How she herewith silences those that set up themselves as rivals with God, and rebels against him; v. 3. Talk no more exceeding boldly. Let them think of Hannah's sons, he has nothing more with her confidence in God, and praying to him; at length she found it not in vain. See Mic. 7. 10, Then she that is mine enemy, shall see it, and shame shall cover her that said, Where is my God? Or, perhaps, it was below her to take so much notice of Peninnah, and her malice, in this song; but this is intended as a check to the insolence of the Philistines, and other enemies of God and Israel, that set their mouth against the heavens, Ps. 73. 4. that this should make them to silence and shun him that has thus judged for me against my adversary, will judge for his people against all their's." II. The notice she takes of the wisdom and sovereignty of the divine providence, in its disposal of the affairs of the children of men; such are the vicissitudes of them, and such the strange and sudden turns and revolutions of them, that it is often found a very short step between the height of prosperity and the depth of adversity; God has not only set the one over against the other, Eccl. 7. 14, but the one very near the other, and no gulf fixed between them, that we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

1. The strong are soon weakened, and the weak are soon strengthened, when God pleases, v. 4. On the one hand, if he speak the word, the bow of the mighty men are broken, they are disarmed, distressed, to do as they have done, and as they have designed; they have been worsted in battle who seemed upon all accounts to have had the advantage on their side, and thought themselves sure of victory. See Ps. 46. 9.—37. 15, 17. Particular persons are soon weakened by sickness and age, and they find that the bow does not long abide in strength, many a mighty man who has gloried in his might, has found that the bow has been broken, and that it has fallen to him when he trusted to it. On the other hand, if the Lord speak the word, they who stumbled through weakness, who were so feeble that they could not go straight or steady, are girded with strength, in body and mind, and are able to bring great things to pass. They who are weakened by sickness, return to their vigour, Job 33. 25. by sorrow shall recover their comfort; which will confirm the weak hands and the feeble knees, Isa. 38. 10. The Virgin sleeves up in the day of that side that was given up for gone, and even the lame take the prey, Isa. 33. 23.

2. The rich are soon impoverished, and the poor strangely enriched of a sudden, v. 5. Providence sometimes does so blast men's estates, and cross their endeavours, and with a fire not blown consume their increase, that they who were full, Promised On produced nor enriching in them, necessary Are despond rich abundance them gives son, that faith; full hath the was both of versal (v. 3.) of Father issues 3.

Riches flee away, (Prov. 23. 5.) and leave those miserable, who, when they had them, placed their happiness in them. To them that have been full and free, poverty and slavery must needs be doubly grievous. But, on the other hand, sometimes Providence so orders it, that they lose many honors, ceased, that is ceased to hide themselves for bread as they had done; having, by God's blessing on their industry, got before hand in the world, and enough to live upon at ease, they shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more. This is not to be ascribed to fortune, nor merely to men's wisdom or folly, Riches are not to men of understanding, nor favour to men of skill; (Ecc. 9. 11.) nor is it always men's own fault that they become poor, but, (v. 7.) The Lord maketh some poor, and maketh others rich; the impoverishing of one is the enriching of another, and it is God's doing. To some he gives power to get wealth, from others he takes away power to keep the wealth they have. Are we poor? God made us poor, which is a good reason why we should be content, and reconcile ourselves to our condition. Are we rich? God made us rich, which is a good reason why we should preserve him, and be cheerful in the abundance of good things he gives us. It may be understood of the same person; those that were rich God makes poor, and after a while makes rich again, as Job: he gave, he takes away, and then gives again. Let not the rich be proud and secure, for God can soon make them poor; let not the poor despise and despair, for God can in due time enrich them again.

3. Empty families are replenished, and numerous families diminished and made few. This is the instance that comes close to the occasion of the thanksgiving. The barren hath borne seven, meaning herself, for though at present she had but one son, yet that one being a Nazarite, devoted to God, and employed in his immediate service, he was to her as good as seven. Or, it is the language of her faith; now that she has one, she hopes for more, and was never more cheerful and of God. 2. In God is her trust, that if we reckon Samuel but for two, as we may well, she has the number she promised herself; the barren hath borne seven, while, on the other hand, she that hath many children, is waxed feeble, and hath left bearing; she says no more, Peninnah is now mortified, and crest-fallen. The tradition of the Jews, is, that when Hannah bore one child, Peninnah buried two. There are, indeed, two instances both of the increase of families that were inconceivable, and the extinguishing of families that made a figure, Job 12. 23. Ps. 107. 38. &c.

4. God is the sovereign Lord of life and death; (v. 6.) The Lord killeth and maketh alive. Understand it, (1.) Of God's sovereign dominion and universal agency, in the lives and deaths of the children of men. He presides in births and burials. With whom are the souls of men? Of what body is death, the Lord killeth, death is his messenger, strikes whom and when he bids; none are brought to the dust, but it is he that brings them down, for in his hand are the keys of death, and the grave, Rev. 1. 18. Whenever any are born, is it he that makes them alive; none knows what is the way of the spirit, but this we know, that it comes from the Father of spirits. Whenever any are recovered from sickness, and delivered from imminent perils, it is God that bringeth up, for to him belong the issues from death. (2.) Of the distinction he makes between some and others; he killeth some, and maketh, that is, keepeth others alive that were in the same danger, in war, suppose, or in their profession. Two in a bed together, it may be one taken by death, and the other yet alive; even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. Some that were most likely to live, brought down to the grave, and others that were as likely to die, brought up; for living and dying do not go by likelihoods. God's providences towards some are killing, ruining to their comforts; and towards others at the same time reviving. (5.) Of the changes he makes with one and the same person. He killeth and bringeth down to the grave; that is, he brings even to death's doors, and revives and raises up, when even life was despaired of, and a sentence of death received, 2 Cor. 1. 8, 9. He returneth to destruction, and then says, Return, Ps. 90. 3. Nothing is too hard for God to do, no not the quickening of the dead, and putting life into dry bones.

5. Advancement and abasement are both from him. He brings some low, and lifts up others; (v. 7.) humbles the proud, and gives grace and honour to the lowly; lays these in the dust that would vie with the God above them, and trample upon all about them; (Job 40. 12, 13.) but lifts up those with his salvation, that humble themselves before him, Jam, 4. 10. Or, it may be understood of the same persons; those whom he had brought low, when he found them sufficient for, he this is enlarged upon, v. 8. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, a low and mean condition, nay, from the dunghill, a base and servile condition, loathed, and despised, to set them among princes. See Ps. 113. 7, 8. Promotion comes not by chance, but from the counsel of God, which often prefers those that were very unlikely, and that men thought very unworthy. Joseph and Daniel, Moses and David, were thus changed from prison to a palace, from a sheep-hook to a sceptre. The princes they are set among, may be tempted to disdain them, but God can establish the honour which he gives thus surprisingly, and make them even to inherit the throne of glory. Let not these whom Providence has thus preferred, be upbraided with the dust and the dunghill they are raised cut of, for the meaner their beginnings were, the more are they favoured, and God doth bless their advancement, if it be by lawful and honourable means. Lastly, A reason is given for all these dispensations, which obliges us to acquiesce in them, how surprising soever they are, for, the pillars of the earth are the Lord's. (1.) If we understand it literally, it bespeaks God's almighty power, which cannot be controlled. He upholds the whole creation, founded the earth, and still sustains it by the word of his power. He doth dispose of all the affairs of families and kingdoms far beyond our conception and expectation, who hang the earth upon nothing? Job 26. 7. But, (2.) If we understand it figuratively, it bespeaks his incontestable sovereignty, which cannot be disputed. The princes and great ones of the earth, the directors of states and governments, are the pillars of the earth, Ps. 75. 3. On these hinges the affairs of the world; (What cannot he do in his day, but they are the Lord's, Ps. 47. 9.) for him they have their power, and therefore he may advance whom he pleases; and who may say, What dost thou? III. A prediction of the preservation and advancement of all God's faithful friends, and the destruction of all his and their enemies, having testified her joyful triumph in what God had done, and is doing, she concludes with joyful hopes of what he would do, v. 9, 10. Pious affections (says Bishop Patrick) in those days rose up many times to the height of prophecy, whereby God continued in that nation his true religion, in the midst of their idolatry. trophs inclinations. This prophecy may refer, 1.
More immediately to the government of Israel by Samuel, and Elkanah, and whom his line employed to ancestors. The Israelites, God's saints, should be protected and delivered; the Philistines, their enegies, particularly by thunder, ch. 7. 10. Their dominion should be enlarged, king David strengthened and greatly exalted, and Israel (that in the time of the judges had made so small a figure, and had much ado to subsist) should now shortly become grand and considerable, and give laws to all its neighbours.
An extraordinary change that was, and the birth of Samuel was, at it were, the dawning of that day.

But, 2. We have reason to think that this prophecy looks further, to the kingdom of Christ, and the administration of that kingdom of grace, of which she now comes to speak, having spoken so largely of the kingdom of providence. And here is the first time that we meet with the name Messiah, or his Anointed.
The ancient expostulation, both Jewish and Christian, make it to look beyond David, to the Son of David; glorious things are here spoken of the kingdom of the mediator, both before and since his incarnation; for the method of the administration of it, both by the eternal Word, and by that Word made flesh, is much the same.

Concerning that kingdom, we are here assured,
1. That all the loyal subjects of it shall be carefully and powerfully protected; v. 3. He will keep his sheep, viz. Those are people in the world that are God's saints, his select and sanctified ones; and he will keep their feet, that is, all that belongs to them shall be under his protection, down to their very feet, the lowest part of the body. If he will keep their feet, much more their head and hearts; or, he will keep their feet, that is, he will secure the ground they stand on, and establish their goings, he will set a guard of grace on their futile and dangerous, that their feet may neither wander out of the way, nor stumble in the way.
When their feet are ready to slip, Ps. 73, 2, his mercy holdeth them up, Ps. 94, 18. and keepeth them from falling, Jude 24. While we keep God's ways, he will keep our feet. See Ps. 37, 23, 24.

2. That all the powers engaged against it shall not be able to effect the ruin of it. By strength no man shall prevail; God's strength is engaged for the establishment of it; and while it is so, no man's strength shall not prevail against it. The church seems destitute of strength, her friends few and feeble; but prevalency does not go by human strength; Ps. 33. 16.
God neither needs it for him, (Ps. 147. 10.) nor dreads it against him.

3. That all the enemies of it will certainly be broken and brought down: The wicked shall be silent in darkness; v. 9. They shall be struck both blind and dumb, not able to see their way, nor have any thing to say for themselves. Damned sinners are sentenced to utter darkness, and in it they will be for ever speechless, Matth. 22. 12, 13. The wicked are called, The adversaries of the Lord, and it is foretold, v. 10. that they shall be broken to pieces. Their designs against his kingdom among men, will all be dashed, and they themselves destruction, it is plain. God's strength thereof to God has many ways of doing it, and, rather than fail, from heaven shall be thunder upon them, and so,
not only put them in terror and consternation, but bring them to destruction. Who can stand before God's thunderbolts?

4. That the conquests and commands of this kingdom shall extend themselves to distant regions;
The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth. David's victories and dominions reached far, but the utter-most parts of the earth are promised to the Messiah for his possession. Ps. 2. 8. to be either reduced to his golden, captive, or ruined by his iron rod. God is Judge of all and he will judge for his people, against his and their enemies, Ps. 110. 5, 6.

(5.) That the power and honour of Messiah the Prince shall grow and increase more and more. He shall give strength unto his King for the accomplishing of his great undertaking, Ps. 69. 21. and see Luke 22. 43. strengthen him to go through the difficulties of his humiliation, and in his exaltation he will lift up the head, (Ps. 110. 7.) lift up the horn, the power and honour of his anointed, and make him higher than the kings of the earth, Ps. 89. 27. This crowns the triumph, and is, more than any thing, the matter of her exaltation. her horn is exalted,
v. 1. because she foreshews the horn of the Messiah will be so. This secures the hope; the subjects of Christ's kingdom will be safe, and the enemies of it shall be ruined, for the Anointed, the Lord Christ, is girt with strength, and is able to save and destroy unto the uttermost.

11. And Elkanah went to Ramah to his house; and the child did minister unto the Lord before Eli the priest. 12. Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial; they knew not the Lord. 13. And the priest's custom with the people was, that, when any man offered sacrifice, the priest's servant came,
while the flesh was in seething, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hand; 14. And he struck it into the pan, or kettle, or cal-dron, or pot; all that the flesh-hook brought upon the priest took for himself. So they did in Shiloh unto all the Israelites that came thither. 15. Also before they burnt the fat, the priest's servant came, and said to the man that sacrificed, Give flesh to roast for the priest; for he will not have sodden flesh the, but raw. 16. And if any man said unto him, Let them not fail to burn the fat presently, and then take as much as thy soul desireth; then he would answer him, Nay;
but thou shalt give it me now: and if not, I will take it by force. 17. Wherefore the sin of the young men was very great before the Lord; for men abhorred the offering of the Lord. 18. But Samuel ministered before the Lord, being a child, girded with a linen ephod. 19. Moreover, his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice. 20. And Eli blessed Elkanah and his wife, and said,
The Lord give thee seed of this woman, for the loan which is lent to the Lord. And they went unto their own home. 21. And the Lord visited Hannah, so that she conceived, and bare three sons and two daughters. And the child Samuel grew before the Lord. 22. Now Eli was very old, and heard all that his sons did unto all Israel; and how they lay with the women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 23. And he said unto them,
Why do ye such things? for I hear of your evil dealings by all this people. 24. Nay, my sons: for it is no good report that I hear; ye make the Lord’s people to transgress.

25. If one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him: but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall entreat for him? Notwithstanding, they hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because the Lord would slay them. 26. (And the child Samuel grew on, and was in favour both with the Lord, and also with men.)

In these verses we have the good character and posture of Eliakim’s family, and the bad character and posture of Eli’s family; the account of these two is observably interwoven throughout this whole paragraph; as if the historian intended to set the one over against the other, that they might set off one another. The devotion and good order of Eliakim’s family aggrivated the iniquity of Eli’s house; while the wickedness of Eli’s sons made Samuel’s early piety shine the more bright and illustrious.

I. Let us see how well things went in Eliakim’s family, and how much better than formerly.

1. Eli dismissed them from the house of the Lord, when they were too old to minister in the tabernacle; and he laid his hand upon the head of his two sons, with a blessing, v. 20. He blessed as one having authority; The Lord gave thee more children of this woman, for the loan that is lent to the Lord. If Hannah had then had many children, it had not been such a generous piece of piety to part with one out of many for the service of the tabernacle; but when she had but one, an only one, whom she loved, her Isaac, to present him to the Lord, was such an act of heroic piety as should by no means lose its reward. As when Abraham had offered Isaac, he received the promise of a numerous issue, (Gen. 22. 16, 17.) so did Hannah, when she had presented Samuel unto the Lord, a living sacrifice. Note, What is lent to the Lord will certainly be repaid with interest, to our unspeakable advantage, and oftentimes in kind. Hannah resigns one child to God, and is recompensed with five, for Eli’s blessing; or (v. 21.) she bare three sons and two daughters. There is nothing lost by lending to God, or losing for him; it shall be repaid a hundredfold, Matth. 19. 29.

2. They returned to their own habitation; this is twice mentioned; (v. 11. and again v. 20.) it was very pleasant to attend at God’s house, to bless him, and to be blessed of him. But they have a family at home that must be looked after, and thither they return, cheerfully leaving the dear little boy behind them, knowing they left him in a good place; and it does not appear that he cried after them, but was as willing to stay as they were to leave him, so soon did he put away childish things, and behave like a man.

3. They kept up their constant attendance at the house of God, with their yearly sacrifice, v. 19. They did not think that their son’s ministering there would hinder them, knowing that offering must take the benefit of drawing near to God, they would omit no appointed season for it; and now they had one onestone more in Shiloh to draw them thither. We may suppose they went thither to see their child oftener than once a year, for it was not ten miles from Ramah, but their annual visit is taken notice of, because then they brought their yearly sacrifice; and then Hannah fitted up her son (and some think oftener than once a year) with a new suit of clothes, a little coat (v. 19.) and every thing belonging to it. She undertook to find him in clothes during his apprenticeship at the tabernacle, and took care he should be well provided, that he might appear the more decent and sightly in his ministration, and to encourage him in his towardly beginnings. Parents must take care that their children want nothing that is fit for them, whether they are with them or from them; but those that are duteous and hopeful, and minister to the Lord, must be thought worthy of double care and kindness.

4. The child Samuel did very well. Four several times he is mentioned in these verses, and two things were told of:

(1.) The service he did to the Lord. He did well indeed, for he ministered to the Lord, (v. 11. 18.) according as his capacity was; he learnt his catechism, and was constant to his devotions; soon learnt to read, and took a pleasure in the book of the law, and thus he ministered to the Lord. He ministered before Eli, that is, under his inspection, and as he ordered him, not before Eli’s sons; all parties were agreed that they were unfit to be his tutors. Perhaps, he attended immediately on Eli’s person, was ready to him to fetch and bring as he had occasion, and that is called ministering to the Lord. Some little services perhaps he was employed in about the altar, though much under the age appointed by the law for the Levites’ ministration. He could light the candle, or set it up, or run an errand, or shut a door; and because he did this with a pious disposition of mind, it is called ministering to the Lord, and great notice is taken of it. After a while, he did his work so well, that Eli appointed that he should minister with a linen ephod as the priests did, (though he was no priest,) because he saw that God was with him. Note, Little children must learn betimes to minister to the Lord, and God will accept them; particularly, let them learn to pay respect to their teachers as Samuel to Eli. None can begin too soon to be religious. See Ps. 8. 2. and Matth. 21. 15, 16.

(2.) The blessing he received from the Lord, He grew before the Lord, as a tender plant, (v. 21.) grew on (v. 20.) in strength and stature, and especially in wisdom and understanding, and learned for his master. Note, Those young people that serve God as well as they can, he will enable to improve, that they may serve him better. They that are planted in God’s house, shall flourish, Ps. 92. 13. He was in favour with God and with men. Note, It is a great encouragement to children to be tractable, and virtuous, and good betimes, that if they be, both God and man will love them. Such children are the darlings both of heaven and earth. What is here said of Samuel, is said of our blessed Saviour, that great example, Luke 2. 52.

II. Let us now see how ill things went in Eli’s family, though seated at the very door of the tabernacle. The nearer the church, the further from God.

1. The abominable wickedness of Eli’s sons; (v. 12.) The sons of Eli were sons of Belial. It is emphatically expressed. Nothing appears to the contrary, but that Eli himself was a very good man, and, no doubt, had educated his sons well, giving them good instructions, setting them good examples, and putting up many a good prayer for them; and yet, when they grew up, they proved sons of Belial, profane wicked men, and arrant rakes; They knew not the Lord. They could not but have a notional knowledge of God and his law, a fit knowledge; (Rom. 2. 20.) yet because their practice was not accordingly, they are spoken of as wholly ignorant of God; they lived as if they knew nothing at all of God. Note, Parents cannot give grace to their children, nor does it run in the blood.
Many that are sincerely pious themselves, live to see those that come from them, notoriously impious and profane, for the race is not to the swift. Eli was High Priest and Judge in Israel; his sons were priests by their birth; their character was sacred and honourable, and obliged them, for their reputa-tion's sake, to observe decorum: they were resident at the fountain-head both of magistracy and ministry, and yet they were sons of Belial, and their honour, power, and management made them too much the worse. They did not go to serve other gods, as those did that lived at a distance from the altar, for from the house of God they had their wealth and dignity; but, which was worse, they managed the service of God as if he had been one of the dunghill-deities of the heathen. It is hard to say which dishonours God more, idolatry, or profaneness, especially the profaneness of the priest.
Let us see the wickedness of Eli's sons; and it is a sad sight.

(1.) They profaned the offerings of the Lord, and made a gain to themselves, or rather a gratification of their own luxury, out of them. God had provided competently for them out of the sacrifices; the offerings of the Lord made by fire, were a considerable branch of their revenue, but that did not please them, they served not the God of Israel but their own bellies; (Rom. 13. 13.) Let every wise person that has got goods, that he never have enough, Isa. 56. 11.
(1.) They robbed the offerers, and seized for themselves some of their part of the sacrifice of the peace-offerings. The priests had for their share the wave-breast and the heave-shoulder, (Lev. 7.
34.) but that did not content them; when the flesh was boiling for the offerer to feast upon religiously with his friends, they sent a servant with a flesh-hook of three teeth, a trident, and that must be shown out of the offerers' flesh, which was but the priest must have; (v. 13, 14.) and the people, out of their great veneration, suffered this to grow into a custom, so that after a while prescription was pleaded for this manifest wrong. [2.] They stepped in before God himself, and encroached upon his right too; as if it were a small thing to weary men, they wearied my God also, Isa. 7. 13. Be it observed to the Israelites in their church, the priests were yielded to their unwarantable demands from them, yet they were very solicitous that God should not be robbed; Let them not fail to burn the fat presently, v. 16. Let the altar have due, for that is the main matter; unless God have the fat, they can feast with little comfort upon the flesh: it was a shame that the priests should need thus to be admonished by the people of their duty;
but they regarded not the admonition, for they will be served first, and will take what he thinks fit of the fat too, for he is weary of boiled meat; he must have roast, and, in order to that, they must give it him raw; and if the offerer dispute it, though not in his own favour, (let him take what he pleases of his part,) but in favour of the altar, (let them be sure to burn the fat first,) even the priest's servant was grown so very imperious, that he would either have it not taken by force; than which there would not be a greater affront to God, or a greater abuse to the people. The effect was, First, That God was displeased: The sin of the young men was very great before the Lord, v. 17. Nothing is more provoking to God than the profanation of sacred things, and men serving of their lusts with the offerings of the Lord. Secondly, That religion suffered by it; Men abhorred the offerings of the Lord.
A great many, very many, of his management of his offerings, and too many insensibly fell into a contempt of the offerings themselves for their sakes. It was the people's sin to think the worst of God's institutions, but it was the much greater sin of the priests, that gave them occasion to do so. Nothing brings a greater reproach upon religion, than ministers' covetousness, sensuality, and impiousness. In the midst of this sad story, comes in the repeated mention of Samuel's devotion, But Samuel ministered before the Lord, as an instance of the power of God's grace, in preserving him pure and pious, in the midst of this wicked crew; and that helped to keep up the sinking credit of the sanctuary in the minds of the people, why, when they had said all they could against Eli's sons, could not but admire Samuel's seriousness, and speak well of religion for his s.i.e.

(2.) They debauched the women that came to worship at the door of the tabernacle; (v. 22.) they had wives of their own, but were like fed horses, Jer. 5. 8. To have gone to the harlots' houses, the common prostitutes, had been abominable wickedness; but to use the interest which as priests they had in those women that had devout dispositions, and were religiously inclined, and to bring them to commit this wickedness, was such horrid impiety, as one can scarcely think it possible that men who called themselves priests, should ever be guilty of.
Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and tremble, O earth! No words can sufficiently express the vilinity of such practices as these.

2. The reproof which Eli gave his sons for this very wickedness, was very old, (v. 22.) and could not himself inspect the service of the tabernacle as he had done, but left all to his sons, who,
because of the infirmities of his age, slighted him, and did what they would; however, he was told of the wickedness of his sons, and we may well im-gaine what a heart-breaking it was to him, and how much it added to the burthens of his age; but it should seem he did not so much as reprove them, but be heard of their debauching the women, after then he thought fit to give them his check. Had he rebuked them for their greediness and luxury, this might have been prevented. Young people should tell of their faults, as soon as it is perceived that they begin to be extravagant, lest their hearts be hardened. Now concerning the reproof he gave them, observe,

(1.) That it was very just and rational. That which he gave was very proper. [1.] He tells them that the matter of fact was too plain to be denied, and too public to be concealed; I hear of your evil dealings by all this people, v. 23. It is not the surprise of one or two, but the avowed testimony of many, all your neighbours cry out shame on you, and bring their complaints to me, expecting that I should redress the grievance. [2.] He shows them the bad consequences of it, that they not only sinned, but made Israel to sin, and would have the people's sin to answer for, as well as their own;
[3.] You that should turn men from iniquity, (Mal. 2.
6.) you make the Lord's people to transgress, and corrupt the nation instead of reforming it; you tempt people to go serve other gods, when they see the God of Israel so ill served. [3.] He warns them of the danger they brought themselves into by it;
(v. 25.) he intimates to them what God afterward told him, that the iniquity would not be purged with sacrifice nor offering, ch. 3. 14. If one man sin against another, the judge, that is, the priest, who was appointed to be the judge in many cases, (Deut.
17. 9.) shall judge him, shall undertake his cause, arbitrate the matter, and make atonement for the offender; but if a man sin against the Lord, that is, if a priest profane the holy things of the Lord, if a man that deals with God for others, deal with himself, what could be worse? Eli was himself a judge, and had often made intercession for transg-gressors, but, says he, You that sin against the Lord, that is, against the law and honour of God, in those very things which immediately per-

I. SAMUEL, II.

27. And there came a man of God unto Eli, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Did I plainly appear unto the house of thy father, when they were in Egypt in Pharaoh’s house? 28. And did I choose him out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priest, to offer upon mine altar, to burn incense, to wear an ephod before me? and did I give unto the house of thy father all the offerings made by fire of the children of Israel? 29. Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice and at mine offering, which I have commanded in my habitation, and honourest thy sons above me, to make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings of Israel my people? 30. Wherefore the Lord God of Israel saith, I said indeed that thy house, and the house of thy father, should walk before me for ever: but now the Lord saith, Be it far from me; for them that honour me I will honour; and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed. 31. Behold, the days come that I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father’s house, that there shall not be an old man in thine house. 32. And thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation, in all the wealth which God shall give Israel: and there shall not be an old man in thine house for ever. 33. And the man of thine, whom I shall not cut off from mine altar, shall be to consume thine eyes, and to grieve thine heart: and all the increase of thine house shall die in the flower of their age. 34. And this shall be a sign unto thee, that shall come upon thy two sons, on Hophni and Phinehas: in one day they shall die both of them. 35. And I will raise me up a faithful priest, that shall do according to that which is in my heart, and in my mind: and I will build him a sure house; and he shall walk before mine Anointed for ever. 36. And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left in thine house shall come and crouch to him for a piece of silver and a morsel of bread, and shall say, Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priest’s offices, that I may eat a piece of bread.

Eli reproved his sons too gently, and did not threaten them as he should, and therefore God sent a prophet to him to reprove him sharply, and to threaten him, because, by his indulgence of them, he had strengthened their hands in their wickedness. If good men be wanting in their duty, and by their carelessness and remissness contribute anything to the sin of sinners they must expect both to hear of it, and to smart for it. Eli’s family was now nearer to God than all the families of the earth, and therefore he will punish them, Amos 3. 2. The message is sent to Eli himself, because God would bring him to repentance and save him; not to his son whom he had determined to destroy. And it might have been a means of awakening him to his duty at last, and so to have prevented the judgment; but we do not find it had any great effect upon him.

The message this prophet delivers from God, is very close.

I. He reminds him of the great things God had done for the house of his fathers, and for his family. He appeared to Aaron in Egypt, (Exod. 4. 27.) in the house of bondage, as a token of further favour which he designed for him, v. 28. He advanced him to the priesthood, entitled it upon his family, and thereby dignified it above any of the families of Israel. He intrusted him with honourable work, to offer on God’s altar, to burn incense, and to wear that ephod in which was the breast-plate of judgment. He settled upon him an honourable maintenance, as a token out of all the offerings made by fire, v. 28. What could he have done more for them, to engage them to be faithful to him? Note. The distinguishing favours we have received from God, especially those of the spiritual priesthood, are great aggravations of sin, and will be remembered against us in the day of account, if we profane our crown, and betray our trust, Deut. 32. 6. 2 Sam. 12. 7, 8.

II. He exhibits a high charge against him and his family; his children did wickedly, and he connived at it, and thereby involved himself in the guilt; the indictment therefore runs against them.
I. His sons had improperly profaned the holy things of God; "Ye kick at my sacrifice which I have commanded; not only trample upon the institution as a mean thing, but spurn at it as a thing you hate to be tied up to." They did the utmost despite imaginable to the offerings of the Lord, when they committed all that outrage and rapine about them that we read of, and violently plundered the Lord's house; and in effect, as was written, (Zech. 14. 20) and took that to themselves, which God had appointed to be burned on his altar. 2. Eli had bolstered them up in it, by not punishing their insolence and impertinency; "Thou for thy part honourest thy sons above me," that is, "Thou hast rather see my offerings disgraced by their profanation of them, than see thy sons disgraced by a legal censure upon them for so doing, which ought to have been upon them," that is, presumption and deprivation ab officio et beneficio—of their office and its emoluments. Those that allow and countenance their children in any evil way, and do not use their authority to restrain and punish them, do in effect honour them more than God, being more tender of their reputation than of his glory, and more desirous to humour them than to honour him. 3. Those who are all shrewd in the gains of the sacrilege, it is to be feared, shall be Eli himself, though he disliked and reproved the abuses committed, yet did not forbear to eat of the consecrated meat they sacrilegiously got; (v. 15.) he was a fat (like a) heavy man; (ch. 4. 18.) and therefore it is charged upon the whole family, (though Hophni and Phinehas were principally guilty,) Ye make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings. God gave them a sufficient to feed them, but that would not suffice; they made themselves fat, and served their lusts, with that which God was to be served with. See Hierae, 4. 8.

III. He declares the cutting off of the entail of the high-priesthood from his family; (v. 30.) "The Lord God of Israel, who is jealous for his own honour and Israel's, says, and lets them know it, that thy commission is revoked and superseded. I said, indeed, that thou house, and the house of thy father Ithamar, (for from that younger son of Aaron, Eli was descended,) should walk before me for ever. Upon what occasion the dignity of the high-priesthood was transferred from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, does not appear; but it seems it had been done, and Eli stood fair to have that honour perpetuated to his posterity; but observe, this was disallowed by God’s own ordination and arrangement with it, They shall walk before me for ever; and that is, There shall have the honour, provided they faithfully do the service; walking before God is the great condition of the covenant, Gen. 17. 1. Let them set me before their face, and I will set them before my face continually; (Ps. 41. 12.) otherwise not. But now the Lord says, Be it far from me: Now that ye cast me off, you can expect no other than that I should cast you off; you will not walk before me as you should, and therefore you shall not; such wicked and abusive servants God will discard, and turn out of his service. Some think there is a further reach in this recall of the grant, and that it was not only to be fulfilled shortly in the deposing of the posterity of Eli, when Zadok, who descended from Eleazar, was put in Abiathar’s room, but it was to have its complete accomplishment at length in the actual establishment of the Levitical priesthood by the priesthood of Christ.

IV. He gives a good reason for this revocation, taken from a settled and standing rule of God’s government, according to which, all must expect to be dealt with; (like that by which Cain was tried, Gen. 4. 7.) Then that honour me, I will honour; and they that despise me, shall be lightly esteemed. Observe in general, 1. That God is the Fountain of honour and dishonour; he can exalt the meanest, and put contempt upon the greatest. 2. As we deal with God, we must expect to be dealt with by him, and yet, more favourably than we deserve. See Ps. 18. 25, 26. Particularly be it spoken, (1.) To the everlasting reputation of religion and serious godliness, that it gives honour to God, and puts honour upon men. Below we seek and serve the glory of God, and he will be behind hand with none that do so, but here and hereafter will secure their glory. The way to be truly great, is to be truly good. If we humble and deny ourselves in any thing to honour God, and have a single eye to him in it, we may depend upon this promise, he will put the best honour upon us. See John 12. 26. (2.) Be it spoken to the everlasting reproach of impious profaneness, that this does dishonour to God, (despises the greatest of blessings, his angels adore,) and will bring dishonour upon men, for they that do so, shall be lightly esteemed; not only God will lightly esteem them, (that, perhaps, they will not regard, as they that honour him value his honour, of whom therefore it is said, I will honour them,) but they shall be lightly esteemed by all the world, the very honour they are proud of shall be taken away; they shall see themselves despised by all mankind, and by all the highest; when they are gone, their memory shall rot, and when they rise, again, it shall be to everlasting shame and contempt. The honour which their important malice puts upon God and his omnipotent justice, will return upon their own heads, Ps. 79. 17.

V. He foretells the particular judgments, which should come upon his family, to its perpetual ignominy. A curse should be entailed upon his posterity, and a terrible curse it is; and shows how jealous God is in the matters of his worship, and how ill he takes it, when those who are obliged by their character and profession to preserve and advance the interests of his glory, are false to their trust, and betray them. If God’s ministers be vicious and profane, how much more punishment shall they be thought worthy of, here and for ever, than other sinners! Let such read the doom here passed on Eli’s house and temple. It is threatened, 1. That their power should be broken; (v. 31.) I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father’s house; they should bestripped of all their authority, should be deposed, and have no influence upon the people as they had had: God would make them contemptible and base. See Mal. 2. 8. 9. The sons had abused their power to oppress people and enroach upon their rights, and the father had not used his power as he ought to have done, to restrain and punish them, and therefore it is justly threatened, that the arm should be cut off, which was not stretched out as it should have been. 2. That their lives should be shortened; he was himself an old man; but instead of using the wisdom, gravity, expense, and authority, of his age, for the good of God and the support of religion, he had suffered the infirmities of age to make him more cool and remiss in his duty, and therefore it is here threatened, that none of his posterity should live to be old: (v. 31. 32.) it is twice spoken; There shall not be an old man in thy house for ever; and again, (v. 33.) All the increase of thine house, from generation to generation, shall die in the flower of their age, when they are in the midst of the years of their service; so that though the family should not be extinct, yet it should never be considerable, nor should any of it come to be eminent in their day. Bishop Patrick relates it, out of some of the Jewish writers, that, long after this, there being a family in Jerusalem, none of which commonly lived above eighteen years, upon search it was found that they descended from the house of Eli, on which this sentence was passed.
3. That all their consorts should be imibittered.
(1.) The comfort they had in the sanctuary, in its wealth and prosperity; Thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation. This was fulfilled in the Philistines' invasions, and the mischiefs they did to Israel, by which the country was impoverished, (ch. 13. 19.)
and, no doubt, the priests' incomes were thereby very much impaired. The captivity of the ark was such an act of hostility, committed upon God's habitation, as broke Eli's heart. As it is a blessing to a family to see peace upon Israel, (Ps. 128. 5, 6.)
so the contrary is a sore judgment upon a family, especially a family of priests. 2. The comfort of their children. The man of thine, whom I shall not cut off by an untimely death, shall live to be a blot and burden to the family, a scandal and vexation to his relations; he shall be to consume thine eyes, and grieve thine heart, either for his foolishness, or his sickness, or his wickedness, or his poverty. Grief for a dead child is great; but for a bad child often greater.
4. That their substance should be wasted, and they should be reduced to extreme poverty; (v. 36.) He that is left alive in thy house, shall have little joy of his life, for want of a livelihood he shall come to those who have little bread or a substance. (1.) He shall beg for the smallest alms, a piece of silver, and the word signifies the least piece, and a morsel of bread. See how this answered the sin. Eli's sons must have the bespieces of flesh, but their sons will be glad of a morsel of bread. Note, Want is the just punishment of wantonness. Those who could not be content without dainties and varieties, are brought, they, or this truth, and their sons as a matter of necessity, to beg. There is a famine as to what is necessary in the Lord to the church. (2.) He shall beg for the meanest office; Put me into somewhat belonging to the priesthood, as it is in the original, make me as one of the hired servants; the fittest place for a prodigal.
Plenty and power are forfeited, when they are abused. They should not be able to pretend to any good preferment, not to any place at the altar, but should petition for some poor employment, be this cruel as hath been, and even the lowest place, so they might but get bread. This, it is probable, was fully accomplished, when Abiathar, who was
of Eli's race, was deposed by Solomon for treason, and he and his turned out of office in the temple, (1 Kings 2. 26, 27.) by which it is easy to think his posterity were reduced to the extremities here described.
5. That God would shortly begin to execute these judgments in the death of Hophni and Phine-has, the sad tidings of which Eli himself should live to hear; This shall be a sign to thee, v. 34. When thou hearest it, say, "Now the word of God begins to operate; here is one threatening fulfilled, from which I infer that all the rest will be fulfilled in their order." Hophni and Phinehas had many a time sinned together, and it is here foretold that they should die together both in one day. Bind these two in a bundle for the fire. It was fulfilled, ch. 4. 11.
Lastly, In the midst of all these threatenings against the house of Eli, here is mercy promised to Israel; (v. 35.) I will raise me up a faithful priest.
1. This was fulfilled in Zadoc, one of the family of Eleazar, who came into Abiathar's place, in the beginning of Solomon's reign, and was faithful to his trust, and he and his hearkened to the voice of the people as long as the Levitical priesthood continued.
Note, The wickedness of ministers, though it destroy themselves, yet it shall not destroy the ministry. How bad soever the officers are, the office shall continue always to the end of the world. If some falsify their trust, yet others shall be raised up, that will be true to it. God's work shall never fail to the ground for want of hands to carry it on.
The High Priest is here said to walk before God's anointed, that is, David and his seed, because he was the breast-plate of judgment, which he was to consult, not in common cases, but for the king, in the affairs of state. Note, Notwithstanding the degeneracy we see and lament in many families, God will secure to himself a succession. If some grow worse than their ancestors, others, to balance that, shall grow better. 2. It has its full accomcomplishment in the priesthood of Christ, that merciful and faithful High Priest, whom God raised up when the Levitical priesthood was destroyed, who in all things did his father's mind, and for whom God would build a sure house, build it on a rock, so that the gates of hell cannot prevail against it.

CHAP. III.

In the foregoing chapter we had Samuel a young priest, though by birth a Levite only, for he ministered before the Lord in a linen ephod; in this chapter we have him a young prophet, which was more; he was a man of many manner revealing himself to him, and in him reviving, if not commencing, prophecy in Israel. Here is, I. God's first manifestation of himself in an extraordinary manner to Samuel, v. 1, 2. 2. The message he sent by him to Eli, 11, 14. 3. The faithful delivery of that message to Eli, and his submission to the righteousness of God in it, v. 11, 18. 4. The establishment of Samuel to be a prophet in Israel, v. 18, 21.

1. And the child Samuel ministered unto the Lord before Eli. And the word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision. 2. And it came to pass at that time, when Eli was laid down in his place, and his eyes began to wax dim, that he could not see; 3. And there the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was, and Samuel was laid down to sleep; 4. That the Lord called Samuel: and he answered, Here am I. 5. And he ran unto Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou calldst me. And he said, I called not; lie down again.
And he went and lay down. 6. And the Lord called yet again, Samuel. And Samuel arose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me.
And he answered, I called not, my son; lie down again. 7. Now Samuel did not yet know the Lord, neither was the word of the Lord yet revealed unto him. 8. And the Lord called Samuel again the third time. And he arose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me.
And Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child. 9. Therefore Eli said unto Samuel, Go, lie down: and it shall be, if he call thee, that thou shalt say, Speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth. So Samuel went and lay down in his place. 10. And the Lord came, and stood, and called as at other times, Samuel, Samuel. Then Samuel answered, Speak: for thy servant heareth.
I. To make way for the account of God's revealing himself first to Samuel, we are here told, (v. 1.)

1. How industrious Samuel was in serving God, according as his place and capacity were; (v. 1.) The child Samuel, though but a child, ministered unto the Lord before Eli. It was an aggravation of the wickedness of Eli's sons, that the child Samuel shamed them: They brought offerings into the Lord's sanctuary, but Samuel ministered to him; they slighted their father's admonitions, but Samuel was observant of them, he ministered before Eli, under his eye and direction. It was the praise of Samuel, that he was so far from being influenced by their bad example, that he did not in the least fall off, but improved and went on. And it was a preparative for the honours God intended him; he had a mind and talent that was fitted for them. He was not contrusted with much more. Let those that are young, be humble and diligent, and they will find that the surest way to preferment. Those are fittest to rule, that have learnt to obey. 2. How scarce a thing prophecy then was which made the call of Samuel to be the greater surprise to himself, and the greater favour to Israel; The word of the Lord was precious in those days. Now and then a man of God was an extraordinary messenger; (as ch. 2. 27.) but there was no settled prophets, to whom the people might have recourse for counsel, nor from whom they might expect the discoveries of the divine will. And the rarity of prophecy made it the more precious in the account of those that knew how to put a right value upon it. It was precious, for what there was, (it seems,) was private, there was no open vision, that is, there were none that were publicly known to have visions. Perhaps, the impiety and impurity that prevailed in the tabernacle, and, no doubt, corrupted the whole nation, had provoked God, as a token of his displeasure, to withdraw the Spirit of prophecy; till the decree was gone forth for the raising up of a more faithful priest, and then, as an earnest of that, this faithful prophet was raised up.

The manner of God's revealing himself to Samuel is here related very particularly, for it was uncommon.

I. Eli was retired; Samuel had waited on him to his bed, and the rest that attended the service of the sanctuary, were gone, we may suppose, to their several apartments; (v. 2.) Eli was laid down in his place, he went to bed betimes, being unfit for business, and soon weary of it, and perhaps loving his ease too well. Perhaps, he was too much given to nurse his sons, which grieved his sons the greater liberty. And he sought retirement the more, because his eyes began to wax dim, an affliction which came justly upon him for winking at his sons' faults.

II. Samuel was laid down to sleep, in some closet near to Eli's room, as his place of the back-stairs, ready within call, if the old man should want any thing in the night; perhaps to read to him, if he could not sleep; or to take his chamber office rather than any of his own family, because of the toady disposition he observed in him. When his own sons were a grief to him, his little servitor was his joy. Let those that are afflicted in their children, thank God if they have any about them, in whom they are comforted. Samuel was laid down ere the lamp of God went out; (v. 3.) it should seem he lay somewhere so near the lamp place, that he was the first to rise, before any of the lamps in the branches of the candlestick went out, (for the main lamp never went out,) which, probably, was toward midnight; till that time, Samuel had been employing himself in some good exercise or other, reading and prayer, or perhaps cleaning or making ready the holy place; and then went softly to his bed. Then we may expect God's gracious visits, when we are constant and diligent in our duty.

III. God called him by name, and he took it for Eli's call, and ran to him, v. 4. 5. Samuel lay awake in his bed, his thoughts, no doubt, well employed, (as David's, Ps. 63. 6.) when the Lord called him. (But the Chaldec paraphr. thinks, out of the holy place, and the Chaldec paraphr. reads it, A voice was heard out of the temple of the Lord; but Eli, though it is likely he lay nearer, heard it not; yet, possibly, it might come some other way. Hereupon, we have an instance, 1. Of Samuel's industry, and readiness to wait on Eli; supposing it was he that called him, he hastened out of his warm bed, and ran to him, to see if he wanted anything; or, there was some thing he was not well, nor his situation, if it was the Lord, who said, "Here am I," said he. As a Lord's servants, to come when they are called; and to the younger, not only to submit to the elder, but to be careful and tender of them. 2. Of his inconstancy, and unacquaintedness with the visions of the Al mighty, that he took that to be only Eli's call, which was really the call of God. Such mistakes as these we make oftener than we think of. God can call any thing, as well as Eli, as the call of the minister, and answer it accordingly; calls to us by his providences, and we look only at the instruments. His voice cries, and it is but here and there a man of wisdom that understands it to be his voice. Eli assured him he did not call him, yet did not chide him for disturbing him with being over officious; did not call him a fool, and tell him he dreamed, but mildly bade him lie down again, he had nothing for him to do. If servants must be ready at their masters' call, masters also must be tender of their servants' comfort, that they may not be servant and thy maid servant may rest as well as thou. So Samuel went and lay down. God calls many by the ministry of the word, and they say, as Samuel did, Here am I; but not looking at God, not discerning his voice in the call, the impressions of it are soon lost; they lay down again, and their convictions come to nothing.

IV. The same call was repeated, and the same mistake made, a second and third time, v. 6-9. 1. God continued to call the child: yet again, (v. 6.) and again the third time, v. 8. Note, The call which divine grace designs to make effectual, shall be repeated till it is so; that is, till we come at the call, for the purpose of God, according to which we are called, shall certainly stand. 2. Samuel was still a wonder at it that it was the Lord, who spake by Samuel in his chamber office, and not by a familiar spirit, who was at the time another, but afterward he understood better. The witness of the Spirit in the hearts of the faithful, is often thus mistaken, by which means they lose the comfort of it; and the strivings of the Spirit with the consciences of sinners are likewise often mistaken, and so the benefit of their convictions is lost: God speaketh once, ye twice, but man perceiveth it not, Job 33. 14. 5. Samuel went to...
Now also the call was doubled, Samuel, Samuel, as if God delighted in the mention of his name; or to intimate that now he should be made to understand who spake to him. God hath spoken once, twice have I heard this, Ps. 62. 11. It was an honour to hear, that God was pleased to know him by name; (Exod. 33. 12.) 2. And Samuel did shew himself ready and effectual, when he called him by name, and so brought it particularly to him, as Saul, Saul. Thus God called to Abraham by name, Gen. 22. 1.

Samuel said as he was taught, Speak, for thy servant heareth. Note, Good words should be put into children's mouths betimes, and apt expressions of pious and devout affections, by which they may be prepared, and not kept in the dark, to acquaint with divine things, and trained up to a sincere heart, in the sight of God. Teach young people what they shall say, for they cannot order their speech by reason of darkness. Samuel did not now rise and run as before, when he thought Eli called, but lay still and listened. The more sedate and composed our spirits are, the better prepared they are for divine discoveries. Let all tumultuous thoughts and passions be kept under, and every thing be quiet and serene in the soul, and then we are fit to hear from God. We must be silent, when he speaks. But Observe, Samuel left out one word; he did not say, Speak, Lord, but only, Speak, for thy servant heareth, perhaps, as Bishop Patrick suggests, out of uncertainty whether it was God that spoke to him or no. However, by this answer, Speak, for thy servant heareth, way was made for the message he was now to receive, and Samuel was brought acquainted with the words of God, and visions of the Almighty; and this ere the lamp of God went out, (v. 3.) in the temple of the Lord, which some of the Jewish writers put a mystical sense upon: before the fall of Eli, and the eclipsing of the Urim and Thummim for some time thereby, God called Samuel and made him an oracle; whence they have an observation among their doctors, That the sun riseth, and the sun goeth down; (Eccl. 1. 3.) that is, say they, Ere God maketh the sun of one righteous man to set, he makes the sun of another righteous man to rise.

Smith ex Kimchi.

11. And the Lord said to Samuel, Behold, I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle. 12. In that day I will perform against Eli all things which I have spoken concerning his house: when I begin, I will also make an end. 13. For I have told him, that I will judge his house for ever, for the iniquity which he knoweth; because his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. 14. And therefore I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever. 15. And Samuel lay until the morning, and opened the doors of the house of the Lord: and Samuel feared to show Eli the vision. 16. Then Eli called Samuel, and said, Samuel, my son. And he answered, Here am I. 17. And he said, What is the thing that the Lord hath said unto thee? I pray thee hide it not from me: God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing from me of all the things that he said unto thee. 18. And Samuel told him every whit, and hid nothing from him. And he said, It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good.

Here is,

1. The message which, after all this introduction, God delivered to Samuel concerning Eli's house. God did not come to him now, to tell him how great a man he should be in his day, when a figure he should make, and what a blessing he should be to Israel. Young people have commonly a great curiosity to be told their fortune, but God came to Samuel, not to gratify his curiosity, but to employ him in his service, and send him on an errand to another person, which was much better; and yet the matter of this first message, which, no doubt, made a very great impression upon him, might be of good use to him afterward, when his own sons proved, though not so bad as Eli's, yet not so good as they should have been, ch. 8. 3.

The message is short, not near so long as that which the man of God brought; (ch. 2. 27.) for Samuel being a child, it could not be expected he should remember a long message, and God considered his frame. The memories of children must not be overcharged, nor not with divine things. But it is a sad message, a message of wrath, to rally the messengers. If they offer no evidence there pronounced, because perhaps Eli did not give so much regard to that as he ought to have done. Divine threatenings, the less they are heeded, the surer they will come, and the heavier they will fall. Reference is here had to what was there said concerning both the sin and the punishment.

1. Concerning the sin, it is the iniquity that he knew not, ch. 13. The man of God told him of it, and many a time his own conscience had told him of it. O what a great deal of guilt and corruption is there in us, concerning which we may say, "It is the iniquity which our own heart knoweth; we are conscious to ourselves of it!" In short, the iniquity was this, his sons made themselves vile, and he restranthem not. Or, as it is in the Hebrew, he frowned not upon them. If he did show his dislike to their wicked courses, yet not to that degree that he ought to have done: he did reproce them, but he did not punish them, for the mischief they did, nor deprive them of their power to do mischief, which, as a father, High Priest, and judge, he might have done. Note, (1.) Sinners do by their own wickedness make themselves vile. They debrach themselves, for every man is tempted, when he is drawn aside of his own lusts; (Jam. 1. 14.) and thereby they debase themselves, and make themselves not only mean, but odious to the holy God, and holy men and angels. Sin is a vile thing, and vilifies men more than any thing, Ps. 15. 4. Eli's sons made light of God, and made his offerings vile in the people's eyes; but the shame returned into their own bosom, they made themselves vile. (2.) Those that do not restrain the sins of others, when it is in the power of their hand to do it, make themselves partakers of the guilt, and will be charged as accessories. Those in authority will have a great deal to answer for, if they make not the word they hear, a terror to evil workers.

2. Concerning the punishment, it is that which I have spoken concerning his house; (v. 12. and v. 13.) I have told him, that I will judge his house for ever; that is, that a curse should be entailed upon his family from generation to generation. The particulars of this curse we had before; they are not here repeated, but it is added.

(1.) That when that sentence began to be executed, it would be very dreadful and amazing to all Israel; (v. 11.) Both the ears of every one that hears it shall tingle. Every Israelite would be struck with terror and astonishment, to hear of the slaying of Eli's sons, the breaking of Eli's neck, and the dispersion of Eli's family. Lord, how terrible art thou in thy judgments! If this be done in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? Note, God's judgments upon others should affect us with a holy fear, Ps. 119. 120.

(2.) That these direful first-fruits of the execution would be certain earnest of the prosperous full accomplishment of it. "When I begin, I will proceed, and make an end of all I have threatened," v. 12. It is intimated that it might, possibly, be some time before he would begin, but let them not call that forbearance an acquittance, nor that reprieve a pardon; for when at length he does begin, he will make thorough work of it, and though he stay long, he will strike home. (3.) That no room should be left for hope that this sentence might be reversed, and the execution stayed or mitigated, v. 14. [1.] God would not revoce the sentence, for he backed it with an oath; I have sworn to the house of Eli: and God will not go back from what he hath sworn, either in mercy or judgment. [2.] He would never come to a composition for the forfeiture. The iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering, etc. Every punishment shall be made for sin, not any abatement of the punishment.

This was the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, that there were iniquities which they did not reach, which they would not purge; but the blood of Christ cleanses from sin, and secures all those that by faith are interested in it, from that eternal death which is the wages of sin.

II. The deliverer of this message to Eli. Observate,

1. Samuel's modest concealment of it, v. 15. (1.) He lay till the morning, and we may well suppose he lay awake pondering on what he had heard, repe-ting it to himself, and considering what use he must make of it. After we have received the spiritual food of God's word, it is good to compose ourselves and give it time to digest. (2.) He opened the doors of the house of the Lord, in the morning, and he called the priests, and took them into the holy of holies. That he should do so at other times, was an instance of extraordinary tardiness in a child, but that he should do so this morning, was an instance of great humility. God had highly honoured him above all the children of his people, yet he was not proud of the honour, nor puffed up with it; did not think himself too great and too good to be employed in these mean and servile offices, but, as cherishing his servant, went and opened the doors of the tabernacle. Note, Those whom God manifests himself to, he makes and keeps low in their own eyes, and willing to stoop to any thing by which they may be serviceable to his glory, though but as door-keepers in his house. One would have expected that Samuel should have been so full of his vision, as to forget his ordinary service; that he should have gone among his companions, as one in ex-

"cency, to tell them what converse he had with God this night; but he modestly keeps it to himself, tells the vision to no man, but silently goes on in his business. Our secret communion with God is not to be proclaimed on the house tops. (3.) He feared to show Eli the vision. If he was afraid that Eli would be angry with him, and chide him, it will give us cause to suspect that Eli used to be as severe with this tenderly child, as he was indulgent to his own ways; and that that will bear hard upon him. But we will suppose it was rather because he was afraid to grieve and trouble the good old man, that he was so shy. If he had run immediately with the tidings to Eli, it would have looked as if he desired the woful day, and hoped to build his own family upon the ruin of Eli's, therefore it became him not to be forward to do it; no good man can take pleasure in bringing evil tidings, especially not Samuel to Eli, the pupil to the tutor whom he loved and revered.

2. Eli's careful inquiry into it; (v. 16, 17.) as soon as ever he heard Samuel stirring, he called for him, probably, to his bed-side; and having perceived before, that God had spoken to him, he obliged him, not only by importunity, I pray thee, hide it not from me, but, finding him timorous and backward, by an adjuration likewise, God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing from me! He had too reason to fear that the message prophesied no good concerning him, but evil; and yet, because it was a message from God, he could not contentedly be ignorant of it. A good man desires to be acquainted with all the will of God, whether it make for, or against him. His adjuration, God do so to thee, if thou hide any thing from me, may intimate the fearful doom of unfaithful watchmen; if they warn not sinners, they bring upon themselves and care, which they should have denounced in God's name, against those that go on still in their trespasses.

3. Samuel's faithful delivery of his message at last; (v. 18.) He told him every whit; when he saw that he must tell him, he never minced the matter, nor offered to make it better than it was, to blunt that which was sharp, or to gild the bitter pill, but delivered the message as plainly and fully as he received it, not shunning to declare the whole counsel of God. Christ's ministers must deal thus faithfully.

4. Eli's pious acquiescence in it: he did not question Samuel's integrity, was not cross with him, nor had he any thing to object against the equity of the sentence; he did not complain of the punishment, as Cain did, that it was greater than either he deserved or could bear, but patiently submitted, and accepted the punishment of his iniquity; It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good. He understood the sentence to intend only a temporal punishment, and the entail of disgrace and poverty upon his posterity, and not a final separation of them from the favour of God, and therefore he cheerfully submitted; did not repine, because he knew the demerits of his family; nor did he now intercede for the reversing of the sentence, because God had ratified it with a solemn oath, of which he would not repent: he therefore composed himself into an humble resignation to God's will, as Aaron, in a case not much unlike; (Lev. 10. 3.) He held his peace. In a few words, (1.) He lays down this satisfying truth, "It is the Lord; it is he that pronounces the judgment, from whose bar there lies no appeal, and against whose sentence there lies no exception. It is he that will execute the judgment, whose hand cannot be resisted, whose arm assailed, or sovereignty contested. It is the Lord, who will thus sanctify and glorify himself, and it is highly fit he should. It is the Lord, with whom there is no unrighteousness, who never did nor ever will do any wrong to any of his creatures, nor exact more than their iniquity deserves." (2.) He infers from it this satisfying conclusion, "Let him do what seemeth him good; I have nothing to say against his proceedings; he is righteous in all his ways, and by his will his word therefore his will be done. I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him." Thus we ought to quiet ourselves under God's reproofs, and never to strive with our Maker.

19. And Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him, and did let none of his words fall to the ground. 20. And all Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord.

21. And the Lord appeared again in Shiloh: for the Lord revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the Lord. Samuel being thus brought acquainted with the visions of God, we have here an account of the further honour done him as a prophet.

1. God did him honour. Having begun to favour him, he carried on and crowned his own work in him; (v. 19.) Samuel grew, for the Lord was with him. All our increase in wisdom and grace, is owing to the presence of God with us; it is all in all to our growth. God honoured Samuel, (1.) By further manifestations of himself to him. Samuel had faithfully delivered the messages he was intrusted with, and therefore God employed him again in his service; (v. 21.) The Lord revealed him if again to Samuel in Shiloh. Note; God will graciously repeat his visits to those that receive them aright. (2.) By fulfilling what he spake by him; (v. 19.) God did let none of his words fall to the ground; whatever Samuel said, as a prophet, it proved true; more was not wanting in the seasons. Probably, there were some remarkable instances of the truth of Samuel's predictions, that happened soon after, which confirmed those that were afterward to be fulfilled, and gave general satisfaction as to his mission. God will confirm the word of his servants, and perform the counsels of his messengers, (Isa. 44. 26.) and do what he hath said.

2. Israel did him honour. They all knew, and owned that Samuel was established to be a prophet, v. 20. (1.) He was famous; all that came up to Shiloh to worship, took notice of him, and admired him, and talked of him when they came home. Early piety will be the greatest honour of young people, and bring them, as much as any thing, and as soon, into reputation. Them that honour God he will honour. (2.) He grew useful and very serviceable to his generation. He that began betimes to be good, soon came to do good. His established commission, his exalted commission, and established reputation with the people, gave him a great opportunity of shining as a light in Israel. When old Eli was rejected, young Samuel was established; for God will never leave himself without a witness, nor his church without a guide.

CHAP. IV.

The predictions in the foregoing chapter, concerning the ruin of Eli's house, here begin to be fulfilled; how long after, does not appear; but it was not long. Such sinners God often makes quick work with. Here is, 1. The disgrace and loss Israel sustained in consequence with the Philistines, v. 1-5. II. Their foolish project to fortify themselves, by bringing the ark of God into their camp among the shoulders of Hophni and Phinehas, v. 3, 4. which made them secure, v. 5. and struck a fear into the Philistines, but such a fear as cowed them, v. 6-9. III. The fatal consequences of it; Israel was beaten, and the ark taken prisoner, v. 10, 11. IV. The tidings of this brought to Shiloh, and the sad reception of those tidings. 1. The city was taken into confusion, v. 12, 13. 2. Eli fainted away, fell, and broke his neck, v. 14-18. 3. His daughter-in-law fell in labour upon it, bore a son, but died immediately, v. 19, 22. These were the things which would make the ears of those heard them, to tingle.

1. And the word of Samuel came to all Israel. Now Israel went out against the Philistines to battle, and pitched beside Eben-ezer; and the Philistines pitched in
I. SAMUEL, iv.

Aphik. 2. And the Philistines put themselves in array against Israel: and when they joined battle, Israel was smitten before the Philistines; and they slew of the army in the field about four thousand men.

And when the people were come into the camp, the elders of Israel said, Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us to-day before the Philistines? Let us fetch the ark of the covenant out of Shiloh unto us, that, when it cometh among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies. 4. So the people sent to Shiloh, that they might bring from hence the ark of the covenant of the Lord of hosts, which dwelleth between the cherubims: and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were there with the ark of the covenant of God. 5. And when the ark of the covenant of the Lord came into the camp, all Israel shouted with a great shout, so that the earth rang again. 6. And when the Philistines heard the noise of the shout, they said, What meaneth this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? And they understood that the ark of the Lord was come into the camp. 7. And the Philistines were afraid; for they said, God is come into the camp. And they said, Woe unto us! for there hath not been such a thing heretofore. 8. Woe unto us! who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty Gods? these are the Gods that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness. 9. Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines, that ye be not servants unto the Hebrews, as they have been to you: quit yourselves like men, and fight.

The first words which relate to Samuel, that his words came to all Israel, seem not to have any reference to the following story, as if it was by any direction of his, that the Israelites went out against the Philistines; had they consulted him, though but newly initiated as a prophet, it might have stood them in more stead than the ark did; but perhaps the princes of Israel despised his youth, and would not have recourse to him as an oracle, and he did not as yet interpose in public affairs; nor do we find any mention of his name from henceforward, till some years after; (ch. 7. 3.) only his words came to all Israel; that is, people from all parts, that were piously disposed, had recourse to him as a prophet, and advised with him. Perhaps, it is more probable they acted without the advice of Eli, who was generally known and talked of, and all that were serious and observing, compared the events here related, when they came to pass, with that prophecy, and saw it accomplished in them.

Here is,

1. A war entered into with the Philistines, v. 1. It was an attempt to throw off the yoke of their oppression, and would have succeeded better, if they had first repented and reformed, and so begun their work at the right end. It is computed that this was about the middle of the forty years' dominion that the Philistines had over Israel, (Judg. 13. 1.) and soon after the death of Samuel; so Bishop Patrick, who thinks the slaughter he made of the Philistines, might encourage this attempt: but Dr. Lightfoot reckons it forty years after Samuel's death, for so long Eli judged, v. 18.

II. The defeat of Israel in that war, v. 2. Israel, who were the aggressors, were smitten, and had four thousand men killed upon the spot. God had promised that one of them should chase a thousand; but now it is quite the contrary, Israel is smitten before the Philistines. So, the accused wrong, was in the camp, and gave their enemies all the advantage against them, they could wish for.

III. The measures they concerted for another engagement; a council of war was called, and, instead of resolving to fast and pray, and amend their lives, so ill taught were they, (and no wonder, when they had such teachers,) that, 1. They quarrelled with God for appearing against them; (v. 3.) Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us? If they meant this as an inquiry into the cause of God's displeasure, they needed not to go far to find that out; it was plain enough Israel had sinned, though they were not willing to see it and own it; but it rather seems that they expostulate boldly with God about it, are dispelled at what God had done, and dispute it with him. They own the hand of God in their trouble, and at the same time, (and that more truly) "It is we, not God, that are at fault with us," but, instead of submitting to it, they quarrel with it, and speak as those that were angry at him and his providence, and not aware of any just provocation they had given him. "Wherefore shall we, that are Israelites, be smitten before the Philistines? How absurd and unjust is it?" Note, The foolishness of man perverts his way, and then his heart frets against the Lord, (Prov. 19. 3.) and fits himself to be vilely punished; (v. 3.) he did oblige him to appear for them the next time, by bringing the ark into their camp. The elders of Israel were so ignorant and foolish as to propose it, (v. 3.) and the people soon put it into execution; (v. 4.) they sent to Shiloh for the ark, and Eli had not courage enough to oppose it, but sent his ungodly sons, Hophni and Phinehas, along with it, at least permitted them to go, though he knew that wherever they went, they were the image of God wronged with them. Now see here, (1.) The profound veneration they had for the ark. "O send for that, and that will do wonders for us." The ark was, by institution, a visible token of God's presence. God had said that he would dwell between the cherubims, which were over the ark, and were carried along with it; now they thought that, by paying a great respect to this sacred chest, they should prove themselves to be Israelites indeed, and effectively engage God Almighty to appear in their favour. Note, It is common for those that have estranged themselves from the vials of religion, to discover a great fondness for the ritual and external observance of it; for those that even deny the flower of godliness, not only to have, but to have in admiration the form of it. The temple of the Lord is cried up, and the ark of the Lord stickled for, with a great deal of seeming zeal, by multitudes, and effectually engage God Almighty to appear in their favour. And yet indeed they did but make an idol of the ark, and looked upon it to be as much an image of the God of Israel, as those which the heathen worshipped, were of their gods. To worship the true God, and not to worship him as God is, in effect, not to worship him at all. (2.) Their egregious folly in thinking that if they had that in their camp, it would certainly save them out of the hands of their enemies, and bring victory back to their side. For, [1.] When the ark set forward, Moses prayed, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; well knowing that it was not the ark moving with them, but God appearing for them, that must give them success; and here was no proper means used to engage God to favour them with his presence; what good then would the ark do them, the shell without the kernel? [2.] They were so far from having God’s leave to remove his ark, that he had plainly enough intimated to them in his law, that when they were seated in Canaan, his ark should be settled in the place that he should choose, (Deut. 12. 5, 11.) and that they must come to it, and not to it. How then could they expect any advantage by it, when they had not a just and legal possession of it, nor any warrant to stir it from its place? Instead of honouring God by what they did, they really affronted him. Nay, [3.] If there had been nothing else to invalidate the presumed right of the ark, how could they expect it should bring a blessing, when Hophni and Phinehas were the men that brought it? It would have given too much countenance to their villany, if the ark had done any Kindness to Israel, while it was in the hands of those graceless priests.

IV. The great joy that was in the camp of Israel, when the ark was brought into it; (v. 5.) they proceeded without any thought of it, and yet thought themselves sure of victory, and therefore gave a triumphant shout before the battle, as if the day was without fail their own, intending by this mighty shout to animate themselves and their own forces, and to intimidate their adversaries. Note, Carnal people triumph much in the external privileges and performances of religion, and build much upon them, as if those would infallibly save them in their distresses; but even in the camp, would bring them to heaven, though the world and the flesh be upon the throne in the heart.

V. The consternation which the bringing of the ark into the camp of Israel put the Philistines into. The two armies lay so near encamped, that the Philistines heard the shout the Israelites gave on this great occasion. They soon understood what it was they triumphed in, (v. 6.) and were afraid of the day for battle. It had never been done before in their days. God is come into the camp, and therefore we unto us; (v. 7.) and again, we unto us, v. 8. The name of the God of Israel was formidable even to those that worshipped other gods, and some apprehensions, even the infidels had, of the danger of contending with him. Natural conscience suggests this, that those are in a woful condition, who have God against them; yet see what great impressions the divine presence and the name of the God of Israel was not so much in the camp before the ark came thither; which may very well be excused in them, since the notions the Israelites themselves had of that presence were no better.

"O," say they, "this is a new design upon us, more frightful than all their stratagems, for there has not been such a thing heretofore; this was the most effectual course they could take to dispirit our men, and weaken their hands." 2. When it had been done in the days of old, it had wrought wonders, v. 8. These are the gods that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness. Here they were as much out in their history as in their divinity; the plagues of Egypt were inflicted before the ark was made, and before Israel came into the wilderness; but some confused traditions they had of it. The ark, God’s ordinance in their house, this ark was carried before them, which they attributed, not to Jehovah, but to the ark. Now, say they, Who shall deliver us out of the hands of these mighty gods? Taking the ark for God, as well they might, when the Israelites themselves idolized it. Yet it should seem they scarcely believed themselves, when they spoke thus formally of these mighty gods, but only bantered: for, instead of retreatting, or proposing conditions of peace, which they would have done, had they been really convinced of the power of Israel’s God, they stirred up one another to fight so much the more stoutly; this surprising difficulty did but sharpen their resolution; (v. 9.) Be strong and quit yourselves like men; the commanders inspiring bold and generous thoughts into the minds of their soldiers, when they bid them remember how they had lorded it over Israel, and what an intolerable grief and shame it would be, if they flinched now, and suffered Israel to lord it over them.

10. And the Philistines fought; and Israel was smitten, and they fled every man into his tent: and there was a very great slaughter; for there fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen. 11. And the ark of God was taken; and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain.

Here is a short account of the issue of this battle. I. Israel was smitten, the army dispersed, and totally routed, not retiring into the camp as before, (v. 2.) when they hoped to rally again, but returning to their tents, every man shifting for his own safety, and making the best of his way home, desiring to make head any more; and thirty thousand were slain in the field of battle, v. 10. Israel was put to the worse. 1. Though they had the better cause, were the people of God, and the Philistines were enemies, yet, the Philistines’ terrors were turned into triumphs, and Israel’s into dishonours. 2. Through they had the ark of God with them. External privileges will secure none that abuse them, and do not live up to them. The ark in the camp will add nothing to its strength, when there is an Achan in it.

II. The ark itself was taken by the Philistines; and Hophni and Phinehas, who, it is likely, kept close to it, and when it was in danger, venturing for the defence of it, because by it they got their living, were both slain, v. 11. To this sad event the Psalmist refers; (Ps. 78. 61, 64.) He delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemies’ hands. Their priest fell by the sword. 1. The slaughter of the priests, considering their bad character, was no great loss to Israel, but it was a dreadful judgment upon the house of Eli. The judgment which God had spoken was fulfilled in it; (ch. 2. 34.) This shall be a sign unto thee, an earnest of the judgments threatened, thy two sons shall die both in one day, and so shall all the increase of thy house die in the flower of their age, v. 33. If Eli had done his duty, and put them, as polluted from the priesthood, (Neh. 7. 64.) they might have lived, though in disgrace; but now God takes the work into his own hands, and changes them out of the world by the sword of the unrighteous: The Lord is known by those judgments which he executeth. It is true, the sword devours one as well as another, but these were waited for of the sword, marked for vengeance. They were out of their place; what had they to do in the camp? When men leave the way of their duty, they shut themselves out of God's protection. But this was not all; they had betrayed the ark, by bringing it into danger, without a warrant from God, and this filled the measure of their iniquities. But, 2. The taking of the ark was a very great judgment upon Israel, a certain token of God's hot displeasure against them. Now they are made to see their folly in trusting to their external privileges, when they had by their wickedness forfeited them, and fancying that the ark would save them, when God was departed from them. Now they are made to reflect, with the utmost regret, upon their own rashness and presumption, in bringing the ark into the camp, and so exposing it; and wish a thousand times they had left it where God had fixed it. Now they are convinced that God will not be prescribed to by vain and foolish men, and that though he has bound us to his ark, he has not bound himself to it, but will rather deliver it into the hands of his sworn enemies, than suffer it to be profaned by his false friends, and countenance their superstition. Let none think to shelter themselves from the wrath of God, under the cloak of a visible profession, for there will be those cast into utter darkness, that have eaten and drunken in Christ's presence.

12. And there ran a man of Benjamin out of the army, and came to Shiloh the same day, with his clothes rent, and with earth upon his head. 13. And when he came, lo, Eli sat upon a seat by the way-side, watching: for his heart trembled for the ark of God. And when the man came into the city, and told it, all the city cried out. 14. And when he heard the noise of the crying, he said, What meaneth the noise of this tumult? And the man came in hastily, and told Eli. 15. Now Eli was ninety and eight years old; and his eyes were dim, that he could not see. 16. And the man said unto Eli, I am he that came out of the army, and I fled to-day out of the army. And he said, What is there done, my son? 17. And the messenger answered and said, Israel is fled before the Philistines; and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people; and thy two sons also, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead; and the ark of God is taken. 18. And it came to pass, when he made mention of the ark of God, that he fell from off the seat backward, by the side of the gate; and his neck brake, and he died; for he was an old man, and heavy: and he had judged Israel forty years.

Tidings are here brought to Shiloh of the fatal issue of their battle with the Philistines. Ill news flies fast. This soon spread through all Israel, every man that fled to his tent, brought it with too plain a proof of it, to his neighbour's: but no place was so near concerned as Shiloh, therefor e an express posted away immediately; as it was a man of Benjamin, the Jews fancy it was Saul: he rent his clothes, and put earth upon his head; by these signs to proclaim to all that saw him as he ran, the sorrowful news, and to show how much himself was affected with it, v. 12. He went straight to Shiloh with it; and here we are told,

I. How the city received it. Eli sat in the gate, v. 13, 18. But the messenger was loath to tell him first, and therefore passed him by, and told it in the city, with all the aggravating circumstances; and now both the ears of every one that heard it, stilled, as was foretold; ch. 3. II. their hearts trembled, and every face gathered blackness. All the city ran out. v. 13. and well they might; for besides that this was a calamity to all Israel, it was a particular loss to Shiloh, and the ruin of that place. For though the ark was soon rescued out of the hands of the Philistines, yet it never returned to Shiloh again; their candlestick was removed out of its place, because they had left their first love, and their city dwindled, and sunk, and came to nothing. Now God forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, they having driven him from them; and the tribe of Ephraim, which had for three hundred and forty years been blessed with the presence of the ark in it, lest the honour, (Ps. 78. 60, 67,) and, some time after, it was transferred to the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion which he loved, as it follows there, v. 68, because the men of Shiloh knew not the day of their visitation. This abandoning of Shiloh, Jerusalem is long after reminded of, and bid to take warning, why, see p. 7. 12. God had destroyed Shiloh. From this day, this fatal day, let the desolations of Shiloh be dated; they had therefore reason enough to cry out when they heard that the ark was taken.

II. What a fatal blow was it to old Eli. Let us see,

1. With what fear he expected the tidings. Though old, and blind, and heavy, yet he could not but apprehend it; for he perceived the glory of Israel lay at stake, but placed himself by the way-side, to receive the first intelligence; for his heart trembled for the ark of God, v. 13. His careful thoughts represented to him, what a dishonour it would be to God, and what an irreparable loss to Israel, if the ark fell into the Philistines' hands: with what profane triumphs it would be told in Gath, and published in the streets of Ashkelon. It falls to his lot to see a person whom he considered as of it; Israel had forfeited the ark, (his own sons especially,) and the Philistines would aim at it; and now the threatening comes to his mind, that he should see an enemy in God's habitation; ch. 2. 32. and perhaps his own heart reproached him for not using his authority, to prevent the carrying of the ark into the camp; all these things made him tremble. Note, All good men lay the interest of God's church nearer their hearts, than any secular interest or concern of their own, and cannot but be in pain and fear for them, if, at any time, they are in peril. How can we be easy, if the ark be not safe?

2. With what grief he received the tidings. Though he could not see, he could hear the tumult and crying of the city, and perceived it to be the voice of lamentation and mourning and woe; like a careful magistrate, he asks, What means the noise of this tumult? v. 14. He is told, there is an express come from the army, who relates the story to him very distinctly, and with great confidence, having himself been an eye-witness of it, v. 16, 17. The account of the defeat of the army, and the slaughter of a great number of the soldiers, was very grievous to him as a judge; the tidings of the death of his two sons, to whom he had been so indulgent, and who, he had reason to fear, died impenitent, touched him in a tender part as a father, yet it was not for these that his heart trembled, there is a greater concern upon his spirit, which swallows up the lesser. He does not interrupt the narrative with any passionate exclamations for his sons, like David for Absalom, but waits for the end of the story, not doubting but that the messenger, being an Israelite, would, without being asked, say something of the ark; and if he could but have said, "Yet the ark of God is safe, and we are bringing that home," his joy for that would have overcome his grief for all the other disasters, and have made him easy; but when the messenger concludes his story with, The ark of God is taken, he is struck with his fall, and, it should seem, he swooned away, fell off his seat, and partly with the fainting, and partly with the fall, he died immediately, and never spoke a word more. His heart was broken first, and then his neck. So fell the High Priest and judge of Israel, so fell his heavy head, when he had lived within two of a hundred years; so fell the crown from his head when he had judged Israel about forty years; thus did his sun go down under a cloud, thus were the folly and wickedness of those sons of his, whom he had indulged, his ruin at last. Thus does God sometimes set marks of his displeasure upon good men in this life, who have misconducted themselves, that others may hear, and fear, and take warning. A man may die miserably, and yet not die eternally; may come to an untimely end, and yet the end be peace. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that Eli died the death of an unrepentant ass, and that death of an ass is to be be reckoned, Exod. 13. 13. Here we must observe, to Eli's praise, that it was the loss of the ark, that was his death, and not the slaughter of his sons. He does, in effect, say, "Let me fall with the ark!" for what pious Israelite can live with any comfort when God's ordinances are removed? Farewell all in this world, even life itself, if the ark be gone.

19 And his daughter-in-law, Phinehas' wife, was with child, near to be delivered: and when she heard the tidings, that the ark of God was taken, and that her father-in-law and her husband were dead, she bowed herself and travailed; for her pains came upon her. 20 And about the time of her death, the women that stood by her said unto her, Fear not, for thou hast borne a son. But she answered not, neither did she regard it. 21 And she named the child Ichabod, saying, The glory is departed from Israel: (because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law and her husband;) 22 And she said, The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken.

We have here another melancholy story that carries on the desolations of Eli's house, and the sorrowful feeling which the tidings of the ark's captivity excited. It is concerning the wife of Phinehas, one of those ungrateful sons of Eli, that had brought all this mischief on Israel. It cost her her life, though young, as well as her father-in-law, that was old; for many a green head, as well as many a hoary head, has been brought by sorrow to the grave; it worketh death.

By what is here related of her, it appears,

1. That she was a woman of a very tender spirit. Providence so ordered it, that, just at this time, she was near her time; and our Saviour hath said, How to them that are with child, or give suck in such days as these, Matt. 24. 19. So little joy will there then be in the birth, even of a man child, that it will be said, Blessed are the wombs that bare not,

Luke 23. 29. The amazing news coming at this unhappy juncture, it put her into labour, as great frights or other strong passions sometimes do. When she heard of the death of her father-in-law whom she reverenced, and her husband whom, bad as he was, she loved, but especially of the loss of the ark, she travailed, for her pains came thick upon her; v. 19. and the tidings so seiz'd her spirits, at a time when they needed all possible supports, that though she had strength to bear the child, she, that was the wife of a minute, after, fainting and dried away, being very weak, had no heart to let life go, when she had lost the greatest comforts of her life. Those who are drawing near to that needful hour, have need to treasure up for themselves comforts from the covenant of grace, to balance, not only the usual sorrows, but any thing extraordinary that may add to the grief which they do not foresee. Faith, at such a time, will keep from fainting, Ps. 23. 13.

17 That she was a woman of a very gracious spirit, though matched to a wicked husband. Her concern for the death of her husband, and father-in-law, was an evidence of her natural affection; but her much greater concern for the loss of the ark, was an evidence of her pious and devout affection to God and sacred things. The former helped to hasten her travail, but it appears by her dying words, that the latter lay nearer her heart; (v. 22.) Weeping unto her, Fear not, now the worst is past, for thou hast borne a son, (and perhaps it was her first-born,) but she answered not, neither did she regard it. The sorrows of her travail, if she had had no other, would have been forgotten, for joy that a man child was born into the world, John 16. 21. But what is that joy, (1.) To one that feels herself dying? No joy but that which is spiritual and divine, will in any soul, give true joy to a woman; and how serious a thing to admit the relish of an earthly joy, it is all flat and sapless then. (2.) What is it to one that is lamenting the loss of the ark? Small comfort could she have of a child born in Israel, in Shiloh, when the ark is gone, and is a prisoner in the land of the Philistines. What pleasure can we take in our creature-comforts and enjoyments, if we want God's word and ordinances, especially if we want the comfort of his gracious presence, and the light of his countenance? As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs, to such heavy hearts.

2. This made her give her child a name which should perpetuate the remembrance of the calamity, and her sense of it. She has nothing to say to the child, only it being her province, now that her husband was dead, to name the child, she orders them to call it Ichabod, that is, Where is the glory? Or, Alias for the glory! or, There is no glory; (y. 21.) which she thus explains with her dying lips, (y. 22.) "The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken. Call the child glorious, for so he is; but the beauty of Israel is gone, and there appears no hope of ever retrieving it; never let the name of an Israelite, much less a priest, carry glory in it any more, now that the ark is taken." Note, (1.) The purity and plenty of God's ordinances and the tokens of his presence in them, are the glory of any people, much more so than their wealth and trade and interest among the nations. (2.) Nothing is more cutting, more killing, to a faithful Israelite, than the want and loss of these. If God go, the glory goes, and all good goes. Woe unto us, if he depart!

CHAP. V.

It is now time to inquire what becomes of the ark of God; we cannot but think that we shall hear more of that sacred treasure. I should have thought that the next news would have been, that all Israel, from Dan to Beer-sheba, had gathered together as one man, with a resolution to bring it back, or die in the attempt: but we find not any motion made of that kind, so little was there of zeal or courage left among them. Nay, we do not find that they desired a treaty with the Philistines about the ransom of it, or offered any thing in lieu of it: "It is the ark of God;" and, in those places especially where the ark is mentioned, we are not told to lament the loss of the ark, that have not hardnesse enough to take one step toward the recovery of it, any more than Israel here. If the ark will help itself, it may, for they will not help it. Unworthy they were of the name of Israelites, that could thus tamely part with the glory of Israel. God would therefore take the work into his own hands and plead his own cause, since men would not appear for him. We are told in this chapter, I. How the Philistines triumphed over the ark, (v. 1, 2,) and, II. How the ark triumphed over the Philistines. 1. Over Dagon their god, v. 3–5. 2. Over the Philistines themselves, who were sorely plagued with emeralds, and made weary of the ark; the men of Ashdod first, (v. 6, 7,) then the men of Gath, (v. 8, 9,) and, lastly, those of Ekron, which forced them at length a resolution to send the ark back to the land of Israel; for when God judges, he will overcome.

1. AND the Philistines took the ark of God, and brought it from Eben- ezer unto Ashdod. 2. When the Philistines saw the ark of God, they brought it into the house of Dagon, and set it by Dagon. 3. And when they of Ashdod arose early on the morrow, behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord. And they took Dagon, and set him in his place again. 4. And when they arose early on the morrow, behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the ground before the ark of the Lord; and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold; only the stump of Dagon was left to him. 5. Therefore neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that came into Dagon's house, tread on the threshold of Dagon in Ashdod unto this day.

Here is, 1. The Philistines' triumph over the ark, which they were the more pleased, the more proud, to be now masters of, because, before the battle, they were possessed with a great fear of it, ch. 4. 7. When they had it in their hands, God restrained them, that they did not offer any violence to it; did not break it to pieces, as the Israelites were ordered to do by the idols of the heathen, but showed some respect to it, and carefully carried it to a place of safety. Whether their curiosity led them to open it, and to read what was written with the finger of God on the two tables of stone that were in it, we are not told; perhaps they looked no further than the golden outside, and the cherubins that covered it, like children that are more affected with the fine binding of their Bibles than with the precious matter contained in them. They carried it to Ashdod, one of their five cities, and that in which Dagon's temple was; there they placed the ark of God, by Dagon, v. 2. Either, 1. As a sacred thing, which they designed to pay some religious duty to, in conjunction with Dagon, as the gods of the heathen were never looked upon as averse to partners. Though the nations would not change their gods, yet they would multiply them, and add to them. But they were mistaken in the God of Israel, when, in putting his ark by Dagon's image, they intended to do him honour; for he is not worshipped at all, if he be not worshipped alone. 2. The Lord our God is one Lord. Or, rather, 2. They placed it there as a trophy of victory, in honour of Dagon their god, to whom, no doubt, they intended to offer a great sacrifice, as they had done when they had taken Samson; (Judg. 16. 23, 24.) boasting, that as then they had triumphed over Israel's champion, so now over Israel's God. What a reproach was this to God's great name! What a disgrace to the throne of his glory! Shall the ark, the symbol of God's presence, be a prisoner to Dagon, a dunghill-deity? So it is, because God will show how little account the ark of the covenant is, if the covenant itself be broken and neglected; even sacred signs are not things that either he is tied to, or we can trust to. So it is for a time, that God may have so much the more glory, in reckoning with those that thus affront him, and get him honour upon them. Having punished Israel that betrayed the ark, by giving it into the hands of the Philistines, they next design to have it again, and will fetch it out of their hands again. Thus even the wrath of man shall praise him; and he is bringing about his own glory, even then when he seems to neglect it, Ps. 76. 10. Out of the eater shall come forth meat.

11. The ark's triumph over Dagon. Once more again, Dagon was made to fall before it. If they designed to do honour to the ark, God hereby showed how much more glorious he was. The Philistines took the ark; Dagon accepted it, for he will be worshipped, not with any god, but above all gods. He owes a shame (as Bishop Hall expresses it) to those who will be making matches between himself and Pethai. But they really designed to affront it; and though, for some hours, Dagon stood by the ark, and, it is likely, stood above it, (the ark at its footstool,) yet, the next morning, when the worshippers of Dagon came to see their devotion to their god, they found their triumphing short, Job 20. 5.

1. Dagon, that is, the image, for that was all the god, was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark, v. 3. God had seemed to forget his ark; but see how the psalmist speaks of his appearing, at last, to vindicate his own honour. When he had delivered his strength into captivity, and all seemed going to ruin, then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine, Ps. 78. 65. And therefore he prevented the utter desolations of the Jewish church, because he feared the wrath of the enemy, Deut. 32. 26, 27. Great care was taken in setting up the images of their gods, to fix them; (the prophet takes notice of it, Isa. 41. 7.) He fastened it with nails, that it should not be moved; and again, ch. 46. 2.) and the ark of God triumphed over him in his own dunghill, in his own temple; down he comes before the ark, directly towards it, (though the ark was set on one side of him,) as it were, pointing to the conqueror, to whom he is constrained to yield and do obeisance. Note, The kingdom of Satan will certainly fall before the kingdom of Christ, error before truth, profaneness before godliness, and corruption before grace in the hearts of men, and cannot be overthwarted. When the interests of religion seem to be run down, and ready to sink, yet even then we may be confident that the day of their triumph will come. come. Great is the truth, and will prevail. Dagon, by falling prostrate before the ark of God, which was a posture of adoration, did, as it were,
direct his worshippers to pay their homage to the God of Israel, as greater than all gods. See Exod.
13. 11.
3. The priests that found their idol on the floor, make all the haste they can, before it be known, to set him in his place again. A sorry silly thing to make a god of, which, when he was down, wanted help to get up again; and sottish wretches those which, that could pray for help from that idol that needed, and, in effect, implored, their help. How could they attribute their victory to the power of Dagon? for they naught could not keep his own ground before the ark? But they assured Dagon shall be their god still, and therefore set him up in his place. Bishop Hall observes hence, It is just with God, that those who want grace, shall want wit too; and it is in the power of superstition to turn men into the stocks and stones they worship. They that make them, are like unto them. What is it that the great upholders of the anti-christian kingdom, made now? Dagon but an image, and labouring to set him in his place again, and healing the deadly wound that has been given to the beast; but if the reformation be the cause of God, before which it has begun to fall, it shall not prevail, but shall surely fall before it.
4. The next night Dagon fell the second time, v.
4. They rose early, either, as usual, to make their addresses to their god, or earlier than usual, being impatient to know whether Dagon had kept his standing this night; and, to their great confusion, they find his case now worse than before; whether the matter of which the image was made, was apt to break or no, so it was, that the head and hands were cut off from the threshold. So that nothing remained but the stump, or, as the margin reads it, the fishy part of Dagon; for (as many learned men conjecture) the upper part of this image was in a human shape, the lower, in the shape of a fish; as mermaids are painted. Such strong delusions were idolaters given up to, so vain were they in their imaginations, and so wretchedly darkened were their foolish hearts, as to worship the images, not only of creatures, but of nonentities, the mere fig-ments of fancy. Well, the mis-shapen monster is by this fall made to appear, (1.) Very ridiculous, and worthy to be despised. An admirable figure Dagon fashioned all which, when he made him, and showed how the human part and the fishy part were artificially put together, which, perhaps,
the ignorant devotees had been made to believe was done by miracle. (2.) Very impotent, and unworthy to be prayed to, or trusted to; for his losing of his head and hands, proved him utterly destitute both of wisdom and power, and for ever disabled either to hinder or to help them. This they get by setting Dagon in his place again; for he had not have let him alone when he was down. But they can speed no better, that contend with God, and will set up that which he is throwing down, Mal.
1. 4. God, by this, magnified his ark and made it honourable, then when they vilified and made it contemptible. He also showed what will be the end of all that which is set up in opposition to him; God exalteth himself, but ye shall be broken to pieces, Isa. 8. 9.
4. The threshold of Dagon's temple was ever after looked upon as sacred, and not to be trodden on, v. 5. Some think that reference is had to this superstitious usage of Dagon's worshippers, (Zeph.
1. 9.) where God threatens to punish those, who, in imitation of them, leaped over the threshold. One would have thought that this incontestable proof of the ark's victory over Dagon, should have convinced the Philistines of their folly in worshipping such a senseless thing, and that from henceforward they should have paid their homage to the Conqueror;
but, instead of being reformed, they were hardened in their idolatry, and, as evil men and seducers are wont to do, became worse and worse. 2 Tim. 3. 13.
Instead of despising Dagon, for the threshold's sake that beheaded him, they are almost ready to worship the threshold, because it was the block on which he was beheaded; and will never set their feet on that on which Dagon lost his head; shaming those who tread under foot the blood of the covenant, and trample on things truly sacred. Yet this piece of superstition would help to perpetuate the remembrance of Dagon's disgrace; for, with the custom, the reason would be transmitted to posterity, and the children that should be born, inquiring why the threshold of Dagon's temple must not be trodden on, would be told, that Dagon fell before the ark of the Lord. Thus God would have honour, even out of their superstition. We are not told that they repaired the broken image; it is probable that they set the ark of God away first, and afterward they put it up again, and set it in its place; for, it seems they cannot deliver their souls, nor say, Is there not a lie in our right hand? Isa. 44. 20.
6. But the hand of the LORD was heavy upon them of Ashdod; and he destroyed them, and smote them with emerods, even Ashdod, and the coasts thereof. 7. And when the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, they said, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us; for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god. 8.
They sent, therefore, and gathered all the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel? And they answered, Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about unto Gath. And they carried the ark of the God of Israel about thither. 9. And it was so, that, after they had carried it about, the hand of the LORD was against the city with a very great destruction; and he smote the men of the city, both small and great,
and they had emerods in their secret parts.
10. Therefore they sent the ark of God to Ekron. And it came to pass, as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekonites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us, to slay us and our people. 11. So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to his own place, that it slay us not, and our people:
for there was a deadly destruction throughout all the city; the hand of God was very heavy there. 12. And the men that died not were smitten with the emerods: and the city of the dead went up to be healed.

The downfall of Dagon (if the people had made a good use of it, and had brought it by to repent of their idolatries, and to humble themselves before the God of Israel, and seek his face) might have prevented the vengeance which God here proceeds to take upon them for the indignities done to his ark, and their obstinate adherenee to their idol, in defiance of the plainest conviction: Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see, but they shall see, Isa. 26. 11. And if they will not see the glory, they shall feel the weight, of God's hand, for so the Philistines did; The hand of the Lord was heavy upon them; (v. 6.) and he not only convinced them of their folly, but severely chastised their insolence.

3. He destroyed them, that is, cut many of them off by sudden death, those, we may suppose, that had most triumphed in the captivity of the ark. This is distinguished from the disease with which others were smitten. At Gath, it is called a great destruction, (v. 9.) a deadly destruction, v. 11. And it is expressly said, (v. 12.) that those who were smitten with the emerods, were the men that died not by the other destruction, which, probably, was the pestilence. They boasted of the great slaughter which their sword had made among the Israelites, ch. 4. 10. But God lets them know that though he does not see fit to draw Israel's sword against them, (they were unworthy to be employed,) yet God had a sword of his own, with which he could make a no less dreadful execution among them, if he willed, and his hand take hold on judgment, he will render vengeance to his enemies, Deut. 32. 43. Note, The strength of God, his arm, and his Israel, will infallibly be reigned by it at last. If conviction conquer not, destruction shall.

4. Those that were destroyed, he smote with emerods, (v. 6.) in their secret parts, (v. 9.) so grievous, that (v. 12.) the cry went up to heaven; that is, it might be heard a great way off; and perhaps, in the extremity of their pain and misery, they cried, not to Dagon, but to the God of heaven. The punishment of this severe judgment upon the Philistines, describes it thus, that God smote his enemies in the hinder parts, and put them to a perpetual reproach, Ps. 78. 66. God threatens the emerods among the judgments that would be the fruit of the curse, Deut. 28. 27. It was both a painful and shameful disease; a vile disease for vile deserts; by it God would humble their pride, and put contempt upon them, as well as done upon his ark. The disease was epidemic, and, perhaps, among them, a new disease. Ashdod was smitten, and the coasts thereof; the country round. For contempt of God's ordinances, many are weak and sick, and many sleep, 1 Cor. 11. 30.

5. The men of Ashdod were soon aware that it was the hand of God, the God of Israel, v. 7. Thus they were constrained to acknowledge his power and dominion, and themselves within his jurisdiction, and yet they would not renounce Dagon, and submit to him; but rather, now that he touched their bone and their flesh, and in a tender part, they were ready to curse him to his face; and, instead of making their peace with him, and courting the stay of his ark upon better terms, they desired to get clear of it, as the Gadarenes, who, when they had lost their swine, desired Christ to depart out of the country. They would not, when once smart under the judgment of God, would rather, if they were permitted, put him far from them, than enter into covenant and communion with him, and make him their friend. Thus the men of Ashdod resolve, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us.

4. It is resolved to change the place of its imprisonment. A great council was called, and the question proposed to all the lords was, What shall we do with the ark? And, at last, it was agreed, that it should be carried to Gath, v. 8. Some superstitious conceit they had, that the fault was in the place, and that the ark would be better pleased with another lodging, further off from Dagon's temple; and therefore, instead of returning it, as they should have done, to its own place, they contrive to send it to another place. Gath is pitched upon, a place famed for a race of giants, but their strength and stature are no fence against the pestilence and the emerods; the men of that city were smitten, both small and great, (v. 9.) both dwarfs and giants; all alike to God's judgments; none so great as to overtop them, none so small as to be overlooked by them.

5. They were all, at last, weary of the ark, and very willing to be rid of it. It was sent from Gath to Ekron, and, coming by order of council, the Ekronites could not refuse it, but were much exasperated against their great men for sending them such a fatal present; (v. 10.) They have sent it to us, to stay us and our people. The ark had the tables of the law in it; and nothing more welcome to faithful Israelites than the word of God; to them it is a savour of life unto life: but to uncircumscribed Philistines, that persist in enmity to God, nothing more dreadful or unwelcome; to them it is a savour of death unto death. A general assembly is instantly called, to advise about sending the ark again to its own place, v. 11. While they are consulting about it, the hand of God is doing execution; and their concurrence to execute the judgment, does spread it; many drop down dead before them, many more are raging ill of the emerods, v. 12. What shall they do? Their triumphs in the captivity of the ark are soon turned into lamentations, and they are as eager to quit it as ever they had been to seize it. Note, God can easily make Jerusalem a burlenstone to all that have he at it, Zech. 12. 3. Those that fight against God, will soon have enough of it, and, first or last, will be made to know that none ever hardened their hearts against him, and prospered. The wealth that is got by fraud and injustice, especially by sacrilege, that is, robbing God, though swallowed greedily, and rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, must be vomited up again; for till it be, the sinner shall not feel quietness in his belly, Job 20. 15. 20.

CHAP. VI

In this chapter we have the return of the ark to the land of Israel, whither we are now gladly to attend it, and observe, I. How the Philistines dismissed it, by the advice of their priests, (v. 1.11.) with rich presents, to the God of Israel, to make an atonement for their sin, (v. 9.) and yet with a project to bring it back, unless Providence directed the scene, contrary to their inclinations, to go to the land of Israel, v. 8, 9. II. How the Israelites entertained it. 1. With great joy, and sacrifices of praise, v. 12. 18. With an over-bold curiosity to look into it, for which many of them were struck dead, the terror of which moved them to send it forward to another city, v. 19. 20.

1. AND the ark of the Lord was in the country of the Philistines seven months. 2. And the Philistines called for the priests and the diviners, saying, What shall we do with the ark of the Lord? tell us wherewith we shall send it to his place. 3. And they said, If ye send away the ark of the God of Israel, send it not empty: but in any wise return him a trespass-offering: then ye shall be healed, and it shall be known to you why his hand is not removed from you. 4. Then they said, What shall be the trespass-offering which we shall return to him? They answered, Five golden emerods, and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines: for one plague was on you all, and on your lords. 5. Wherefore ye shall make images of your emerods, and images of your mice that mar the land; and ye shall give glory unto the God of Israel; peradventure he will lighten his hand from off you, and from off your gods, and from off your land. 6. Wherefore then do ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh hardened their hearts? When he had wrought wonderfully among them, did they not let the people go, and they departed? 7. Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch kine on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: 8. And take the ark of the Lord, and lay it upon the cart: and put the jewels of gold, which ye return him for a trespass-offering, in a coffier by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. 9. And see, if so goeth up by the way of his own coast to Beth-shemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us.

The first words of the chapter tell us how long the captivity of the ark continued—it was in the country of the Philistines seven months. In the field of the Philistines; so it is in the original; from which some gather that, having tried it in all their cities, and found it a plague to the inhabitants of each, at length, they sent it into the open fields, upon which, mice sprang up out of the ground in great multitudes, and destroyed the corn which was now nearly ripe, and marred the land. With that judgment they were plagued, (v. 5.) and it is not mentioned in the foregoing chapter; so God let them know, that, wherever they carried the ark, so long as they carried it captive, they should find it a curse to them. Cursed shall thou be in the city, and cursed in the field, Deut. 28. 16. But most take it to signify, as we render it, The country of the Philistines. Now, 1. Seven months Israel was punished with the absence of the ark, that special token of God's presence. How bare did the tabernacle look without it! How was the holy city now a desolation, and the holy land a wilderness! A melancholy time, no doubt, it was, to the good people among them, particularly Samuel; but they had this to comfort themselves with, as we have in the like distress, when we are deprived of the comforts of public ordinances, that, wherever the ark is, the Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven, and by faith and prayer we may have access with boldness to him there. We may have God nigh unto us, when the ark is at a distance. 2. Seven months the Philistines were punished with the presence of the ark; so long it was a plague to them, because they would not send it home sooner. Note, Sinners lengthen out their own misery, by obstinately refusing to part with their sins. Egypt's plagues had been fewer than ten, if Pharaoh's heart had not been hardened not to let the people go.

But at length it is determined the ark must be sent back, there is no remedy, they are undone if they detain it. 1. The priests and the diviners are consulted about it, v. 2. They were supposed to be best acquainted both with the rules of wisdom, and with the rites of worship and atonement. And the Israelites being their neighbours, and famed above all people for the institutions of their religion, they had, no doubt, the curiosity to acquaint themselves with their laws and usages; and therefore it was proper to ask them, What shall we do to the ark of Jehovah? All reins fall as regard to their priests, as the men whose life keps the light inside. the Philistines diviners? We have divines, of whom we should inquire, wherewith we shall come before the Lord, and how ourselves before the most high God. 2. They give their advice very fully, and seem to be verul unanamous in it. It was a wonder they did not, as friends to their country, give it, ex officio—officially, before they were asked. 3. They urge it upon them, that it was absolutely necessary to send the ark back, from the example of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, v. 6. Some, it may be, were loath to yield, and were willing to try it out with the ark a while longer, and to them they apply themselves: Wherefore do ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh did? It seems they were well acquainted with the Mosaic history, and could cite precedents out of it. This might use well to make a demonstration of God's judgments upon obstinate sinners, we should by them be warned, not to harden our hearts as they did. It is much cheaper learning by other people's experience than by our own. The Egyptians were forced at last to let Israel go, there're let the Philistines yield in time to let the ark go.

2. They advise, that, when they sent it back, they should send a trespass-offering with it, v. 3. Whatever other confidence they took upon themselves, they knew that the God of Israel was a jealous God, and how strict he was in his demands of sin-offerings, and trespass-offerings, from his own people; and therefore, since they found how highly he represented the affront of holding his ark captive, they with whom he had such a quarrel, must in any wise return him a trespass-offering; and they could not expect to be heeded upon any other terms. Injured justice demands satisfaction; they paid an atonement for their breach of covenant; but when they began to contrive what satisfaction should be, they became wretchedly vain in their imaginations. But those, who, by wilful sin, have imprisoned the truth in unrighteousness, (as the Philistines did the ark,) Rom. 1. 18. may conclude that there is no making of their peace with him whom they have thus injured, but by a sin-offering; and we know but one that can take away sin.

3. They direct, that this trespass-offering should be an acknowledgment of the punishment of their iniquity; by which they might take shame to themselves as conquered and yielding, and guilty before God, and might give glory to the Lord of Israel, as their mighty Conqueror; and most just Avenger, 5. They must make images of the emerods, that is, of the swellings and sores with which they had been afflicted; so making the reproach of that shameful disease, the most lamentable scourge and deed; (Ps. 78. 66.) also images of the mice that had marred the land, owning thereby the almighty power of the God of Israel, who could chastise and humble them, even in the day of their triumph, by such small and despicable animals. These images must be made of gold, the most precious metal, to intimate that they would gladly purchase their peace with the God of Israel at any rate, and would not think it bought too dear with gold, with much fine gold. The golden emerods must be, in number, five, according to the number of the lords, who, it is likely, were all afflicted with them, and were content thus to own it: it was advised, that the golden mice should be free too; but because they were infested with them, it should seem, upon second thoughts, they sent more of them, according to the number both of the fenced cities and of country villages, v. 18. Their priests remind them, that one plague was on them all; they could not blame one another, for they were all guilty, which they were plainly told, by being all plagued. Their proposal to offer a trespass-offering for their offence, was confusable enough; the reason all this, but to send such things as these for trespass-offerings, was very foreign, and showed them grossly ignorant of the methods of reconciliation appointed by the law of Moses; for there it appears all along, that it is blood, and not gold, that makes atonement for the soul.

4. They encourage them to hope, that thereby they would take an effectual course to get rid of the plague, yet shall be healed, v. 3. For, it seems, the disease obstinately resisted all the methods of cure their physicians had prescribed; "Let them therefore send back the ark, and then," say they, "it shall be known to you, why his hand is not removed from you; that is, by this it will appear, whether it is for your detaining of the ark, that you are thus plagued; for, if it be, upon your delivering of it up, the plague will cease. God has sometimes put such people under such a trial, as by it their refutation would not be their relief; Prove me now hereafter, saith the Lord of hosts, Mal. 3. 10. Hag. 2. 19. Yet they speak doubtfully, (v. 5.) Peradventure he will lighten his hand from off you; as if now they began to think, that the judgment might come from God's hand, and yet not be removed immediately upon the restitution of the ark; however, that was the likeliest way to obtain mercy. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

5. Yet they put them in a way to make a further trial, whether it was the hand of the God of Israel that had smitten them with these plagues or no. They must, in honour of the ark, put it on a new cart or carriage, to be drawn by two milch-cows, that had calves daily suckling them, (v. 7.) unused to draw, and inclined to home, both for the sake of the crib where they were fed, and of the calves they nourished, altogether unsuited with the road that led toward the land of Israel; they must have no one to lead or drive them, but must take their own way, which, in all reason, one might expect, would be home again; and yet, unless the God of Israel, after all the other miracles he has wrought, will work one more, and by an invisible power lead these cows, contrary to their natural instinct and inclination, to the land of Israel, and particular to Beth-shemesh, they will not fail their former opinion, and will believe it was not the hand of God that smote them, but it was a chance that happened to them, v. 8, 9. Thus did God suffer himself to be tempted and prescribed to, after he had been otherwise defeated, by these unscrupulous Philistines. Would they have been content that the honour of Dagon, their god, should have been transferred to Beth-shemesh? They see how willing bad men are to shift over their convictions of the hand of God upon them, and to believe, when they are in trouble, it is a chance that happens to them; and if so, the red has no voice which they are concerned to hear or heed.

10. And the men did so; and took two milch kine, and tied them to the cart, and shut up their calves at home. In. And they laid the ark of the Lord upon the cart, and the coffer with the mice of gold and the images of their emerods. 12. And the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-shemesh, and went along the highway, lowering as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left; and the lords of the Philistines went after them unto the border of Beth-shemesh.

13. And they of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest in the valley: and they lifted up their eyes, and saw the ark, and rejoiced to see it. 14. And the cart came into the field of Joshua, a Beth-shemite, and stood there, where there was a great stone; and they clave the wood of the cart, and offered the kine a burnt-offering unto the Lord. 15. And the Levites took down the ark of the Lord, and the coffer that was with it, wherein the jewels of gold were, and put them on the great stone: and the men of Beth-shemesh offered burnt-offerings, and sacrificed sacrifices, the same day unto the Lord. 16. And when the five lords of the Philistines had seen it, they returned to Ekron the same day. 17. And these are the golden emerods which the Philistines returned for a trespass-offering unto the Lord; for Ashdod one, for Askelon one, for Gath one, for Ekron one: 18. And the golden mice, according to the number of all the cities of the Philistines belonging to the five lords, both of fenced cities and of country villages, even unto the great stone of Abel, whereon they set down the ark of the Lord; which stone remaineth unto this day in the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite.

We are here told, I. How the Philistines dismissed the ark; (v. 10, 11.) they were made as glad to part with it, as ever they had been to take it; as God had fetched Israel out of the house of bondage, so now he fetched the ark out of its captivity, in such a manner, as that Egypt was glad when they departed, Ps. 105. 38. 1. They received no money or price for the ransom of it, as they hoped to have done, even beyond a king's ransom. Thus it is prophesied of Cyrus, Isa. 45. 13. He shall let go my captives, not for price, nor reward. Nay, 2. They gave jewels of gold, as the Egyptians did to the Israelites, to be rid of it. Thus the ark that was carried into the land of the Philistines, a trophy of their victory, carried back with it trophies of its own, and lasting monuments of the disgrace of the Philistines. Note, God will be no loser in his glory, at last, by the successes of the church's enemies against the ark, but will get him honour from these that seek to do dishonour to him.

II. How the kine brought it to the land of Israel, v. 12. They took the straight way to Beth-shemesh, the next city of the land of Israel, and a priest's city, and turned not aside. This was a wonderful instance of the power of God over the brute creatures, and all things considered, no less than a miracle. That cattle unaccustomed to the yoke should draw so even, so orderly, and still go forward; that without any driver, they should go from home, to which all tame creatures have a natural inclination, and from their own calves, to which they had a natural affection; that, without any director, they should go the straight road to Beth-shemesh, a city eight miles from Jerusalem, where they might have turned aside to the fields to feed themselves, nor turn back home to feed their calves; they went on lowing for their young ones, by which it appeared that they had not forgotten them, but that nature was sensible of the grievance of going from them; the power of the God of nature therefore appeared so much the greater, in overruling one of the strongest instincts of nature. These two kine, says Dr. Lightfoot, knew their own, their great Owner, (Isa. 1. 3.) whom Hophni and Phinehas knew not; to which I may add, they brought home the ark, to shame the stupidity of Israel that made no attempt to fetch it home. God’s providence is conversant about the motions even of brute creatures, and serve its own purposes by them. The lords of the Philistines, with a suitable retinue, no doubt, went after them, wondering at the power of the God of Israel; and thus they who thought to triumph over the ark, were made to go like menial servants after it.

III. How it was welcomed to the land of Israel.

The men of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest, v. 13. They were going on with their worldly business, and were in no care about the ark, made no inquiries what was become of it; if they saw it, it is likely they might have had private intelligence of its coming, and would have gone to meet it, and conduct it into their own border. But they were as careless as the people that ceded their own houses, and let God’s house lie waste. Note, God will in his own time, effect the deliverance of his church, not only though it be fought against by its enemies, but though it be neglected by its friends. Some observe, that the returning ark found the men of Beth-shemesh not idling or sporting in the streets of the city, but busy, reaping their corn in the fields, and well employed; thus the tidings of the birth of Christ were brought to the shepherds, when they were keeping their flock by night. The Devil visits idle men with his temptations; God visits industrious men with his favours.

The same invisible hand that directed the kine to the land of Israel, brought them into the field of Joshua, and in that field they stood; some think, for the owner’s sake, on whom, being a very good man, they supposed God designed to put this honour. I rather think it was for the sake of the great stone in that field, which was convenient to put the ark upon, and which is spoken of, v. 14, 15, 18.

Now, 1. When the repeaters saw the ark, they rejoiced; (v. 13.) their joy for that, was greater than the joy of the ark when the young men left their tents to bid it welcome. When the Lord turned again the captivity of his ark, they were like men that dream, then was their mouth filled with laughter, Ps. 126. 1, 2. Though they had not zeal and courage enough to attempt the rescue or ransom of it, yet, when it did come, they bid it heartily welcome. Note, The return of the ark, and the revival of holy ordinances, after days of restraint and trouble, though but of great matter to joy every faithful Israelite.

2. They offered up the kine for a burnt-offering, to the honour of God, and made use of the wood of the cart for fuel; (v. 14.) probably, the Philistines intended these, when they sent them, to be a part of their trespass-offering, to make atonement, v. 3. 7. However, the men of Beth-shemesh looked upon it as proper to make this use of them, because it was by no means fit that ever they should be put to any other use; never shall that cart carry any common thing, that has once carried that sacred symbol of the divine presence: and the kine had been under such an immediate guidance of heaven, that God had, as it were, already laid claim to them; they were servants to him, and therefore must be sacrifices to him; and, no doubt, were accepted, though females, whereas, in strictness, every burnt-offering was to be male.

3. They deposited the ark, with the chest of jewels that the Philistines presented, upon the great stone in the open field; a cold lodging for the ark of the Lord, and a very mean one; yet better so than in Dagon’s temple, or in the hands of the Philistines. It is desirable to see the ark in its habitation in all the circumstances of solemnity and splendor, but better have it upon a great stone, and in the fields of the wood, than be without it. The intrinsic grandeur of instituted ordinances ought not to be diminished in our eyes by the meanness and poverty of the place where they are administered. As the burning of the cart and cows that brought home the ark, might be construed to signify their hopes that it should never be carr ed away again out of the land of Israel, so the setting it upon a great stone might signify their hopes that it should be established again upon a firm foundation. The church is built upon a Rock.

4. They offered the sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, some think, upon the great stone, more probably, upon an altar of earth made for the purpose, v. 15. And the offering was made, when they took the ark for offering at the altar in the court of the tabernacle was dispensed with, and the more easily, because Shiloh was now disgraced; God himself had forsaken it, and the ark, which was its chief glory, they had with them here. Beth-shemesh, though it lay within the lot of the tribe of Dan, yet belonged to Judah, so that this accidental bringing of the ark hither, was an indication of its designed settlement there, in process of time; for when Joshua refused the tabernacle of Joseph, he chose the tribe of Judah, Ps. 78. 67, 68. It was one of those cities which were assigned out of the lot of Judah to the sons of Aaron, Josh. 21. 16. Whither should the ark go, but to a priest’s city? And it was well they had those of that sacred order ready, (for though they are here called Levites, (v. 15.) yet it should seem they were priests,) both to take down the ark, and to offer the sacrifices.

5. The lords of the Philistines returned to Ekron, much affected, we may suppose, with what they had seen of the glory of God, and the zeal of the Israelites, and yet not reclaimed from the worship of Dagon; for how seldom has a nation changed their gods, though they were no gods? Jer. 2. 11. Though they cannot but think the God of Israel glorious in holiness, and fearful in praises, yet they are resolved they will think Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, at least as good as he, and to him they will cleave, however, because he is their’s. Lastly, Notice is taken of the continuance of the great stone in the same place; there it was unto this day; (v. 18.) because it remained a lasting memorial of this great event, and served to support the traditional history, by which it was transmitted to posterity. The fathers would say to the children, This is the place where the ark of God was set, when it came out of the Philistines’ hands; a thing never to be forgotten.”

9. And he smote the men of Beth-shemesh, because they had looked into the ark of the Lord, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men. And the people lamented, because the Lord had smitten many of the people with... a great slaughter. 20. And the men of Beth-shemesh said, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? and, to whom shall he go up from us? 21. And they sent messengers to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim, saying, The Philistines have brought again the ark of the Lord; come ye down, and fetch it up to you.

Here is, 1. The sin of the men of Beth-shemesh. They looked into the ark of the Lord, v. 19. Every Israelite had heard great talk of the ark, and had been possessed with a profound veneration for it, but they had been told, that it was lodged within a vail, and even the High Priest himself might not look upon it but once a year, and then through a cloud of incense. Perhaps, this made many say, (as we are apt to covet that which is forbidden,) what a great deal they would give for a sight of it. Some of these Beth-shemites, we may suppose, for that reason rejoiced to see the ark, (v. 15;) more than for the sake of the public. Yet this did not content them, they might see it, but they would go further, they would take off the covering, which, it is likely, was nailed or screwed on, and look into; under pretence of seeing whether the Philistines had not taken the two tables out of it, or some way damaged them; but really to gratify a sinful curiosity of their own, which intruded into those things that God had thought fit to conceal from them. Notice, it is a great aggravation to God, for vain men to pry into, and meddle with, the secret things which belong not to them, Deut. 29. 29. Col. 2. 18. We were all ruined by an ambition of forbidden knowledge. That which made this looking into the ark a great sin, was, that it proceeded from a very low and mean opinion of the ark. The familiarity they had with it upon this occasion, bred contempt and irreverence. Perhaps, they presumed upon their being priests, but the dignity of the ministerial office will be so far from excusing, that it will aggravate, a careless and irreverent treatment of holy things. They should, by their example, have taught others to keep their distance, and look upon the ark with a holy awe. Perhaps they presumed upon the kind entertainment they had given the ark, and the sacrifices they had now offered to welcome it home with; for this, they thought the ark was indebted to them, and should be allowed to repay themselves with the satisfaction of looking into it. But let no man think that his service done for God, will justify him in any instance of disrespect or irreverence toward the things of God. Or, it may be, they presumed upon the present mean circumstances the ark was in, newly come out of captivity, and unsettled; now that it stood upon a cold stone, they thought they might make free with it; they should never have proceeded so, or have attempted being familiar with it. It is an offence to God, if we deal meanly of his ordinances, because of the meanness of the manner of their administration. Had they looked with an understanding eye upon the ark, and not judged purely by outward appearance, they would have thought that the ark never shone with greater majesty than it did now; it had triumphed over the Philistines, and come out of their hands; the glory of Christ shone with it, more by its own power; had they considered this, they would not have looked into it thus, as a common chest.

2. Their punishment for this sin; He smote the men of Beth-shemesh, many of them, with a great slaughter. How jealous is God for the honour of his ark! He will not suffer it to be profaned; he not deceived, God is not mocked. They that will not fear his goodness, and reverently use the tokens of his grace, shall be made to feel his justice, and sink under the tokens of his displeasure. They that pry into what is forbidden, and come too near to holy fire, will find it at their peril. He smote fifty thousand and seventy men. This account of their number is written, is expressed in a very unusual manner in the original, and is neither improbable that there should be so many guilty, and so many slain, occasions many learned men to question, whether we take the matter right. In the original it is, He smote in (or among) the people, three score and ten men; fifty thousand men. The Syriac and Arabic read it, five thousand and seventy men. The Chaldee reads it, seventy men of the elders, and fifty thousand of the common people. Seventy men as valuable as fifty thousand, because they were priests. Some think the seventy men were the Beth-shemites that were slain for looking into the ark, and the fifty thousand were those that were slain by the ark, in the land of the Philistines. He smote seventy men, that is, fifty out of a thousand; which was one in twenty, a half decimation; so some understand it. The Septuagint reads thus, as we do, he smote seventy men, and fifty thousand men. Josephus says only seventy were smitten.

3. The terror that was struck upon the men of Beth-shemesh, by this severe stroke. They said, as well they might, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? v. 20. Some think, it bespeaks their murmuring against God, as if he had dealt hardly and unjustly with them. Instead of quarrelling with themselves and their own sins, they quarrelled with God and his judgments; as David was displeased, in a case not much unlike, 2 Sam. 6. 8, 9. I rather think it bespeaks their awful and reverent adoration of God, as the Lord God, and a holy Lord God, and as a God before whom none is able to stand. Thus they infer from the tremendous judgment, "Who is able to stand before the God of the ark? To stand before God to worship him, blessed be his name, is not impossible; we are through Christ invited, encouraged, and enabled to do it, but to stand before God, to contend with him, we are not able. Who is able to stand before the throne of his immediate glory, and look full upon it? 1 Tim. 6. 16. Who is able to stand before the tribunal of his inflexible justice, and make his part good there? Ps. 130. 3.—143. 2. Who is able to stand before the arm of his provoked power, and either resist or bear the strokes of it? And so on.

4. Their desire, hereupon, to be rid of the ark; they asked, To whom shall he go up from us? v. 20. They should rather have asked, "How may we make our peace with him, and recover his favour?" Mic. 6. 6, 7. But they begin to be as weary of the ark as the Philistines had been, whereas, if they had treated it with due reverence, who knows, but it might have taken up its residence among them, and all have been blessed, for the ark sake? But thus, when the word of God works with terror on sinners' consciences, they, instead of taking the blame and shame to themselves, quarrel with the word, and put that from them, Jer. 6. 10. They sent messengers to the elders of Kirjath-jearim, a strong city further up in the country, and begged of them to come and fetch the ark up thither, v. 21. They durst not touch it, to bring it to their own city, but thought it a dangerous thing. Thus do foolish men run from one extreme to the other, from presumptuous boldness to slavish shiness. Kirjath-jearim, that is, the city of woods, belonging to Judah; (Josh. 15. 9. 60.) it lay in the way from Beth-shemesh to Shiloah; so that when they sent to them to fetch it, we may suppose they intended that from thence the elders of Shiloh should fetch it, but God intended otherwise. Thus was it sent from town to town, and no care taken of it by the public; a sign that there was no king in Israel.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, we have, 1. The eclipsing of the glory of the ark, by its privacy in Kirjath-jearim for many years, v. 1-4. 2. The reason why. For in what public service did Samuel in his public services for the good of Israel, to whom he was raised up to be a judge, and he was the last that bore that character. This chapter gives us all the accounts we have of him, when he was in the prime of his time; for what we had before, was in his childhood, (ch. 2. and 3.) what we have of him after, was in his old age, ch. 8. 1. We have him here active, 1. In the reformation of lewdness from the idolatry, v. 2. 2. In the renewal of religion among them, v. 5. 3. In praying for them against the invading Philistines, (v. 7-9.) over whom, God, in answer to his prayer, gave them a glorious victory, v. 10, 11, 12. 3. In erecting a thankful memorial of that victory, v. 12. 4. In the improvement of that victory, v. 13, 14. 6. In the administration of justice, v. 15.-17. And these were the things for which God was preparing and designating him, in the early vouchsafement of his grace to him.

1. AND the men of Kirjath-jearim came, and fetched up the ark of the Lord, and brought it into the house of Abinadab, in the hill, and sanctified Eleazar his son to keep the ark of the Lord. 2. And it came to pass, while the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim, that the time was long; for it was twenty years: and all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord.

Here we must attend the ark to Kirjath-jearim, and then leave it there, to hear not a word more of it, till David fetched it thence, above forty years after, (1 Chron. 13. 6.) except once.

1. We are very willing to attend it thither, for the men of Beth-shemesh have by their own folly made that a burthen, which might have been a blessing; and gladly would we see it among those to whom it will be a savour of life unto life, for in every place where it has been of late, it has been a savour of death unto death.

Now, 1. The men of Kirjath-jearim cheerfully bring it among them; (v. 1.) They came, at the first word, and fetched up the ark of the Lord. Their neighbours, the Beth-shemites, were no better pleased to be rid of it, than they were to receive it, knowing very well that what slaughtered the ark had made at Beth-shemesh, was not an act of arbitrary power, but necessary justice, and they that suffered by it, must blame themselves, not the ark; we may depend upon the word which God hath said, (Jer. 25. 6.) Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt. Note, The judgments of God on those who profane his ordinances, should not make us afraid of the ordinances, but of profaning them, and making an ill use of them.

2. They carefully provide for its decent entertainment among them; as a welcome guest, with true affection, and as an honourable guest, with respect and reverence. (1.) They provide a proper place to receive it. They had no public building to adorn with it, but they lodged it in the house of Abinadab, which stood upon the highest ground, and, probably, was the best house in their city; or, perhaps, the master of it was the most eminent man they had for piety, and best affected to the ark. The men of Beth-shemesh left it exposed upon a stone in the open field, and though it was a city of priests, none of them received it into his house; but the men of Kirjath-jearim, though common Israelites, gave it a house-room, and, no doubt, the best furnished room in the house to which it was brought. Note, [1.] God will find out a resting place for his ark; if some thrust it from them, yet the hearts of others shall be inclined to receive it. [2.] It is no new thing for God’s ark to be thrust into private houses, and his apostles preached from house to house, when they could not have public places at command. [3.] Sometimes priests are ashamed and outdone in religion by common Israelites. (2.) They provide a proper person to attend it; They sanctified Eleazar his son to keep it; not the father, either because he was aged and infirm, or because he had the affairs of his house and family to attend, from which they would not take him off; the son, who, it is probable, was a very pious devout young man, and zealously affected toward the best things; his business was to keep the ark, not only from being seized by malicious Philistines, but from being touched or looked into by too curious Israelites. He was to keep the room clean and decent, in which the ark was, that, though it was in an obscure place, it might not look like a neglected thing, which no man looked after. It does not appear that this Eleazar was of the tribe of Levi, much less of the house of Aaron, nor was it needful that he should, for there was no altar either for sacrifice or incense, only we may suppose that some devout Israelites would come and pray before the ark, and those that did so, he was there ready to attend and assist. For this purpose, they sanctified him, that, by his own consent, they obliged him to make this his business, and to give a constant attendance to it; they set him apart for it in the name of all their citizens. This was irregular, but it was dispensed with, by reason of the present distress. When the ark is but newly come out of captivity, we cannot expect it to be of a sudden in its usual solemnity, but must take things as they are, and make the best of the present.

2. Yet we are very loath to leave it here, wishing it well at Shiloh again, but that is made desolate, (Jer. 7. 14.) however, wishing it at Nob, or Gibon, or wherever the tabernacle and the altars are; but, it seems, it must lie by the way, for want of some public-spirited men, to bring it to its proper place.

1. The time of its continuance here was long, very long; above forty years it lay in these fields of the wood, a remote obscure private place, unfrequented and almost unregarded; (v. 2.) The time that the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim was long, even till David fetched it thence. It was very strange, that, all the time that Samuel governed, the ark was never brought to its place in the holy of holies, an evidence of the decay of holy zeal among them. God suffered it to be so, to punish them for the neglect of the ark when it was in its place; and to show that the great foundation laid upon the ark, was but typical of Christ, and those good things to come, which cannot be moved, Heb. 9. 23.—12. 27. It was a just reproof to the priests, that not one of their order was sanctified to keep the ark.

2. Twenty years of this time were passed, before the house of Israel was sensible of the want of the ark. The Septuagint read it, somewhat more clearly than we do; And it was twenty years, and (that is, when) the whole house of Israel looked up again after the Lord. So long the ark remained in obscurity, and the Israelites were not sensible of the inconvenience, nor ever made an inquiry after it, what was become of it; though, while it was absent from the tabernacle, the token of God’s special presence was wanting, nor could they keep the day of atonement, as it should be kept. They were content with the altars without the ark; so easily
I. Samuel, VII.

I.

1. Better (1.) Taking this preacher; abandon you, you, Mizpeh, 5. Lord themselves ark, time him mg 256 We exhortation, a 10. of of them, began the faithful to prepare performance, 4. of the Israel, if they were Israelites, with only in preparing the heart, directing, disposing, establishing, the heart unto the Lord, 3. "That you must make a solemn business of returning to God, and do it with a serious consideration and a steadfast resolution, for both are included in praying the heart, directing, disposing, establishing, the heart unto the Lord." 3. "That you must be entire for God, for him and no other, serve him only, else you do not serve him at all, so as to please him, 4. That this is the only way, and a sure way, to serve God, and to escape this course, and he will deliver you out of the hands of the Philistines; for it was because you forsook him and served other gods, that he delivered you into their hands." This was the purport of Samuel's preaching, and it had a wonderfully good effect; (v. 4.) They put away Balaam and Ashtaroth; not only quitted the worship of them, but destroyed their images, demolished their altars, and quite abandoned them; What have we to do any more with idols? Hos. 13. 8. Isa. 30. 22.

II. He endeavoured to engage them for ever to God and his service. Now that he had them in a good mind, he did all he could to keep them in it.

1. He summons all Israel, at least by their elders, as their representatives, to meet him at Mizpeh, (v. 5.) and there he promised to pray for them. And it was worth while for them to come from the remotest parts of the country, to join with Samuel in seeking God's favour. Note, Ministers should pray for those to whom they preach, that by God's grace would make the preaching effectual. And when we come together in religious assemblies, we must remember, that it is as much our business there to join in public prayers, as it is to hear a sermon. He would pray for them, that, by the grace of God, they might be parted from their idols, and that then, by the providence of God, they might be delivered from the Philistines. Ministers would profit their people more, if they did but pray more for them.

2. They obey his summons, and not only come to the meeting, but conform to the intentions of it, and appear there very well disposed, v. 6. (1.) They drew water, and poured it out before the Lord; signifying, [1.] Their humiliation and contrition, for we have stilled their rage against the Philistines, and split upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again; (2 Sam. 14. 14.) so mean, so miserable, before God, Ps. 22. 14. The Chaldee reads it, They poured out their hearts in repentance before the Lord. They wept rivers of tears, and sorrowed after a godly sort; for it was before the Lord, and with an eye to him. [2.] Their earnest prayers and supplications to God, for mercy. The soul is, in prayer, poured out before God, and his people; Ps. 69. 26. [3.] Their heart of thanksgiving, for God's mercy, which Samuel had assured them of. This ceremony was used with that signification at the feast of tabernacles, John 7. 37. 38. and see Isa. 12. 3. Taking it in this sense, it must be read, They drew water after they had fasted. In the close of their humiliation they thus expressed their hope of pardon and reconciliation. (2.) They fasted, abstained from food, afflicted their souls; so express... ing repentance, and exciting devotion. (3.) They made a public confession, We have sinned against the Lord; so giving glory to God, and taking shame to themselves. And if we thus confess our sins, we shall find our Lord faithful and just to forgive us our sins.

3. Samuel judged them at that time in Mizpeh; that is, he assured them, in God’s name, of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance, and that God was reconciled to them. It was a judgment of absolution. Or, he received informations against those who did not leave their idols, and proceeded against them according to law. Those that would not judge themselves, he judged. Or, now he settled courts of justice among them, and appointed the terms and circuits which he observed afterward, v. 16. Now he set those wheels a-going; and whereas, before, he acted only as a prophet, now, he began to act as a magistrate; to prevent their relapsing to those sins which now they seemed to have renounced.

7. And when the Philistines heard that the children of Israel were gathered together to Mizpeh, the lords of the Philistines went up against Israel. And when the children of Israel heard it, they were afraid of the Philistines. 8. And the children of Israel said to Samuel, Cease not to cry unto the Lord our God for us, that he will save us out of the hand of the Philistines. 9. And Samuel took a sucking lamb, and offered it for a burnt-offering wholly unto the Lord; and Samuel cried unto the Lord for Israel; and the Lord heard him. 10. And as Samuel was offering up the burnt-offering, the Philistines drew near to battle against Israel: but the Lord thundered with a great thunder on that day upon the Philistines, and discomfited them; and they were smitten before Israel. 11. And the men of Israel went out of Mizpeh, and pursued the Philistines, and smote them, until they came under Beth-car. 12. Then Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Ebene-zer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.

Here, I. The Philistines invaded Israel, (v. 7.) taking ammendment from that general meeting for repentance and prayer, as if it had been a rendezvous for war, and if so, they thought it prudent to keep the war out of their own country. They had no just cause for this suspicion; but those that seek to do mischief to others, will be forward to imagine that others design mischief to them. Now see here, 1. How evil sometimes seems to come out of good. The religious meeting of the Israelites at Mizpeh brought trouble upon them from the Philistines, which, perhaps, tempted them to wish they had staid at home, and to blame Samuel for calling them together. But we may be in God’s way; and yet meet with distress; nay, when sinners begin to repent and reform, they must expect that Satan will muster all his force against them, and set his instruments in work to the utmost, to oppose and discourage them. But, 2. How good is, at length, brought out of that evil. Israel could never be threatened more seasonably than at this time, when they were repenting and praying, nor could they have been better prepared to receive the enemy; nor could the Philistines have formed any measures militarily for themselves, than to make war upon Israel at this time, when they were making their peace with God: but God permitted them to do it, that he might have an opportunity immediately of crowning his people’s reformation with tokens of his favour, and of confirming the words of his messenger, who had assured them that, if they repented, he would lend his arm out of the midst of the Philistines. Thus he makes a swiftness of wrath to prepare him, and serves the purposes of his grace to his people, even by the malicious designs of their enemies against them, Mic. 4. 11, 12.

II. Israel cleaves close to Samuel, as their best friend, under God, in this distress, though he was no military man, nor ever celebrated as a mighty man of valour; yet, being afraid of the Philistines, for whom they thought themselves an unequal match, they engaged Samuel’s prayers for them; (v. 8.) Cease not to cry unto the Lord our God for us. They were here unarmed, unprepared for war, come together to fast and pray, not to fight; prayers and tears therefore being all the weapons many of them are now furnished with, to these they have recourse. And knowing Samuel to have a great interest in heaven, they earnestly beg of him to improve it for them. They had reason to expect that promise, (v. 5.) had promised them deliverance from the Philistines; (v. 3.) and they had been observant of him, in all that which he had spoken to them from the Lord. Thus they who sincerely submit to Christ, as their Lawgiver and Judge, need not doubt of their interest in his intercession. They were very solicitous that Samuel should not cease to pray for them: what military preparations they made, they would make by his means, but let him continue in prayer; perhaps remembering, that when Moses did but let down his hand ever so little, Amalek prevailed. O what a comfort it is to all believers, that our great Intercessor above never ceases, is never silent, for he always appears in the presence of God for us!

III. Samuel intercedes with God for them, and does it by sacrifice, v. 9. He took a sucking lamb, and offered it for a burnt-offering, a whole burnt-offering, to the Lord, and while the sacrifice was in burning, with the smoke of it his prayers ascended up to heaven for Israel. Observe, 1. He made intercession with a sacrifice. Christ intercedes in the virtue of his satisfaction, and in all our prayers we must have an eye to his great obligation, depending upon that for audience and acceptance. Samuel’s sacrifice without his prayer had been an empty shadow, his prayer without the sacrifice had not been so prevalent, but both together teach us, what great things we may expect from God, in answer to those prayers which are made with faith in Christ’s sacrifice. 2. It was a burnt-offering, which was offered purely for the glory of God, so intimating, that the great plea he relied on in this prayer, was taken from the honour of God, “Lord, help thy people now, for thy name’s sake.” When we endeavour to give glory to God, we may hope he will in answer to our prayers, work for his own glory. 3. It was but one sucking lamb that he offered; for it is the integrity and intention of the heart that God looks at, more than the bulk or number of the offerings. The one lamb (typifying the Lamb of God) was more acceptable than thousands of rams or bullocks would have been without faith and prayer. Samuel was no priest, but he was Levite, a prophet; the case was extraordinary, and what he did was by special direction, and therefore was accepted of God. And justly was this reproach put upon the priests, because they had corrupted them- selves. 12. God gave a gracious answer to Samuel's prayer; (v. 3.) The Lord heard him. He was himself a Samuel, asked of God, and many a Samuel, many a mercy in answer to prayer, God gave him. Sons of prayer should be famous for praying, as Samuel was among them that call upon his name, Ps. 99. 6. The answer was a real answer. The Philistines were discomfited, (v. 10, 11.) totally routed, and that in such a manner as highly magnified the prayer of Samuel, and the name of God, and the war of Israel. 1. The prayer of Samuel was honoured, for at the very time when he was offering up his sacrifice, and his prayer with it, the battle began, and turned immediately against the Philistines. Thus while he was yet speaking God heard, and answered in thunder, Isa. 65. 24. God showed that it was Samuel's prayer and sacrifice that he had respect to, and thereby let Israel know that as in a former engagement with the Philistines he had justly chastised their presumptions confidence in the presence of the ark, on the shoulders of two profane priests, so now he graciously accepted their humble dependence upon the prayer of faith, from the mouth and heart of a pious prophet. 2. The power of God was greatly honoured; for he took the work into his own hand, and discomfited them, not with great hail-stones, which would kill the trees, (Josh. 10. 10.) but with a great thunder which frightened them, and put them into such terror and consternation that they fainted away, and became a very easy prey to the sword of Israel, before whom, being thus confounded, they were smitten. Josephus adds, that the earth quaked under them when first they made the onset, and in many places, opened and swallowed them up; and that, beside the terror of the thunder, their faces and hands were smitten with lightning, which obliged them to shift for themselves by flight. And being thus driven to their heels by the immediate hand of God, (whom they feared not so much as they had feared his ark, ch. 4. 7.) then, 3. Honour was put upon the hosts of Israel; they were made use of for the completing of the victory, and had the pleasure of triumphing over their oppressors; they pursued the Philistines, and won the battle, as soon as they found the fruits of their repentance, and reformations, and return to God! Now that they have thus engaged him for them, none of their enemies can stand before them.

V. Samuel erected a thankful memorial of this victory, to the glory of God, and for the encouragement of Israel; (v. 12.) he set up an Eben-ezer, the stone of help. If ever the people's hard hearts should lose the impressions of this providence, this stone would either revive the remembrance of it, and make them thankful, or remain a standing witness against them for their unthankfulness. 1. The place where this memorial was set up, was the same, where twenty years before, the Israelites were smitten before the Philistines, for that was beside Eben-ezer, ch. 4. 1. The sin which procured that defeat formerly, being pardoned upon their repentance, the pardon was sealed by this glorious victory in the very same place where they then suffered loss; see Hos. 1. 10. 2. Samuel himself took care to set up this monument; he had been instrumental by prayer to obtain the mercy, and therefore he thought himself in a special manner obliged to make this grateful acknowledgment of it. 3. The reason he gives for the name is, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us; in which he speaks thankfully of what was past, giving the glory of his victory to God only, who had added this to all his former favours; and yet he speaks somewhat doubtfully for the future: "Hitherto things have done well, but what God may yet do with us, we know not, that we refer to him; but let us praise him for what he has done." Note. The beginnings of mercy and deliverance are to be acknowledged by us with thankfulness so far as they go, though they be not completely finished; nay, though the issue seem uncertain. Having obtained help from God, I continue hitherto, says blessed Paul. Act 26. 22.

13. So the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coast of Israel, and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel. 14. And the cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel, from Ekron even unto Gath; and the coasts thereof did Israel deliver out of the hands of the Philistines. And there was peace between Israel and the Amorites. 15. And Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life. 16. And he went from year to year in circuit to Beth-el, and Gilgal, and Mizpah, and judged Israel in all those places. 17. And his return was to Ramah; for there was his house; and there he judged Israel; and there he built an altar unto the Lord.

We have here a short account of the further good services that Samuel did to Israel. Having parted them from their idols, and brought them home to their God, he had put them into a capacity of receiving further benefits by his ministry. Having prevailed with God, he became also, in other instances, a blessing to them; yet writing it himself, he is brief in the relation. We are not told here, but it appears, 2 Chron. 35. 18, that in the days of Samuel the prophet, the people of Israel kept the ordinance of the passover with more than ordinary devotion, notwithstanding the distance of the Ark, and the desolations of Shiloh. Many good offices, no doubt, he did for Israel; but here we are only told how in some particulars:

1. In securing the public peace; (v. 13.) In his days the Philistines came no more into the coast of Israel, made no inroads or incursions upon them, perceiving that God now fought for Israel, and that his hand was against the Philistines; this kept them in awe, and restrained the remainder of their wrath. Samuel was a protector and deliverer to Israel, not by dint of sword, as Gideon, nor by strength of arm, as Samson, but by the power of prayer to God, and carrying on a work of reformation among the people. Religion and piety are the best securities of a nation.

2. In recovering the public rights, v. 14. By his influence, Israel had the courage to demand the cities which the Philistines had unjustly taken from them, and had long detained; and the Philistines not daring to contend with one that had so great an interest in heaven, temporarily yielded to the demand. Samuel received (some think) even Ekron and Gath, two of their capital cities, though afterward they retook them; others think, some small towns that lay between Ekron and Gath, which were forced out of the Philistines' hands. This they got by their reformation and religion; they got ground of their enemies, and got forward in their affairs. It is added, There was peace between them. (Amorites, that is, the Canaanites, the remains of the natives. Not that Israel made any league with them, but that they were quiet; and not so mischievous to Israel as they had sometimes been.
1. A good and useful man growing old and unfit for service, v. 1, Samuel was old, and could not judge Israel as he had done. He is not reckoned among the judges of ancient times, perhaps not so much; but he was a man beloved, wise in his thoughts and cares when he was a child, which, perhaps, hastened the infirmities of age upon him: the fruits that are first ripe, keep the worst. He had spent his strength and spirits in the fatigue of public business, and now, if he think to shake himself as at other times, he finds he is mistaken, old and slow. These that are in the prime of their time, ought to be busy in doing the work of life; for as they go into years, they will find themselves less disposed to, and less able for it.

2. The children of a good man going to naught, and not treading in his steps. Samuel had given his sons such good hopes of their doing well, and gained such a reputation in Israel, that he made them judges, assistants to him a while, and afterward deputies under him at Beer-sheba, which lay remote from Ramah, v. 2. Probably, the southern counties petitioned for their residence there, that they might not be necessitated to travel far with their causes: we have reason to think that Samuel gave them their commissions, not because they were his sons, (he had no ambition to entail the government upon his family, any more than Gideon and his sons,) but for that such a reputation was of them; for aught that yet appeared, they were men very fit for trust; and Samuel was so proper to ease the aged judge, and take of the burthen off him, as (ceteris paribus—other things being equal) his own sons, who, no doubt, were respected for their good father’s sake, and, having such an advantage at setting out, might soon have been great, if they had been but good. But alas! his sons walked not in his ways; (v. 3.) and when he had been the reverse of his, their relation to so good a man, made that which was their ruin, their honour, was really their disgrace. Degenerate genus oppressibrum—A good extraction is a reproach to him that degenerates from it. Note, Those that have the most grace themselves, cannot give grace to their children. It has often been the grief of good men, to see their posterity, instead of treading in their steps, trampling upon them, and, as Job speaks, marking their path. Nay, many that have been brought up in the way of God, have gone by paths, so that their parents and friends have had great hopes of them, yet afterward have turned aside to by-paths, and been the grief of those of whom they should have been the joy. When Samuel’s sons were made judges, and settled at a distance from him, then they discovered themselves. Thus, (1.) Many that have been well educated, and have conducted themselves well while they were under their parents’ eye, when they have gone abroad into the world, and set up for themselves, have proved bad. Let none therefore be secure, either of themselves or their’s, but depend on divine grace. (2.) Many that have done well in a state of meanness and subjection, have been spoiled by preferment and power. Honours change men’s minds, and, too often, for the worse. It does not appear that Samuel’s sons were so proflane and vicious as Eli’s; yet they were in other respects, they were corrupt judges, they turned aside after lucre, after the mammon of unrighteousness, so the Chaldee reads it. Note, The love of money is the root of all evil. It is pernicious in any, but especially in judges. Samuel had taken no bribes, (ch. 12. 3.) but his sons did, though, no doubt, he warned them against it when he made them judges; and then they perverted judgment, in determining controversies, had an eye to the bribe, not to the law, and inquired who bid highest, not who had right on his side. It is sad with a people, when the public justice that should do them right, being perverted, does them the greatest wrong.

4. Then all the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel unto Ramah. 5. And said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king to judge us like all the nations. 6. But the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel prayed unto the Lord. 7. And the Lord said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. 8. According to all the works which they have done, since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, whereby they have forsaken me, and served other gods; so do they also unto thee. 9. Now, therefore, henken unto their voice: howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and show them the manner of the king that shall reign over them. 10. And Samuel told all the words of the Lord unto the people that asked of him a king. 11. And he said, This will be the manner of the king that shall reign over you; He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen; and some shall run before his chariots. 12. And he will appoint him captains over thousands, and captains over fifties, and will set them to ear his ground, and to reap his harvest, and to make his instruments of war, and instruments of his chariots. 13. And he will take your daughters to be confectionaries, and to be cooks, and to be bakers. 14. And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your oliveyards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants. 15. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his servants. 16. And he will take your men-servants, and your maid-servants, and your goodliest young men, and your asses, and put them to his work. 17. He will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants. 18. And ye shall cry out in that day, because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the Lord will not hear you in that day. 19. Nevertheless, the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel: and they said, Nay; but we will have a king over us; 20. That we also may be like all the nations; and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles. 21. And Samuel heard all the words of the people, and he rehearsed them in the ears of the Lord. 22. And the Lord said to Samuel, Hearken unto their voice, and make them a king. And Samuel said unto the men of Israel, Go ye every man unto his city.

We have here the starting of a matter perfectly new and surprising, which was, the setting up of kingly government in Israel. Perhaps the thing had been often talked of among them by those that were given to change, and affected that which looked great: but we do not find that it was ever till now publicly proposed and debated. (1) Abimelech by a little better than a titular king, though he is said to reign over Israel; (Judges 9. 22.) and perhaps his fall had for a great while rendered the title of king odious in Israel, as that of Tarquinius did among the Romans; but if it had, by this time the odium was worn off, and some bold steps are here taken toward so great a revolution as that amounted to.

Here is,

1. The address of the elders of Samuel in this matter, v. 4, 5. They gathered themselves together, by common consent, and not in a riotous tumultuous manner, but with respect due to his character: they came to him to his house at Ramah with their address, which contained,

1. A remonstrance of their grievances; in short, Thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways. Many a fairer occasion that people had had to ask a king, when they were oppressed by their neighbours, or embroiled at home, for want of a king in Israel; a small thing will serve factious spirits for a colour to desire a change. (1.) It was true that Samuel was old; but if that made him less able to ride the circuit, and sit long on the bench, yet it made him the more wise and experienced, and, upon that account, the fitter to rule. If he was old, was he not grown old in their service? And it was very unhind, ungrateful, nay, unjust, to cast him off when he was old, who had spent his days in doing them good. God had saved his youth from being despised, (ch. 3. 20.) yet they make his old age so, which should have been counted worthy of double honour. If old people be upbraided with their infirmities, and laid aside for them, let them not think it strange; Samuel himself was so. (2.) It was true that his sons did not walk in his ways; the more was his grief, but they could not say it was his fault; he had not, like Eli, indulged them in their badness, but was ready to receive complaints against them. And if that had been the thing desired, we may well suppose, upon the making out of the charge of bribery against them, he would have superseded their commissions and punished them. But this would not content the elders of Israel, they had another project in their head.

2. A petition for the redress of these grievances, by setting a king over them: Make us a king to judge us like all the nations. Thus far it was well, that they did not rise up in rebellion against Samuel and set up a king for themselves, vi et armis—by force; but they applied themselves to Samuel, God's prophet, and humbly begged of him to do it. But it appears by what follows, that it was a bad motion, and ill made, and was displeasing to God. God might have given them a king chosen after his own heart, when Samuel was dead; but they would anticipate God's counsel, and would have one now that Samuel was old. They had a prophet to judge them, that had immediate correspondence with heaven, and therein they were great and happy above any nation, none having God so nigh unto them as they had, Deut. 4. 7. But this would not serve, they must have a king to judge them with external pomp and power, like all the nations. A poor prophet in a mantle, though conversant in the visions of the Almighty, looked mean in their eyes, who judged by outward appearance, but a king by a grand show, with his guards and officers of state, would look great; and such a one they must have. They knew it was vain to court Samuel to take upon him the title and dignity of a king, but he must appoint them one. They do not say, "Give us a king that is wise and good, and will judge better than thy sons do," but, "Give us a king," any body that will but make a figure. Thus feebly did the thoughts of the people turn upon the existence of advancing the dignity of their nation to that of their neighbours, did really thrust themselves down from their own excellency, and prostrate their crown by casting it to the ground.

II. Samuel's resentment of this address, v. 6. Let us see how he took it: 1. It cut him to the heart. Probably, it was a surprise to him, and he had not any inclination before of their design, which made it the more grievous. The thing displeased Samuel; not then they upbraided him with his own infirmities, and his children's irregularities; he could but patiently bear what reflected on himself and his own family, but it displeased him when they said, Give us a king to judge us, because that reflected upon God and his honour. 2. It drove him to his knees; he gave them no answer, for the present, but he took some time to consider of what they proposed, and prayed unto the Lord for direction withal, and to do, spreading the case before him, and leaving it with him, and so making himself easy. Samuel was a man much in prayer, and we are encouraged in every thing to make our requests known to God, Phil. 4. 6. When any thing disturbs us, it is our interest, as well as our duty, to show God our trouble, and he gives us leave to be humbly free with him.

III. The instruction God gave him concerning this matter. They that in straits seek to God, shall find him nigh unto them, and ready to direct them. He tells him,

1. That which would be an alloy to his displeasure. Samuel was much disturbed at the motion, it troubled him greatly to see his prophetical office thus slighted, and all the good turns he had done to Israel, thus ungratefully returned; but God tells him, he must not think it either hard or strange. (1.) He must not think it hard, that they had put this slight upon him, for they had herein put a slight upon God himself; "They have not rejected thee only, but they have rejected me; I share with thee in the affection," v. 7. Note, If God interest himself in the indignities that are done us, and the contempts that are put upon us, we may well afford to bear them patiently; nor need we think the worse of ourselves, if for his sake we bear reproach, (Ps. 69. 7.) but we must not think it an honour, Col. 1. 24. Samuel must not complain that they were weary of his government, though just and gentle, for really they were weary of God's government, that was it they disliked; They have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. God reigns over the heavens, (Ps. 47. 8.) over all the world, but the government of Israel had hitherto been, in a more peculiar manner than ever any government was, a Theocracy, a divine government, their judges had their call and commission immediately from God, the affairs of their nation were under his peculiar conduct. As the constitution, so the administration, of their government, was by, Thus saith the Lord; this method they were weary of, though it was their honour and safety, above any thing, so long as they kept in with God; they were indeed so much the more exposed to calamities, if they provoked God to anger by sin, and found they could not transgress at so cheap a rate as other nations could, which, perhaps, was the true reason why they desired to stand upon the same terms with the heathen, (2.) If they choose it strange, nor marvellous at the matter, for they do as they always have done, (v. 8.) According to all the works which they have done, since the day that I brought them out of Egypt, so do they unto thee. They had at first been so very respectful and obsequious to Samuel, that he began to hope they were cured of their old stubborn disposition; but now he found himself deceived in them, and must make it appear to them, that what they did was undone to their governors, witness Moses and Aaron; nay, They have forsaken me, and served other gods; the greatness of their crime, in affecting new gods, may make this crime, of affecting new governors, seem little. Samuel might expect they would deal treacherously, for they were called transgressors from the womb, Isa. 46. 8. This had been their manner from their youth up, Jer. 29. 21.

2. He tells him that which was an answer to their demand. Samuel would not have known what to say, if God had not instructed him. Should he oppose the motion, it would bespeak a greater fondness of power and dominion than did become a prophet, and an indulgence of his sons. Should he yield to the motion, it would look like the betraying of his trust, and he would become accessory to all the bad consequences of a change. Aaron sinned in gratifying the people, when they said, Give us a king, and princes, he gave them a king in his anger. See Hos. 13. 10, 11. as he gave quails, Ps. 106. 15—78. 29. God bade Samuel humour them in this matter, (1.) That they might be beaten with their own rod, and might feel, to their cost, the difference between his government, and the government of a king; see 2 Chron. 12. 8. It soon appeared, how much worse their condition was, in all respects, under Saul, than it had been under Samuel. (2.) To prevent something worse, if they were not rather seduced by the flattering advice of those who were generally profane, and perhaps, by some that were profane, it would not have suited with the interest of the king, or the view of his greatness, to make any great noise; but it was as easy as possible to have given them a king in his anger, to gratify them, or universally revolt from their religion, and admit the gods of the nations, that they might have kings like them. Rather than so, let them have a king. [3.] God knows how to bring glory to himself, out of it, and serve his own wise purposes, even by their foolish counsels.

(2.) But he must tell them what, that when they do accept a king, they will have enough of him, and will, when it is too late, repent of their choice. This he must protest solemnly to them; (v. 9.) that, if they would have a king to rule them, as the eastern kings ruled their subjects, they would find the yoke exceedingly heavy. They looked only at the pomp and magnificence of a king, and thought that would make their nation great and considerable among its neighbours, and would gratify the people; he must bid them consider, how they would like to bear the charges of that pomp, and how they would endure that arbitrary power, which the neighbouring kings assumed. Note, Those that set their hearts inordinate upon anything in this world, for the moderating of their desires, ought to consider the inconveniences, as well as conveniences, that will attend it, and to set the one over against the other in their thoughts. Those that submit themselves to the government, and believe the world are at play, and what hard masters they are, and what a tyranny the dominion of sin is; and yet they will exchange God's government for it.

IV. Samuel's faithful delivery of God's mind to them; (v. 10.) He told them all the words of the Lord, how ill he presented it; that he construed it into a rejecting of him, and compared it with their serving other gods. That he would grant their request, if they bearks from it; and that he would order a king to represent to them the certain consequences of their choice, that they would be such as, if they had any reason left them, and would allow themselves to consult their own interest, would make them withdraw their petition, and beg to continue as they were. Accordingly, he lays before them, very particularly, what would be, not the right of a king in general, but the manner of the king that should reign over them, according to the pattern of the nations, v. 11. Samuel does not speak (as Bishop Patrick expounds it) of a just and honest right of a king to do these things, for his right is quite otherwise described in that part of Moses's law which concerns the king's duty, but such a right as the kings of the nations had then acquired. This shall be the manner of the king, that is, 1. Thus he must support his dignity, at the expense of those who are subjected to him; for he will have the authority to abuse his power, as those that have power are apt to do; and having the militia in his hand, you will be under the necessity of submitting to him.

If they will have such a king as the nations have, let them consider,

(1.) That a king must have a great retinue, abundance of servants to wait on him, grooms to bathe after his chariots, and herds-lads to ride about with him, and footmen to run before his chariots. This is the chief grandeur of princes, and the imaginary glory of great men, to have a multitude of attendant's. And whence must he have those? "Why, he will take your sons, who are free born, have a liberal education, and whom you now have at your own disposal, and will appoint them for himself, v. 11. They must wait upon him, and do his business, in the room of his deceased parents and themselves, must work for him, ear his ground, and reap his harvest, (v. 12.) and count it their preferment too," v. 16. This would be a great change.

(2.) He must keep a great table; he will not be content to dine with his neighbours upon a sacrifice, as Samuel used to do, (ch. 9. 13.) but he must have variety of dainty dishes, forced-meats, and sweet-meats, and delicate sauces; and who must prepare him these? Why, he will take your daughters, the most ingenious and handy of them, whom you hoped to prefer to houses and tables of their own, and, whether you be willing or no, they must be his confectioners, and cooks, and bakers, and the like.

(3.) "He must needs have a standing army, for guards and garrisons; and your sons, instead of being elders of your cities, and living in quiet and honour at home, must be captains over thousands, and captains over fifties, and must be disposed of at the pleasure of the sovereign."

(4.) "You may expect that he will have great favourites, whom, having dignified and emboldened, he must enrich, and give them estates suitable to their honour, and which way can he do that, but out of the blood of his inheritance? v. 14. He will take your fields and vineyards, which descended to you from your ancestors, and which you hoped to have left to your posterity after you, even the best of them; and will not only take them to himself, (you could bear that the better,) but he will give them to his servants, who will be your masters, and bear rule over them for which you have laboured. How will you like that?"

(5.) "He must have great revenues to maintain his grandeur and power with; and whence must he have them but from you? He will take the tenth of the fruits of your ground, (v. 15.) and your cattle. v. 17. You think the tenths, the double tenths, which the law of God has appointed for the support of the church, grievous enough, and grudge the payment of them; but, if you have a king, you must issue another tenth out of your estates, which will be levied with more rigour, for the support of the royal dignity. Consider the expense with the magnificence, and whether it will quit cost."

These would be their grievances; and, [1.] They would have none but God to complain to. Once they complained to the prince himself, and were answered, according to the manner of the king, "Your yoke is heavy, and I will add to it, 1 Kings, 12. 11. [2.] When they complained to God, he would not hear them; (v. 18.) nor could they expect that he should, both because they had been deaf to his calls and admonitions, and this trouble, in particular, they had brought upon themselves, by rejecting him, and would not believe, when he told them what would come of it. Note, When we bring ourselves into distress by our own irregularities, our consciences are our guides, and God's words of prayer, and the benefit of divine aids, and, if God be not better to us than we deserve, must have our relief in our own hands, and then it is bad with us.

V. The people's obstinacy in their demand, v. 19, 20. One would think such a representation of the consequences, as this was, coming from God himself, who can neither deceive by his word, nor be deceived in his knowledge, should have prevailed with them to have their request: but they were hearts were upon it, right or wrong, good or evil; "We will have a king over us, whatever God or Samuel say to the contrary; we will have a king, whatever it costs us, and whatever inconvenience we bring upon ourselves or our posterity by it." See their folly. 1. They were quite deaf to reason, and blind to their own interest. They could not answer, "Why would you be governed by a king? He would not be a pattern of prayer, and the benefit of divine aids, and, if God be not better to us than we deserve, must have our relief in our own hands, and then it is bad with us.

"We, in our day, will have this king over us." Could they but have waited ten or twelve years longer, they had had David, a king of God's giving in mercy, and all the calamities that attended the setting up of Saul had been prevented. Sudden resolves and hasty desires make work for a long and leisurely repentance. 3. That which they aimed at in desiring a king, was, not only as before, that they might be like the nations, and levelled with them, above whom God had so far advanced them; but that they might have one to judge them, and to go out before them when they took the field, and to fight their battles. Foolish people, and unwise! Could they ever desire a battle better fought for than the battle of God? Would they not have taken their prayer, and God's thunder? ch. 7. 10. Was victory hereby too sure to them? And were they fond of trying the chance of war at the same uncertainty that others did? So sick, it seems, were they of their privileges, and what was the issue? Their first king was slain in battle, which none of their judges ever were; so was Josiah, one of the last and best.

VI. The dismissing of them, with an intimation that very shortly they should have what they asked. 1.

19. They shall choose them a king over the land, the Lord, v. 21. Not but that God perfectly knew it, without Samuel's report; but thus he dealt faithfully between God and Israel, as a prophet, returning the answer to him that sent him; and thus he waited on God for further direction. God is fully acquainted with the state of the case we are in care and doubt about, but he will know it from us. His rehearsing it in the ears of the Lord, intimates that it was done in private for the people were not disposed to join with him in prayer to God for direction in this matter; also it bespeaks a holy familiarity, to which God graciously admits his people; they speak in the ears of the Lord, as one friend whispers with another; their communion with God is meat they have to eat, which the world knows not of; John 4. 32. 2. God gave direction that they should seek a king among themselves, v. 22. Without that, it was impossible they could have been prepared to the choice to Samuel, and, by him, to God, to be put in nomination. Why does not the prince of the tribe of Judah, whoever he is, look a little now, remembering Jacob's entail upon it; (v. 22.) 4. Make them kings, and let them make the best of him, and thank themselves, if that very pomp and power which they are so eager to see their sovereign in, be their plague and bane. So he gave them up to their own hearts' lust, Samuel told them this, but sent them home for the present, every man to his city; for the designation of the person must be left to God, they had now no more to do. We must leave the thing in God's hands; if he sees fit to give them a king, he will have them; and, in the mean time let them keep the peace and expect the issue.

CHAP. IX.

Samuel had promised Israel, from God, that they should have a king; it is strange that the next news is not of candidates setting up for the government, making an interest in the people, or recommending themselves to Samuel, and, by him, to God, to be put in nomination. Why does not the prince of the tribe of Judah, whoever he is, look a little now, remembering Jacob's entail upon that tribe! Is there never a bold aspiring man in Israel, to say, I will be king, if God will choose me? No, none appears; whether it is owing to a culpable mean spiritedness, or a laudable humility, Israel's salvation being, if possible, more needful than what could be paralleled in the history of any kingdom; a crown, such a crown, set up, and nobody bids for it. Most governments began in the ambition of the prince to rule, but Israel in the person of the people prevailed. Any of those elders which petitioned for a king, afterward petitioned to be a king, I should have suspected that person's ambition to have been at the bottom of the motion; but now, (let them have the praise of what was good in them,) it was not so, God having in the law undertaken to choose their king, (Deut. 17. 15.) they all sit still, till they hear from heaven, and that they do in this chapter, which begins the story of Saul, their first king, and, by strange steps of Providence, brings it to Samuel to be anointed privately, and so to be prepared for an election by lot, and a public commendation to the people; which follows in the next chapter. Here is, 1. A short account of Saul's parentage and person, v. 1. 2. A large and particular account of the bringing of him to Samuel, to whom he had been before altogether a stranger. 1. God, by revelation, had bid Samuel expect him, v. 15. 16. 2. God, by providence, led him to Samuel. (1.) Better sent to seek his father's asses, he was at a loss, v. 5. 3. 5. (2.) By the advice of his servant, he determined to consult Samuel, v. 6. 10. (3.) By the direction of the young maidens, he found him out, v. 14. Samuel, being informed of God concerning him, (v. 17.) treated him with respect in the gate, (v. 18. 21.) in the dining room, (v. 22. 24.) and, at length in private, where he gave him this surprising news, that he must be king, v. 25. 27. And these beginnings had been very hopeful and promising, if it had not been that the sin of the people was the spring of this great affair.

1. NOW there was a man of Benjamin whose name was Kish, the son of Abiel, the son of Zorot, the son of Bechoreth, the son of Aphiath, a Benjamite, a mighty man of power. 2. And he had a son whose name was Saul, a choice young man, and a goodly; and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people.

We are here told, 1. What a good family Saul was of, v. 1. He was of the tribe of Benjamin; so was the New Testament Saul, who also was called Paul, and he mentions it as his honour, for Benjamin was a favourite, Rom. 11. Phil. 3. 5. This tribe had been reduced to a very small number by the vast war with Gibeah, and much ado there was to pro vide wives for those six hundred men that were the poor remains of it out of that diminished tribe, which is here called, with good reason, the smallest of the tribes of Israel, v. 21. Saul sprang as a root out of a dry ground. That tribe, though fewest in number, was first in dignity, God giving more abundant grace to them, 1 Cor. 12. 24. His father was Kish, a mighty man of power, or, as the margin reads it, in substance; in spirit stout, in body strong, in estate wealthy. The whole lot of the tribe of Benjamin coming to be distributed among six hundred men, we may suppose their inheritances were much larger than their's who were of other tribes; an advantage which somewhat helped to balance the disadvantage of the smallness of their number.

2. What a good figure Saul made, v. 2. No mention is here made of his wisdom or virtue, his learning or piety, or any of the accomplishments of his mind, but that he was a tall, proper, handsome man, that had a good face, a good shape, and a good presence, graceful and well proportioned; among all the children of Israel, there was not a goodlier person than he; and, as if nature had marked him for more eminence than the others, he was taller, by the head and shoulders, than any of the people, the fitter to be a match for the giants of Gath, the champions of the Philistines. When God chose a king after his own heart, he pitched upon one that was not at all remarkable for the height of his stature, or any thing in his countenance, but the innocence and sweetness that appeared there, ch. 16. 7, 12. But when he chose a king after the people's heart, who aimed at nothing so much as stateliness and grandeur, he pitched upon this huge tall man, who, if he had no other good qualities, yet would look great. It does not appear that he excelled in strength, so much as he did in stature; Samson did, and him they slighted, bowed, and betrayed into the hands of the Philistines; justly therefore are they now put off with one, who, though of uncommon height, is weak as other men. They would have a king like the nations, and the nations commonly chose portly men for their kings.

3. And the asses of Kish, Saul's father, were lost: and Kish said to Saul his son, Take now one of the servants with thee, and arise, go seek the asses. 4. And he passed through mount Ephraim, and passed through the land of Shalisha, but they found them not: then they passed through the land of Shalim, and there they were not; and he passed through the land of the Benjamites, but they found them not. 5. And when they were come to the land of Zuph, Saul said to his servant that was with him, Come, and let us return; lest my father leave caring for the asses, and take thought for us. 6. And he said unto him, Behold now, there is in this city a man of God, and he is an honourable man; all that he saith cometh surely to pass: now, let us go thither; peradventure he can show us our way that we should go. 7. Then said Saul to his servant, But, behold, if we go, what shall we bring the man? for the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God: what have we? 8. And the servant answered Saul again, and said, Behold, I have here at hand the fourth part of a shekel of silver; that will I give to the man of God, to tell us our way. 9. (Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God, thus he spake, Come, and let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was beforetime called a Seer.) Then said Saul to his servant, Well said; come, let us go. So they went unto the city where the man of God was.

Here is,

I. A great man rising from small beginnings. It does not appear that Saul had any preferment at all, or was in any post of honour or trust, till he was chosen king of Israel. Most that are advanced, rise gradually; but Saul, from the level with his neighbours, stepped at once into the throne, according to that of Hannah. He raiseth up the floor out of the dust, to set them among princes, ch. 2. 8. Saul, it should seem, though he was himself married, and had children grown up, yet lived in his father's house, and was subject to him. Promotion comes not by chance or human probabilities, but God is the Judge.

II. A great event rising from small occurrences. How low does the history begin! Begin to trace Saul to the crown, we find him first employed as meanly as any we meet with called out to preferment. 1. Saul's father sends him with one of his servants, to seek some asses that he had lost. It may be, they had no way then to give public notice of such a number of asses strayed or stolen out of the grounds of Kish the Benjamite. A very good law that had to oblige men to bring back an ox or ass that went astray, but it is to be feared that was, as other good laws, neglected and forgotten. It is easy to observe here, that they who have, must expect to lose; that it is wisdom to look after what is lost; that no man should think it below him to know he state of his flocks; that children should be forward to serve their parents' interests; Saul readily went to seek his father's asses, v. 5, 4. His taking care of the asses is to be ascribed, not so much to the humility of his spirit, as to the plainness and simplicity of these times. But his obedience to his father in it, was very commendable. Serve thou a man diligent in his business, and dutiful to his superiors, willing to stoop, and willing to take pains? He does, as Saul, stand fair for preferment. The servant of Kish would be faithful only as a servant, but Saul as a son, in his own business, and therefore he sent him with him. Saul and his servant travell far on foot, it is likely, in quest of the asses, but in vain, they found them not. He missed of what he sought, but had no reason to complain of the disappointment, for he met with the kingdom, which he had dreamed of. 2. When he could not find them, he determined to return to his father, (v. 5.) in consideration of his father's tender concern for him; being apprehensive, that if they stayed out any longer, his aged father would begin to fear, as Jacob concerning Joseph, that an evil beast had devoured them, or some mischief had befallen them; "He will leave caring for the asses, as much as he was in care of his other sheep, and take no more thought for them, but the children should take care that they do nothing to grieve or frighten their parents, but be tender of their tenderness. 3. His servant moved, (for it should seem he had more religion in him than his master,) that since they were now at Ramah, they should call on Samuel, and take his advice in this important affair. Observe here,

(1.) They were close by the city where Samuel lived, and that put it into their heads to consult him; (v. 6.) There is in this city a man of God. Note, Wherever we are, we should improve our opportunities of acquainting ourselves with those that are wise and good. But there are many that will consult a man of God, if he comes in their way, that would not go a step out of their way to get wisdom.

(2.) The servant spoke very respectfully concerning Samuel, though he had no personal knowledge of him, but by common fame only; He is a man of God, and an honourable man. Note, Men of God are honourable men, and should be so in our eyes. Acquaintance with the things of God, and serviceableness to the kingdom of God, put true honour upon men, and make them great. This was the honour of Samuel, as a man of God, that all he saith, comes surely to pass. This was observed concerning him, when he was a young prophet (ch. 3. 19.) God did let none of his words fall to the ground; and still it held true.

(3.) They agreed to advise with him concerning the way that they should go, Peradventure he can show us. All the use they would make of the man of God, was, to be advised by him, whether they should return home, or, if there was yet any hope of finding the asses, which way they must go next. How to go forth to employ a prophet about! Had they said, "Let us give up the asses for lost, and now that we are so near the man of God, let us go and learn from him the good knowledge of God, let us consult him how we may order our conversations a right, and inquire the law at his mouth, since we may not have such another opportunity, and then we shall not lose our journey." The prophet said, "If so be as I have said, as became Israelites; but, to make prophecy, that glory of Israel, serve so mean a turn as this, discovered too much what manner of spirit they were of. Note, Most people would rather be told their fortune, than told their duty; how to be rich, than how to be saved. If it were the business of the men of God to direct for the recovery of lost asses, they would be consulted much more than they are now that it is their business to direct for the recovery of lost souls; so preposterous is the care of most men!

(4.) Saul was thoughtful, what present they should bring to the man of God, what fee they should give him for his advice; (v. 7.) What shall we bring the man? They could not present him, as Jeroboam's wife did Abijah, with leaves and cakes, listines: for I have looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me. 17. And when Samuel saw Saul, the Lord said unto him, Behold the man whom I spake to thee of: this same shall reign over my people.

Here, I. Saul, by an ordinary inquiry, is directed to Samuel, v. 11, 14. Gibeah of Saul was not twenty miles from Ramah where Samuel dwelt, and was near to Mizpeh where he often judged Israel; and yet, it seems, Saul had lived so very privately, and he was so little known that he had never seen Samuel; for when he met him, (v. 18.) he did not know him, so that there was no cause to suspect any secret compact or collusion between them in this matter. I knew him not, says John Baptist concerning Christ, John 1. 31. Yet I do not think it any commendation to Saul, that he was a stranger to Samuel. However, the maid-servants of Ramah, whom they met with at the places of drawing water, could give him and his servant intelligence concerning Samuel; and very particular they were in their directions, v. 12, 13. We should always be ready to give what assistance we can to those that are inquiring after God's prophets, and further them in their inquiries.

Even the maid-servants could tell them, 1. That there was a sacrifice that day in the high place, it being either an ordinary festival, or an extraordinary one; a day of prayer and thanksgiving, with the usual sacrifices were joined. The tabernacle being deprived of the ark, the altar there had not now the reputation it formerly had, nor were they tied to it, as they would be when God had again chosen a place to put his name in; and therefore now other places were allowed. Samuel had built an altar at Ramah, (ch. 7. 17.) and here we have him making use of that altar. 2. That Samuel came that day to the city, either from his circuit, or from his country-seat. He was such a public person, that his motions were generally known. 3. That this was just the time of their meeting to feast before the Lord upon the sacrifice; "About this time you will find him in the street going up to the high place." They knew the hour of the solemn feast. 4. That the people would not eat till Samuel came, not only because he was the worthiest person, and they ought, in good manners, to stay for him, and he was, as we think, the maker of the feast, the sacrifice being offered at his charge, and upon his account; but because, as a man of God, whoever made the feast, he must bless the sacrifice, that is, these parts of the sacrifice which they feasted upon; which may be considered, (1.) As a common meal; and so this is an instance of that great duty of craving a blessing upon our meat before we partake of it. We cannot expect benefit from our food without that blessing, and we have no reason to expect that blessing if we do not pray for it. Thus we must give glory to God as our Benefactor, and own our dependence upon him, and our obligations to him. Or, (2.) As a religious assembly. When the sacrifice was offered, which was the ceremony, Samuel blessed it; that is, he prayed over it, and offered up spiritual sacrifices with it, which were the substance of the others. And afterwards, after the sacrifices were performed, they did eat. Let the soul be served. The feast upon the sacrifice being a sacred rite, it was requisite that it should in a particular manner be blessed, as is the christian eucharist. They feasted, in token of their reconciliation to God by virtue of the sacrifice, and their participation of the benefits of it; and Samuel blessed it, that is, he prayed to God to grace the solemnity with his special presence, that it might answer those great ends.

Bishop Hall observes, what a particular account these maidens could give of the usages of those sacred feasts, and infers from it, That "there is no small advantage to live in religious places; for we shall be much to blame if all goodness fail beside us."

Saul and his servant followed the directions given them, and very opportunely met Samuel going to the high-place, the synagogue of the city, v. 14. This seemed purely accidental, but the Divine Providence ordered it for the forwarding of this great event. The wise God serves very great and certain purposes, by very small and casual occurrences. A sparrow falls not to the ground without our Father.

II. Samuel, by an extraordinary revelation, is informed concerning Saul. He was a seer, and therefore must see this in a way peculiar to himself.

1. God has told him, the day before, that he would, at this time, send him the man that should serve the people of Israel for such a king as they wished to have, like all the nations, v. 15, 16. He told him in his ear; that is, privately, by a secret whisper to his mind; or, perhaps, by a still small voice, some soft and gentle sounds conveyed to his ear, probably, when he was praying in secret for direction in that and other affairs of the nation. He had spoken in the ears of the Lord, (ch. 8. 21.) and now, God spake in his ear, in token of friendship and familiarity; for he revealed his secret to his servants the prophets, as secrets in their ear, Amos 3. 7. God told him before, that he might not be a surprise to him; and, perhaps, it was in expectation of it, that he appointed the feast and the sacrifice, for the imploring of God's blessing upon this numerous and important affair, though he might keep the particular occasion in his own breast, God having only told it him in his ear. The Hebrew phrase is, He uncovers the ear of Samuel; to which some allude, for the explication of the way of God's revealing himself to us; he not only speaks, but uncovers our ear. We have naturally a covering on our ears, so we cannot perceive what God says; (Job. 33. 14.) but when God will manifest himself to a soul, he uncovers the ear, says Ephhaphatha, Be opened; he takes the veil from off the heart, 2 Cor. 3. 16.

Though God had, in displeasure, granted their request for a king, yet here he speaks tenderly of Israel; for even in wrath he remembers mercy. (1.) He tells them again and again his people; though a peevish and provoking people, yet mine still. (2.) He sends them a man to be a captain over them, that they might not be a body without a head, and to save them out of the hands of the Philistines, which, perhaps, was more than many of them aimed at desiring a king. (3.) He does it with a gracious respect to them and to their cry. I have looked upon my people, and their cry is come unto me. He gratified them with what they cried for, as the tender motherhems the tender child, lest it should break its heart. And (as Bishop Patrick observes) though he would not hear their cry to relieve them against the oppression of their kings, (ch. 8. 18.) yet he was so gracious as to make those kings instruments of their deliverance from the oppression of their neighbours; which was more than they had reason to expect.

2. When Saul came up toward him in the street, God again whispered Samuel in the ear; (v. 17.) Behold the man whom I spake to thee of! Saul being a man of unusual stature, it is natural to think that Samuel fixed his eyes upon him at a distance, and perhaps, looked on the more warily toward him, because the hour was now come, when God would send him the man that should be king of Israel, and he fancied this might be he; but, that he might be fully satisfied, God told him expressly, That is the man that shall reign; (for magistrates are heirs of restraint,) in my people Israel.

18. Then Saul drew near to Samuel in the gate, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is. 19. And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer: go up before me unto the high place; for ye shall eat with me to-day; and to-morrow I will let thee go, and will tell thee all that is in thine heart. 20. And as for thine assses that were lost three days ago, set not thy mind on them; for they are found. And on whom is all the desire of Israel; is it not on thee, and on all thy father's house? 21. And Saul answered and said, Am not I a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel? and my family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin wherefore then speakest thou so to me? 22. And Samuel took Saul and his servant, and brought them into the parlour, and made them sit in the chiefest place among them that were bidden, which were about thirty persons. 23. And Samuel said unto the cook, Bring the portion which I gave thee, of which I said unto thee, Set it by thee. 24. And the cook took up the shoulder, and that which was upon it, and set it before Saul. And Samuel said, Behold that which is left! set it before thee, and eat; for unto this time hath it been kept for thee, since I said, I have invited the people. So Saul did eat with Samuel that day. 25. And when they were come down from the high place into the city, Samuel communed with Saul upon the top of the house. 26. And they arose early: and it came to pass, about the spring of the day, that Samuel called Saul to the top of the house, saying, Up, that I may send thee away. And Saul arose, and they went out both of them, he and Samuel, abroad. 27. And as they were going down to the end of the city, Samuel said to Saul, Bid the servant pass on before us, (and he passed on,) but stand thou still a while, that I may show thee the word of God.
figure Samuel made, though so great a man: he took not any state, had no attendants, no ensigns of honour carried before him, nor any distinguishing habit, no not when he went to church, but appeared, in all respects, so much a common person, that Saul, though he was told he should meet him, never suspected that it was he; but, as if he looked more like a servant than a prince, he was invited to the seer's house. Thus is great worth oftentimes hid under a very despicable appearance. Samuel knew that it was not the house, but the man, that he wanted, and therefore answered him, "I am the seer, the person you inquire for," v. 19. Samuel knew him before he knew Samuel; thus, though all that are called to the kingdom of glory, are brought to know God, yet first they were known of him, Gal. 4:11.

Now, 1. Samuel obliges him to stay with him till the next day; the greatest part of this day had been spent in sacrificing, and the rest of it was to be spent in holy feasting, and therefore, "To-morrow I will let thee go, and no sooner; now go up before me to the high place; let us pray together, and then we will talk together." Saul had nothing in his mind but to find his asses; but Samuel would take him out of the way here, and dispose him to the exercises of piety; and therefore bids him go to the high place, and go before him, because, it may be, some business obliged Samuel to call by the way.

2. He satisfies him about his ass; (v. 20.) "Set not thy mind on them, be not in further care about them, they are found." By this, Saul might perceive that he was a prophet, that he could give him an answer to the inquiry which he had not yet made, and tell him what he thought; and from thence might infer, If a man of God could do this, much more doth God himself understand our thoughts after off. 3. He surprises him with an intimation of preferment before him, "On whom is all the desire of Israel? Is it not a king that they are set upon? and there is never a man in Israel that will suit them so as thou wilt." It does not appear that the country had as yet any eye upon him for the government, because they had left it wholly to God to choose for them; and he does all, as he wished for; and his advancement would be the advancement of his family and relations, as Ahner, and others.

To this strange intimation Saul returns a very modest answer, v. 21. Samuel, he thought, did but banter him, because he was a tall man, but a very unlikely man to be a king; for though the historian says (v. 1.) his father was a mighty man of power, yet he himself speaks diminutively of his tribe and family. "Benjamin, the youngest of Jacob's sons, when grown up to be a man, was called a little one, (Gen. 44:20.) that tribe diminished by the war of Gibeah, and I am a Benjaminite, my family the least; probably, a younger house; not in any place of honour or trust, no not in their own tribe." Gideon had expressed himself thus, Judg. 6:15. An humble disposition is a good presage of preferment.

II. At the public feast; thither Samuel took him and his servant. Though the advancing of Saul would be the deposing of Samuel, yet that good prophet was so far from envying him, or hearing him any ill-will for it, that he was the first and forwardest man to do him honour, in compliance with the will of God. If this be the man whom God has chosen, though he be none of Samuel's particular friends, he is it. Two things belong to the table, nay, to his bosom. We may suppose it was no unseemly kindness to Saul, to give him a meal's meat, for it seems, by what he said, (v. 7.) that all their meat and money were spent. But this was not all, Samuel treats him not as a common person, but a person of quality and distinction, to prepare both him and the people for what was to follow. Two marks of honour he put upon him.

1. He set him in the best place, as more honourable than any other of the guests, to whom he said, Give this man place, Luke 14:9. Though we may suppose the magistrates were there, who in their own city would claim precedence, yet the master of the feast, in order to Samuel and David, whom if he were a king, must be respected as his prime minister of state) sit in the chiefest place, v. 22. Note, Civil respects must be paid to those, who, in civil things, have the precedence given them by the Divine Providence.

2. He presented him with the best dish; which, having had notice from heaven the day before of his coming, (v. 15.) he had designed for him, and ordered the cook to secure for him, when he gave orders for inviting the guests, and making preparation for them. And what should this precious dish be, which was so very carefully reserved for the king-elect? One would expect it should be something very nice and delicate; no, it was a plain shoulder of mutton: (v. 23, 24.) the right shoulder of the peare-offering was to be given to the priests, who were God's receivers: (Lev. 7:22.) the next in honour to that, was the left shoulder, which, probably, was always allotted to those that sat at the upper end of the table, and was wont to be Samuel's mess at other times; so that his giving it to Saul now, was an implicit resignation of his place to him. Some observe a significance in this dish; the shoulder denotes strength, and the breast, which, some think, went with it, denotes affection: he that was king, had the government upon his shoulder, for he must bear the weight of it; and the people in his bosom, for they must be dear to him.

III. What passed between them in private; both that evening and early the next morning, Samuel communed with Saul upon the flat roof of the house, v. 25, 26. We may suppose Samuel now told him the whole story of the people's desire of a king, the grounds of their desire, and God's grant of it; to all which, Saul, living very private, was perhaps a stranger; he satisfied him that he was the person God had chosen, and prepared for it; and whereas Saul would object, that Samuel was in possession, and he would not for all the world take it out of his hands, Samuel, we may suppose, gave him all the assurance he could desire, of his willingness to resign. Early in the morning, he sent him toward home, brought him a part of the way, bade him send his servant before, that they might be private, (v. 27.) and there, as we find in the beginning of the next chapter, he appointed him, and there in showed him the word of the Lord; that is, gave him full satisfaction that he was the person chosen to be king, for he would not jest with that sacred rite. It is by theunction of the Holy Ghost, that Christ, the great Prophet, shows us the word of the Lord; (1 John 2:27.) the same anointing teacheth you of all things.

CHAP. X.

We left Samuel and Saul walking together, probably some private way over the fields down from Ramah, perhaps in the path where he was ravished, ch. 10:9, 10, from Samuel the word of God. Now here we have, I. The anointing of Saul, and then and there, v. 1. The signs Samuel gave him, (v. 2-6.) and instructions, v. 7, 8. II. The accomplishment of those signs to the satisfaction of Saul, v. 9. III. His return again to his own city, v. 10, 11. IV. His public election by lot, and solemn inauguration, v. 17-26. V. His return again to his own city, v. 26. 27. It is a great work that is here doing, the setting up not only of a monarch, but a monarchy itself, in Israel: and therefore in all the advances towards it, much of God is seen.
I. Samuel took a vial of oil, and poured it upon his head, and kissed him, and said, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance? 2. When thou art departed from me to-day, then thou shalt find two men by Rachel’s sepulchre, in the border of Benjamin, at Zelzah; and they will say unto thee, The asses which thou wentest to seek are found: and, lo, thy father hath left the care of the asses, and sowrathethet, saying, What shall I do for my son? 3. Then shalt thou go on forward from thence, and thou shalt come to the plain of Tabor, and there shall meet thee three men going up to God to Beth-el, one carrying three kids, and another carrying three loaves of bread, and another carrying a bottle of wine: 4. And they will salute thee, and give thee two loaves of bread, which thou shalt receive of their hands. 5. After that thou shalt come to the hill of God, where is the garrison of the Philistines: and it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place, with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them; and they shall prophesy: 6. And the Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man. 7. And let it be, when these signs are come unto thee, that thou do as occasion serce thee; for God is with thee. 8. And thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal; and, behold, I will come down unto thee, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings: seven days shalt thou tarry, till I come to thee, and show thee what thou shalt do.

Samuel is here executing the office of a prophet, giving Saul full assurance from God that he should be king, as he was afterward, according to these prophecies which went before of him.

1. He anointed him and kissed him, v. 1. This was not done in a solemn assembly, but being done by divine appointment, that made up the want of all external solemnities, nor was it ever the less valid for its being done in private, under a hedge, or, as the Jews say, by a fountain. God’s institutions are great and generous, though the circumstances of their administration be ever so mean and despicable. 1. Samuel, by anointing Saul, assured him that it was God’s act to make him a king, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee? And in token of that, the High Priest was anointed to his office, which signified the conferring of these gifts upon him, that were requisite for the discharge of his office; and the same was intimated in the anointing of kings; for, whom God calls, he qualifies, and that is a good proof of a commission. These sacred anointings, then used, pointed at the great Messiah, or anointed One, the King of the church, and High Priest of our profession, who was anointed with the oil of the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure, and above all the priests and princes of the Jewish church. It was common oil, of which Samuel used, and we read not of his blessing it, or praying over it. But it was only a vial of oil that he anointed him with; the vessel brittle, because his kingdom would soon be cracked and broken; and the quantity small, because he had but little of the Spirit conferred upon him, to what David had, who was therefore anointed with a horn of oil, and so were Solomon and Jehu with a box of oil. 2. By kissing him, he assured him of his own approbation of the choice; not only his consent to it, but his complacency in it, though it abridged his power and eclipsed his glory, and the glory of his family. “God has anointed thee,” says Samuel, “to be king, and I am satisfied and very well pleased, in pledge of which, take this kiss.” It was likewise a kiss of homage and allegiance; hereby he bound the choice of him to be king, but his king; and in this sense we are commanded to kiss the Son, Ps. 2.

II. For his further satisfaction, he gives him some hints, which should come to pass immediately, this very day; and they were such as would not only confirm the word of Samuel in general, and prove him a true prophet, but would confirm this word to Saul in particular, that he should be king. 1. He should presently meet with some that would bring him intelligence from home, of the care his father’s house was in concerning him; (v. 2.) these he would meet hard by Rachel’s sepulchre, the first place he directed him to, was Rachel’s sepulchre, the sepulchre of one of his ancestors, for Rachel died in travail with Benjamin; there he must read a lecture of his own mortancy, and now that he had a crown in his eye, must think of his grave, in all which his honour would be laid in the dust. Here two men would meet him, perhaps sent on purpose to look after him, and would tell him the asses were found, and his father was in pain concerning him, saying, What shall I do for my son? He would reckon it happened well that he met with these messengers; and it is good to eye Providence in favourable conjunctures, (though the matter be minute,) and to be encouraged to trust in greater matters.

2. He should next meet with others going to Beth-el, where, it should seem, there was a high place concerning him; saying, and there men were bringing their sacrifices thither, v. 3. 4. It was token for good to one that was designed for the government of Israel, where er he came, to meet with people going to worship God. It is supposd that these kids and loaves, and the bottle of wine, which the three men had with them, were designed for sacrifice, with the meat-offerings and drink offerings that were to attend the sacrifice; yet Samuel tells Saul they would give him two of their loaves, and he must take them. This would look to us now like the relieving of a beggar. Saul must hereafter remember the time when he received alms, and must therefore be humble and charitable to the poor. But, perhaps, it would then be constned, a fit present for a prince; and as such, Saul must receive it, if he would not be supposed to be such a man by such a know not what they did, nor why they did it, but God put it into their hearts, which made it the more fit to be a sign to him. These two loaves which were the first tribute paid to this new-anointed king, might serve for an admonition to him, not to spend the wealth of his crown in luxury, but still to be content with plain food. Bread is the staff of life.

The most remarkable sign of all would be his joining with a company of prophets that he should meet with, under the influence of a spirit of prophecy which should at that time come upon him. What God works in us by his Spirit serves much more for the confirming of faith, than anything wrought for us by his providence. Here he tells him, v. 5, 6. (1.) Where this would happen, at the hill of God, where there was a garrison of the Philistines; which is supposed to be near Gibeah, his own city, for there was the Philistines' garrison, ch. 13. 3. Perhaps, it was one of the articles of Samuel's agreement with them, that they should have a garrison there, or rather, after they were subdued in the beginning of his time, they got ground again, so far as to force this garrison into that place, and thence God raised up the man that should chastise them. There was a place that was called the hill of God, because of the school of the prophets that was built upon it; and such respect did even Philistines themselves pay to religion, that a garrison of their soldiers suffered a school of God's prophets to live peaceably by them, and did not only not dislodge them, but not restrain or disturb the public exercises of their devotion. (2.) Upon what occasion; he should meet a company of prophets with music before them, prophesying, and with them he should join himself. These prophets were not (as it should seem) divinely inspired to foretell things to come, nor did God reveal himself to them by dreams and visions, but they employed themselves in the study of the law, in instructing their neighbours, and in the acts of piety, especially in praising God, wherein they were wonderfully assisted and enlarged by the Spirit of God. It was happy for Israel, that they had not only prophets, but companies of prophets, who gave them good instructions, and set them good examples, and helped very much to keep up religion among them. Now the word of the Lord was not so precious, as it had been when Samuel was first raised up, who had been instrumental in founding these colleges, or religious houses, whence, it is probable, the synagogues took their rise. What a pity was it that Israel should be weary of the government of such a man, who, though he had not, as a man of war, expelled the Philistines, yet they had been at the high-priest, probably, offering sacrifices to them, they came back singing psalms. We should come from holy ordinances with our hearts greatly enlarged in holy joy and praise. See Ps. 138 5. Saul should find himself strongly moved to join with them, and should be turned thereby into another man from what he had been while he lived in a private capacity. The Spirit of God, by his ordinances, changes men, wonderfully transforms them; Saul, by praising God in the communion of saints, became another man, but whether a new man or no, may be question.

3. He directs him to proceed in the administration of his gift. God should lead him, and as Samuel should advise him. 1. He must follow Providence in ordinary cases; (v. 7.) "Do as occasion shall serve thee. Take such measures as thine own prudence shall direct thee." But, 2. In an extraordinary strait that would hereafter befal him at Gical, and would be the most critical juncture of all other, when he would have the special need of divine aid, he must wait for Samuel to come to him, and must tarry seven days in expectation of him, v. 8. How his failing in this matter proved his fall, we find afterwards, ch. 13. 11. It was a plain intimation to him, that he was upon his good behaviour, and, though a king, must act under the direction of Samuel, and do as he should order him. The greatest of men must own themselves in subjection to God and his word.

9. And it was so, that when he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart: and all those signs came to pass that day. 10. And when they came thither to the hill, behold, a company of prophets met him; and the Spirit of God came upon him, and he prophesied among them. 11. And it came to pass, when all that knew him before time saw that, behold, he prophesied among the prophets, then the people said one to another, What is this that is come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets? 12. And one of the same place answered, and said, But who is their father? Therefore it became a proverb, Is Saul also among the prophets? 13. And when he had made an end of prophesying, he came to the high place. 14. And Saul's uncle said unto him and to his servant, Whither went ye? And he said, To seek the asses: and when we saw that they were no where, we came to Samuel. 15. And Saul's uncle said, Tell me, I pray thee, what Samuel said unto you. 16. And Saul said unto his uncle, He told us plainly that the asses were found. But of the matter of the kingdom, whereof Samuel spake, he told him not.

Saul has now taken his leave of Samuel, much amazed, we may well suppose, at what had been done to him, almost ready to question whether he was awake or no, and whether it be not a dream. Now here we are told, v. 9. Those signs which Samuel had given him, came to pass very punctually; but that which gave him the greatest satisfaction of all, was this, he found im mediately that God had given him another heart. A new fire was kindled in his breast, such as he had never before been acquainted with; seeking his ass is quite out of his mind, and he thinks of nothing but fighting the Philistines, redressing the grievances of Israel, making laws, administering justice, and providing for the public safety: these are the things that now fill his head. He finds himself raised to such a pitch of boldness and bravery, as he never thought he should have been conscions of. He has no longer the heart of a husbandman, that is, low and mean, and narrow, and concerned only about his corn and cattle; but the heart of a statesman, a general, an apostle. When God calls his service, he will make fit for it. If he advance to another station, he will give another heart, to those who sincerely desire to serve him with their power.

II. What occurred when he came near home. They came to the hill, (v. 10.) that is, to Gibeah, or Geba, which signifies a hill; and so the Chaldee here takes it as a proper name; he met with the prophets as Samuel had told him, and the Spirit of God came upon him; strongly and suddenly, so the word signifies; but not so as to rest and abide upon him. It came on, so as to go off quickly: however, for the present, it had a strange effect upon him; for he immediately joined with the prophets in their devotion, and that with as much decorum, and as great a transport of affection, as any of them. He prophesied among them.

Now, 1. His prophesying was publicly taken notice of, v. 11, 12. He was now among his acquaintance, who, when they saw him among the prophets, called one to another to come and see a strange sight. This would prepare them to accept of him as a king, though one of themselves, when they had seen how God had advanced him to the honour of a prophet. The seventy elders prophesied before they were made judges, Num. 11. 25. Now, (1.) They all wondered to see Saul among the prophets. What is this that is come to the son of Kish? Though this school of the prophets was near his father's house, yet he had never associated with them, nor showed them any respect, perhaps had sometimes spoken slightly of them; and now to see him prophesying among them, was a surprise to them, as it was long after, when his namesake, in the New Testament, preached that gospel which he had before persecuted, Acts 9. 21. When God gives another heart, it will soon show itself. (2.) One of them, that was wiser than the rest, asked, "Who is his father, or instructor? Is it not God? Are they not all taught of him? Do they not all owe their gifts to him? And is he limited? Cannot he make Saul a prophet, as well as any of them, if he pleases?" Or, "Is not Samuel their father?" Under God, he was so; and Saul had now lately been with him, by which his servant, he might know. No marvel for him to prophesy, who lay, last night, under Samuel's roof. (3.) It became a proverb commonly used in Israel, when they would express their wonder at a bad man's either becoming good, or, at least, being found in good company, is Saul among the prophets? Note, Saul among the prophets, is a wonder to a proverb. Let not the worst be despised of, yet let not an external show of devotion, and a sudden change for the present, be too much relied on; for Saul among the prophets, was Saul still.

But, 2. His being anointed was kept private. When he had done prophesying, (1.) It should seem he uttered all his words before the Lord, and recommended the affair to his favour, for he went straight to the high place, (v. 13.) to give God thanks for his mercies to him, and to pray for continued mercies. He industriously concealed it from his relations. His uncle, who met with him either at the high place, or as soon as he came home, examined him, v. 14. Saul owned, for his servant knew it, that they had been with Samuel, and that he told them the asses were found, but said not a word of the kingdom, v. 14, 15. This was an instance, [1.] Of his humility; many a one would have been so elevated with this surprising elevation, as to proclaim it upon the house-top. But Saul, though he might please himself with it, in his own breast, did not pride himself in it among his neighbours. The hearts of the kings of glory are well enough pleased that the world knows them not, 1 John 3. 1. [2.] Of his prudence. Had he been forward to proclaim it, he would have been envied, and he knew not what difficulties that might have created him. Samuel had communicated it to him as a secret, and he knows not how to keep counsel. Thus it appears, that he had another heart, a heart fit for government. [3.] Of his dependence upon God. He does not go about to take an interest for himself, but leaves it to God to carry on his own work by Samuel, and, for his own part, sits still, to see how the matter will fall.

17. And Samuel called the people together unto the Lord to Mizpeh; 18. And said unto the children of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, and of them that oppressed you: 19. And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations; and ye have said unto him, Nay, but set a king over us. Now therefore present yourselves before the Lord by your tribes, and by your thousands. 20. And when Samuel had caused all the tribes of Israel to come near, the tribe of Benjamin was taken. 21. When he had caused the tribe of Benjamin to come near by their families, the family of Matri was taken, and Saul, the son of Kish, was taken: and when they sought him, he could not be found. 22. Therefore they inquired of the Lord further, if the man should yet come thither. And the Lord answered, Behold, he hath hid himself among the stuff. 23. And they ran and fetched him thence: and when he stood among the people, he was higher than any of the people, from his shoulders and upward. 24. And Samuel said to all the people, See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people? And all the people shouted, and said, God save the king! 25. Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord. And Samuel sent all the people away, every man to his house. 26. And Saul also went home to Gibeah; and there went with him a band of men, whose hearts God had touched. 27. But the children of Belial said, How shall this man save us? And they despised him, and brought him no presents: but he held his peace.

Saul's nomination to the throne is here made public, in a general assembly of the elders of Israel, the representatives of their respective tribes at Mizpeh. It is probable that this convention of the states was called as soon as conveniently it might, after Saul was anointed, for if there must be a change in their government, the sooner the better: it might be of bad consequence to be long in the doing. The people being met in a solemn assembly, in which God was, in a peculiar manner, present, (and therefore it is said, they were called together unto the Lord, v. 17.) Samuel acts for God among them.

I. He reproves them for casting off the government of a prophet, and desiring that of a captain. He shows them (v. 18.) how happy they had been under the divine government; when God ruled them he delivered them out of the hand of them that oppressed them, and what would they desire more? Could the mightiest man of valour do that for them, which the Almighty God had done? He likewise shows them (v. 19.) that if God had put up with them, he had saved them out of all their tribulations, by his own power, and by such as he had immediately called and qualified, in desiring a king to save them. He tells them, in plain terms, "Ye have this day rejected your God, ye have, in effect, done it, so he construes it, and he might justly, for your so doing, reject you." They that can live better by sense than by faith, that stay themselves upon an arm of flesh, and trust the Almighty arm, for sake a Fountain of living waters for broken cisterns. And some make their obstinacy in this matter, to be a presage of their rejecting Christ, in casting off whom, they cast off God, that he should not reign over them.

II. He puts them upon choosing their king by lot: he knew whom God had chosen, and had already anointed him, but he knew also the peevishness of that people, and that there were those among them who would not acquiesce in the choice, if it depended upon his single testimony; and therefore that every tribe, and every family of the chosen tribe, might please themselves with having a chance for it, he calls them to the lot, v. 19. Benjamin is taken out of all the tribes, (v. 20.) and out of that tribe Saul the son of Kish, v. 21. By this method it would appear to the people, as it already appeared to Samuel, that Saul was appointed of God to be king, for the disposal of the lot is of the Lord. It would also prevent all disputes and exceptions, for the lot causeth contention to cease, and furieth between the mighty. When the tribe of Benjamin was taken, they might easily foresee that they were setting up a family that would soon be put down again, for dying Jacob had, by the spirit of prophecy, entailed the dominion upon Judah; that is the tribe that must rule as a lion. Benjamin only rovin as a wolf, Gen. 49. 10, 27. Those therefore that knew the scriptures, could not be very fond of doing that which they foresaw must, ere long, be undone again.

III. It is with much ado, and not without further inquiries of the Lord, that Saul is at length produced. When the lot fell upon him, every one expected that it should fall upon his native tribe, the Benjaminites; but, instead of that, none of his friends could find him, (v. 21.) he had hid himself among the stuff, v. 22. So little fond was he now of that power, which yet, when he was in possession of, he could not without the utmost indignation think of parting with. He withdrew, in hopes that, upon his not appearing, they would proceed to another choice, or thus to express his modesty: for, by what had already passed, he knew he must be the man. We may suppose he was at this time really averse to take upon him the government, 1. Because he was conscious to himself of unfitness for so great a trust. He had not been bred up to books, or arms, or courts, and feared he should be guilty of some fatal blunder. 2. Because it would expose him to the envy of his neighbours that were ill affected toward him. 3. Because he understood by what Samuel had said, that the people sinned in asking a king, and it was in anger that God granted their request. 4. Because the affairs of Israel were at this time in a bad posture: the Philistines were strong, the Ammonites threatening, and he must be bold indeed, that will set sail in a storm.

Let the experience of Samuel, that choice well made, which God himself made, would leave no way untreated to find him out, on whom the lot fell. They inquired of the Lord, either by the High Priest, and his breast-plate of judgment, or by Samuel, and his spirit of prophecy; and the Lord directed them where they should find him, hid among the carriages, and thence they fetched him, v. 23. Note, None will find a loss but last by their humility. Honesty, like the shadow, follows those that flees from it, but flees from those that pursue it.

IV. Samuel presents him to the people, and they accept of him. He needed not mount the bench or scaffold, to be seen; when he stood upon even ground with the rest, he topped them all, was seen above them all, for he was taller than any of them by head and shoulders, "Let the Lord judge;" and he was chosen of God: "For the Lord hath chosen for you, just such a one as you wished for; there is none like him among all the people, that has so much majesty in his countenance, and such a graceful stateliness in his mien; he is in the crowd like the cedar among the shrubs. Let your own eyes be judges, is he not a brave and gallant man?" The people hereupon signified their approbation of the choice, and their acceptance of him; they showed and said, Let the king live; that is, let him live, that he may be our prince in health and prosperity. Subjects were wont to testify their affection and allegiance to their prince, by their good wishes, and those turned (as our translation does this) into addresses to God, Ps. 72. 15. Prayer shall be made for him continually, Ps. 20. 1. Samuel had told them, they would soon be weary of their king, but in the mind they are now in, they will never be so; Let him live.

V. Samuel settles the original contract between them, and leaves it upon record, v. 25. He had before told them the manner of the king, (ch. 8. 11.) how he would abuse his power; now he tells them the manner of the kingdom, or rather, the law, or judgment, or constitution, of it; what power the prince might challenge, and the utmost of the property the subject might claim. He fixed the landmark between them that neither might encroach upon the other; let them rightly understand one another at first, and let the agreement remain in black and white, and that will preserve a good understanding between them ever after. The learned Bishop Patrick thinks he now repeated and registered what he had told them, (ch. 8. 11.) of the arbitrary power their kings would assume, that it might hereafter be a witness against them, that they had by the advice of the other; let them rightly understand one another at first, and let the agreement remain in black and white, and that will preserve a good understanding between them ever after.

VI. The convention was dissolved when the solemnity was over; Samuel sent every man to his house. Here were no votes cast, nor, for aught that appears, so much as a motion made, for the raising of money to support the dignity of their new elected king; if therefore he tells them, they must take what they do not think fit to give, (which it was necessary that he should have,) they must thank themselves. They went every man to his house, pleased with the name of a king over them, and Saul went home to Gibeah, to his father's house, not puffed up with the name of a kingdom under him. At Gibeah, he had no palace, no throne, no
I.

1. There were some so faithful as to attend him, (v. 26.) a band of men whose hearts God had touched. Not the body of the people, but a small company, who, either because they were fond of their own choice of a king, or because they were pleased with God’s choice of this king, or because they had so much more sense than their neighbours, as to conclude, that if he were a king, he ought to be respected accordingly, went with him to Gibeah, as his life-guard. They were those whose hearts God had touched, in this instance, to do their duty. Note, Whatever good there is in us, or is done by us, at any time, it must be ascribed to the grace of God. If the heart bend at any time the right way, it is because he has touched it. One touch is enough, when it is divine. 2. There were others so spiteful as to affront him; children of Belial, men that would endanger no yoke, that would be pleased with nothing that either God or Samuel did; they despised him, (v. 27.) for the meanness of his tribe and family, the smallness of his estate, and privacy of his education; and they said, How shall this man save us? Yet they did not propose any man more likely; nor, whosoever they had, must their salvation come from the man, but from God. They would not join with their neighbours in testifying an affection to him and his government, by bringing him presents, or addressing him upon his accession to the crown. Perhaps those discontented spirits were most earnest for a king, and yet now that they had one, they quarrelled with him, because he was not altogether such a one as themselves. It was reason enough for them not to like him, because others did. Thus differently are men affected to our exalted Redeemer. God hath set him king upon the holy hill of Zion. There is a remnant that submit to him, rejoice in him, bring him presents, and follow him wherever he goes; and they are such whose hearts God has touched, whom he has made willing in the day of his power. But there are others who despise him, who ask, How shall this man save us? They are offended in him, stumble at his external meanness, and they will be broken by it. Lastly, Here is a new step towards the bad conduct of those that were disaffected to his government? He held his peace; margin, He was as though he had been deaf. He was so far from resenting it, that he seemed not to take notice of it. Which was an evidence both of his humility and modesty, and of the mercifulness of his disposition, and also, that he was well satisfied with his title to the crown; for those are commonly most jealous of their honour, and most revengeful of affronts, who would be revenged the most. Christ held his peace, when he was afflicted, for it was the day of his patience; but there is a day of recompense coming.

CHAP. XI.

In this chapter, we have the first-fruits of Saul’s government, in the glorious rescue of Jabesh-gilead out of the hands of the Ammonites. Let not Israel thence infer that therefore they did well to ask a king; God could and would have saved them without one; but let them admire God’s goodness, that he did not reject them, when they went to him, and acknowledge his wisdom in the choice of the person, whom, if he did not find fit, yet he made fit, for the great trust he called him to, and enabled, in some measure, to merit the crown by his public service, before it was intrusted to him by the jealous probation. Here is, I. The great extremity to which the city of Jabesh-gilead was reduced, on the other side Jordan, by the Ammonites, v. 1-3. II. Saul’s great readiness to come to their relief, whereby he signalized himself, v. 4-10. III. The interview between Saul and the remnant of Jabesh-gilead, by which God signalized him, v. 11. IV. Saul’s tenderness, notwithstanding this, toward those that had opposed him, v. 12, 13. V. The public confirmation and recognition of his election to the government, v. 14, 15.

1. THEN Nahash the Ammonite came up, and encamped against Jabesh-gilead: and all the men of Jabesh said unto Nahash, Make a covenant with us, and we will serve thee. 2. And Nahash the Ammonite answered them, On this condition will I make a covenant with you, that I may thrust out all your right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon all Israel. 3. And the elders of Jabesh said unto him, Give us seven days’ respite, that we may send messengers unto all the coasts of Israel: and then, if there be no man to save us, we will come out to thee. 4. Then came the messengers to Gibeah of Saul, and told the tidings in the ears of the people: and all the people lifted up their voices, and wept.

The Ammonites were bad neighbours to those tribes of Israel that lay next them, though descend from the same stock, and, for that reason, dealt civilly with Israel. See Deut. 2. 19. Jephthah, in his time, had humbled them, but now the sin of Israel had put them into a capacity to make head again, and avenge that quarral. The city of Jabesh-gilead had been, some ages ago, destroyed by Israel’s sword of justice, for not appearing against the wickedness of Gibeah; (Judg. 21. 10.) and now being replenished again, probably, by the pietosity of the Ammonites, they are rescued from the commission of being destroyed by the Ammonites, as if some bad fate attended the place. Nahash, king of Ammon, (1 Chron. 19. 1.) laid siege to it. Now here, 1. The besieged beat a parley; (v. 1.) “Make a covenant with us, and we will surrender upon terms, and serve thee.” They had lost the virtues of Israelites, else they had not thus lost the value of Israelites, nor tamely yielded to serve an Ammonite, without one bold struggle for themselves. Had they not broken their covenant with God, and forsaken his service, they needed not thus to have courted a covenant with a Gentile nation, and offered themselves to serve them. 2. The besiegers offer them base and barbarous conditions; they will spare their lives, and take them to be their servants, upon condition that they shall put out their right eyes. v. 2. The Gileadites were content to part with their liberty and estates, for the ransom of their blood; and had the Ammonites taken them at their word, the matter had been so settled immediately, and the Gileadites would not have sent out for relief: but their abject concessions make the Ammonites more insolent in their demands, and they cannot be content to have them their servants, but, (1.) They must make them put out their right eyes, for so the thronging out of an eye would be. (2.) They must disable them for war, and render them incapable, though not of labour, that would have been a loss to their lords, yet of bearing arms; for in those times they fought with shields in their left hands, which covered their left eye, so that a soldier without his eye was, in effect, blind. (3.) They must put a reproach upon Israel, as weak and cowardly, that would suffer the inhabitants of one of their chief cities be thus miserably used, and not offer to rescue them.

3. The besieged desire, and obtain seven days' time to consider of this proposal, v. 3. If Nahash had not granted them this reprieve, we may suppose the horror of the proposal would have made them desperate, and they would rather have died with their swords in their hands, than have surrendered to such merciless enemies, therefore Nahash, not imagining it possible that, in so short a time, they should have relief, and being very secure of the advantages he thought he had against them, in a bravado, gave them seven days, that the reproach upon Israel, for not rescuing them, might be the greater, and the triumphs the more illustrious. But there was a providence in it, that his security might be his infatuation and ruin.

4. Notice is sent of this to Gibeah. They said they would send messengers to all the coasts of Israel, (v. 3.) which made Nahash the more secure, for that, he thought, would be a work of time, and none would be forward to appear, if they had not one common head; and, perhaps, Nahash had not yet heard of the new elected king; but the messengers, either of their own accord, or by order from their masters, went straight to Gibeah, and not finding Saul within, told their news to the people, who fell a weeping upon it, v. 4. They would sooner lament their brethren's misery and danger, than think of helping them, shed their tears for them, than shed their blood. They wept, as despising to help the men of Jabesh-gilead, and fearing lest, if that frontier city were accorded to, or by order from their masters, went straight to Gibeah, and not finding Saul within, told their news to the people, who fell a weeping upon it, that, with a proverb which can be reddressed, I may help them, and that, if not, I may weep with them. Good magistrates are in pain, if their subjects be in tears.

5. And, behold, Saul came after the herd out of the field; and Saul said, What aileth the people that they weep? And they told him the tidings of the men of Jabesh. 6. And the Spirit of God came upon Saul when he heard those tidings, and his anger was kindled greatly. 7. And he took a yoke of oxen, and hewed them in pieces, and sent them throughout all the coasts of Israel by the hands of messengers, saying, Whosoevercometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen. And the fear of the Lord fell on the people, and they came out with one consent. 8. And when he numbered them in Bezek, the children of Israel were three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand. 9. And they said unto the messengers that came, Thus shall ye say unto the men of Jabesh-gilead, To-morrow, by that time the sun be hot, ye shall have help. And the messengers came and showed it to the men of Jabesh; and they were glad. 10. Therefore the men of Jabesh said, To-morrow we will come out unto you, and ye shall do with us all that seemeth good unto you. 11. And it was so on the morrow, that Saul put the people in three companies; and they came into the midst of the host in the morning watch, and slew the Ammonites until the heat of the day: and it came to pass, that they which remained were scattered, so that two of them were not left together.

What is here related, turns very much to the honour of Saul, and shows the happy fruits of that other spirit with which he was endued. Observe here,

I. His humility. Though he was anointed king, and accepted by the people, yet he did not think it below him to know the state of his own flocks, but went himself to see them, and came in the evening, with his servants, after the herd out of the field, v. 5. This was an evidence that he was not puffed up with his advancement, as those are most apt to be, that are raised from a mean estate. Providence had not yet found him business as a king, he left all to Samuel; and therefore, rather than be idle, he would, for the present, apply himself to his country-business again; though the sons of Belial would, perhaps, despise him the more for it; such as were wicked and ungodly would themselves, would think never the worse of him. He had no revenues settled upon him for the support of his dignity, and he was desirous not to be bursomeshone to the people; for which reason, like Paul, he worked with his hands; for if he neglect his domestic affairs, how must he maintain himself and his family? Solomon gives it as a reason why he should look well to their herds, because the crown of the king was to every generation, Prov. 27. 23, 24. Saul's did not, he must therefore provide something surer.

II. His concern for his neighbours. When he perceived them in tears, he asked, "What aileth the people that they weep? Let me know, that, if it is a grievance which can be reddressed, I may help them, and that, if not, I may weep with them." Good magistrates are in pain, if their subjects be in tears.

III. His zeal for the safety and honour of Israel. When he heard of the insolence of the Ammonites, and the distress of a city, a mother in Israel, the Spirit of God came upon him, and put great thoughts into his mind, and his anger was kindled greatly, v. 6. He was angry at the insolence of the Ammonites, angry at the mean and sneaking spirit of the men of Jabesh-gilead, angry that they had not sent him notice sooner of the Ammonites' descent, and the extremity they were likely to be reduced to. He was angry to see his neighbours weeping, when it had been fitter for them to have prepared for war. It was a brave and generous fire that was now kindled in the breast of Saul, and such as became his high station.

V. The authority and power he exerted, upon this important occasion; he soon let Israel know, that, though he was retired to his privacy, he had a care for the public, and knew how to command men into the field, as well as how to drive cattle out of the field, v. 5, 7. He sent a summons to all the coasts of Israel, to show the extent of his power beyond his own tribe, even to all the tribes, and ordered all the military men forthwith to appear in arms at a general rendezvous in Bezek. Observe, 1. His modesty, in joining Samuel in commission with himself; he would not execute the office of a king, without a due regard to that of a prophet. 2. His mildness, in the penalty threaten ed against those that should disobey his orders. He hews a yoke of oxen in pieces, and sends the pieces to the several cities of Israel, threatening, with respect to him who should decline the public service, not, "Thus shall it be done to him," but, "Thus shall it be done to his men," God had organized a great judgment, (Deut. 28. 31.) Thine ox shall be slain before tine eyes, and shalt not eat thereof. It was necessary that the command should be enforced with some penalty, but this was not near so severe as that which was affixed to the like order by the whole congregation, Judg. 21. 5. Saul wished to show that his government was more gentle than that which they had been under. The effect of this summons was, that the men, or trained bands, of the nation came out as one man, and the reason given is, because the fear of the Lord fell upon them. Saul did not affect to make them fear him, but they were influenced to observe his orders by the fear of God, and a regard to him who had made Saul their king, and them members one of another. Note, Religion and the fear of God will make men good subjects, good soldiers, and good friends to the public interests of their country. They that fear God, will make conscience of their duty to all men, particularly to their rulers.

V. His conduct and prudent proceedings in this great affair, v. 8. He numbered those that came unto him, that he might know his own strength, and how to distribute his forces in the best manner their numbers would allow. It is the honour of princes to know the numbers of their men, but it is more a regard to the king of kings. There is not any number of his armies, Job 25. 3. In this muster, it seems, Judah, though numbered by itself, made no great figure, for as it was one tribe of twelve, so it was but an eleventh part of the whole number, thirty thousand three hundred and thirty; though the rendezvous was at Bezek, in that tribe, they wanted either the numbers, or the courage, or the zeal, that that tribe used to be famous for; so low was it, just before the sepulture was brought into it in David.

VI. His faith and confidence, and (grounded on that) his courage and resolution, in this enterprise. It should seem that those very messengers which brought the tidings from Jabesh-gilead, Saul sent into the country to raise the militia, who would be sure to be faithful and careful in their own business, and them he now sends back to their distressed countrymen, with this information, that it was probable, Samuel encouraged him, "To morrow, by such an hour, before the enemy can pretend that the seven days are expired, you shall have deliverance, (v. 9.) Be you ready to do your part, and we will not fail to do our's. Do you calmly upon the besiegemen, while we surround them." Saul knew he had a just cause, a clear call, and God on his side, and his faith should be as his strength. (v. 10.) To this success, this was good news to the besieged Gileadites, whose right eyes had wept themselves dry for their calamities, and now began to fail with looking for relief, and to ache in expectation of the doom of the ensuing day, when they must look their last; the greater the exigence, the more welcome the deliverance. When they heard it, they were glad, relying on the assurances that were sent them. And the gileadites numbered their men, (v. 11.) The enemies of the nation had numbered them, that next day they would be ready to meet them, which the enemies understood as an intimation that they despaired of relief, and so were made the more secure by it; if they took not care, by sending out scouts, to rectify their own mistake, they must thank themselves if they were surprised, the besieged were under no obligation to give them notice of the help they were assured of.

VII. His industry and close application to this business. If he had been bred up to war, firm in his youth, and had led regiments as often as he had followed droves, he could not have gone about an affair of this nature more dexterously, or more diligently. When the Spirit of the Lord comes upon men, it will make them expert, even without experience. (Job 33. 26.) Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof. It was necessary that the command should be enforced with some penalty, but this was not near so severe as that which was affixed to the like order by the whole congregation, Judg. 21. 5. Saul wished to show that his government was more gentle than that which they had been under. The effect of this summons was, that the men, or trained bands, of the nation came out as one man, and the reason given is, because the fear of the Lord fell upon them. Saul did not affect to make them fear him, but they were influenced to observe his orders by the fear of God, and a regard to him who had made Saul their king, and them members one of another. Note, Religion and the fear of God will make men good subjects, good soldiers, and good friends to the public interests of their country. They that fear God, will make conscience of their duty to all men, particularly to their rulers.

Lastly, To complete his honour, God crowned all these virtues with success. Jabesh-gilead was rescued, and the Ammonites totally routed; he had now the day before him to complete his victory in; and so complete a victory it was, that they which remained, after a great slaughter, were scattered so that two of them were not left together, to encourage or help one another, v. 11. We may suppose that Saul was the more vigorous in this matter, 1. Because there was some alliance between the tribe of Benjamin and the city of Jabesh-gilead. That city had declined joining with the rest of the Israelites to destroy Gibeah, which was then punished as their crime, but, perhaps, was now remembered as their kindness, when Saul of Gibeah came with so much readiness and resolution to relieve Jabesh-gilead. Yet that was not all; two thirds of the Benjamites that then remained, were provided with wives from that city, (Judges 21. 14.) so that most of the mothers of Benjamin were daughters of Jabesh-gilead, for which city Saul, passing a memorable day, was not a particular kindness; and we find they returned his kindness, ch. 31. 11. 12. 2. Because it was the Ammonites' invasion that induced the people to desire a king, (so Samuel says, ch. 12. 12.) so that if he had not done his part in this expedition, he had disappointed their expectations, and had for ever forfeited their respect.

12. And the people said unto Samuel, Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? bring the men, that we may put them to death. 13. And Saul said, There shall not a man be put to death this day: for to day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel. 14. Then said Samuel to the people, Come, and let us go to Gilgal, and re new the kingdom there. 15. And all the people went to Gilgal; and there they made Saul king before the Lord in Gilgal; and there they sacrificed sacrifices of peace offerings before the Lord; and there Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced greatly.

We have here the improvement of that glorious victory which Saul had obtained, nor the improvement of it abroad, (though we take it for granted that the men of Jabesh-gilead, having so narrowly saved their right eyes, would with them now discern the opportunity they had of avenging themselves upon these cruel enemies, and disabling them ever to straiten them in like manner again; now shall they be avenged on the Ammonites, for their right eyes condemned, as Samson on the Philistines, for his two eyes put out, Judg. 16. 28.) (but the account here given, is of the improvement of it at home.)

I. The people took this occasion to show their jealousy of the honour of Saul, and their resentment of the indignities done him. Samuel, it seems, was present, if not in the action, (it was too far forwards to march,) yet to warn them when the returned victorious; and to him as judge, the motion was made, (for they knew Saul would not be judge in his own cause,) that the sons of Belial that would not have him to reign over them, should be brought forth and slain, v. 12. Saul's good fortune (as foolish men commonly call it) went further with them to confirm his title, than either his choice by lot or Samuel's anointing of him. They had not courage thus to move for the persecution of those that opposed him, when he himself looked mean, but now that his victory made him look great, now nothing will serve but they must be put to death.

II. Saul took this occasion to give further proofs of his clemency, for, without waiting for Samuel's answer, he himself quashed the motion; (v. 13.) *There shall not a man be put to death this day, no, not those men, those bad men, that had abused him, and therein reflected on God himself: 1. Because it was a day of joy and triumph; To day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel; and since God has been so good to us all, let us not be harsh one to another. Now that God has made the heart of Israel in general so glad, let us not make sad the hearts of any particular Israelites. 2. Because he hoped they were by this day's work brought to a temper, were now convinced that this man, under God, could save them: now honoured him whom before they had despised; and, if they be but reclaimed, he is secured from receiving any disturbance by them, and therefore his point is gained; if an enemy be made a friend, that is more to our advantage than to have him slain. And all good princes consider that their power is for edification, not destruction.

III. Samuel took this occasion to call the people together before the Lord in Gilgal, v. 14, 15. 1. That they might publicly give God thanks for their late victory. There they rejoiced greatly, and, that God might have the praise of that which they had the comfort of, they sacrificed to him, as the Giver of all their successes, sacrifices of peace-offerings. 2. That they might confirm Saul in the government. It is only then that it had been yet done, that he might not retire again to the obscurity Samuel would have the kingdom renewed; he would renew his resignation, and the people should renew their approbation, and so, in concurrence with, or rather in attendance upon, the divine nomination, they made Saul king, making it their own act and deed to submit to him.

CHAP. XII.

We left the general assembly of the states together, in the close of the foregoing chapter; in this chapter, we have Saul all alone with himself, when he resigned the government into the hands of Saul. In which, I. He clears himself from all suspicion or imputation of mismanagement, while the administration was in his hands, v. 1. 6. II. He reminds them of the great things God had done for them, and for their fathers, v. 6. 13. III. He sets before them good and evil, the blessings and the curse, v. 14, 15. IV. He awakens them to regard what he said to them, by calling to God for thunder, v. 16. 19. V. He encourages them with hope that all would be well, v. 20. 25. This is his farewell sermon to that august assembly, and Saul's coronation sermon.

1. AND Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold, I have hearkened unto your voice in all that ye said unto me, and have made a king over you. 2. And now, behold, the king walketh before you: and I am old and gray-headed; and, behold, my sons are with you; and I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day. 3. Behold, here I am: witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed; whose ox have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith? and I will restore it you. 4. And they said, Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand. 5. And he said unto them, The Lord is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that ye have not found aught in my hand. And they answered, He is witness.

Here,

I. Samuel gives them a short account of the late revolution, and of the present posture of their government, by way of preface to what he had further to say to them, v. 1, 2. 1. For his own part, he had spent his days in their service; he began to times to be useful among them, and had continued long so. "I have walked before you, as a guide to direct you, as a shepherd that leads his flock, (Ps. 80. 1.) from my childhood unto this day." Even as he was illuminated with the light of prophecy in his early days, he began to be a burning and shining light to Israel:) "and now my best days are done; I am old and gray-headed," therefore they were the more unkind to cast him off; yet therefore he was the more willing to resign, finding the weight of government heavy upon his stooping shoulders. Old, and therefore the more able to advise them; and the more observant they should be of what he said, for days shall speak, and the multitude of years shall teach wisdom; and there is a particular reverence owing to the aged, especially aged magistrates, and aged ministers. "Old, and therefore not likely to live long; perhaps, may never have an opportunity of speaking to you again, and therefore take all that I have to say on that account." As for his sons: "Behold," (says he,) "they are with you; you may, if you please, call them to an account for anything they have done amiss. They are present with you, and have not, upon this revolution, run their country; they are upon a level with you, subjects to the new king as well as you; if you can prove them guilty of any wrong, you may prosecute them now by a due course of law, punish them, and oblige them to make restitution." 3. As for their new king, Samuel had gratified them in setting him over them; (v. 1.) "I have hearkened to your voice, all that ye said to me, being desirous to please you, if it were possible, and make you easy, though to the discarding of myself and family; and now, will you hearken to me, and take my advice?" The change was now perfected; 'Behold, the king walketh before you;' (v. 2.) he appears in public, ready to serve you in public business. Now that you have made yourselves like the nations in your civil government, and have cast off the divine administration in that, now take heed lest you make yourselves like the nations in religion, and cast off the worship of the living God.

II. He solemnly appeals to them concerning his own integrity in the administration of the government; (v. 3.) 'Witness against me, whose ox have I taken?' By this he intended, 1. To convince them of the injury they had done him, in setting him aside, when they had nothing amiss to charge him with; his government had no fault, but that it was too costly, too easy, too gentle. Also, the injury they did to themselves, in turning off one that did not so much as take an ox or an ass from them, to put themselves under the power of one that would take from them their fields and vineyards, nay, and their very sons and daughters; (ch. 8. 11.) so unlike would the manner of the king he is to his manners. 2. To preserve his own reputation: they that heard of Samuel's being rejected as he was, would be ready to suspect, that certainly he had done some thing not for his heart's liking, and to plead this as a ground of their being well treated; so that it was necessary for him to make this challenge, that it might appear upon record, that it was not for any iniquity in his hands that he was laid aside, but to gratify the humour of a giddy people, who owned they could not have a better man to rule them, only they desired a bigger man. There is a just debt which every man owes to his own good name, especially men in public stations, which is, to guard against unjust suspicions and suspicions, that we may finish our course with honour, as well as joy.

As he designed hereby to leave a good name behind him, so he designed to leave his successor a good example before him; let him write after his copy, and he will write fair. 4. Samuel designed, in the close of his discourse, to reprove the people, and therefore he begins with a vindication of himself; for he that will, with confidence, tell another of his sin, must see to it, that he himself be clear. Now observe, (1.) What it is that Samuel here acquires himself from. [1.] He had never, under any pretense whatsoever, taken that which was not his own, ox nor ass; had never distracted their cattle for tribute, fines, or forfeitures, nor used their service without paying for it. [2.] He had never defrauded those with whom he dealt, nor oppressed those that were under his power. [3.] He had never taken bribes to pervert justice, nor was ever biased by favour or affection, to give judgment in a cause against his conscience. (2.) How he appeals to those that had slighted him concerning it; 'Here I am; witness against me, if you have any thing to lay to my charge; do it now before the Lord, and the king, the proper judges.' He puts honour upon Saul, by owning himself accountable to him, if he had done any thing wrong. [4.] Upon this appeal, he is honourably acquitted; he did not expect that they should do him honour at parting, though he well deserved it, and therefore mentioned not any of the good services he had done for them, for which they ought to have applauded him, and returned him the thanks of the house; all he desired was, that they should do him justice, and that they did, (v. 4.) readily owning, 1. That he had not committed any thing against his government, nor used his power to their wrong. 2. That he had not made it expensive to them; 'Neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand, for the support of thy dignity.' Like Nehemiah, he did not require the bread of the governor; (Neh. 5. 18.) had not only been righteous, but generous; had coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel, Acts 20. 33. 3. This honourable testimony borne to Samuel's integrity, is left upon record to his honour; (v. 5.) 'The Lord is Witness, who searcheth the heart, and his anointed is witness, who trieth overt acts; said the people agree to it, He is witness.' Note, The testimony of our neighbours, and especially the testimony of our own consciences for us, that we did in our places lived honestly, will be our comfort, under the slights and contempt that are put upon us. Demetrius is a happy man, that has a good report of all men, and of the truth itself; 3 John 12.

6. And Samuel said unto the people, 'It is the Lord that advanced Moses and Aaron, and that brought your fathers out of the land of Egypt.' 7. Now therefore stand still, that I may reason with you before the Lord of all the righteous acts of the Lord, which he did to you and to your fathers. 8. When Jacob was come into Egypt, and your fathers cried unto the Lord, then the Lord sent Moses and Aaron, which brought forth your fathers out of Egypt, and made them dwell in this place. 9. And when they forgot the Lord their God, he sold them into the hand of Sisera, captain of the host of Hazor, and into the hand of the Philistines, and into the hand of the king of Moab; and they fought against them. 10. And they cried unto the Lord, and said, 'We have sinned, because we have forsaken the Lord, and have served Baalim and Ashtaroth: but now deliver us out of the hand of your enemies, and we will serve thee.' 11. And the Lord sent Jerubbaal, and Bedan, and Jephthah, and Samuel, and delivered you out of the hand of your enemies on every side, and ye dwelled safe. 12. And when ye saw that Nahash, the king of the children of Ammon, came against you, ye said unto me, Nay; but a king shall reign over us; when the Lord your God was your king. 13. Now therefore behold the king whom ye have chosen, and whom ye have desired! and, behold, the Lord hath set a king over you. 14. If ye will fear the Lord, and serve him, and obey his voice, and not rebel against the commandment of the Lord, then shall both ye and also the king that reigneth over you, continue following the Lord your God: 15. But if ye will not obey the voice of the Lord, but rebel against the commandment of the Lord, then shall the hand of the Lord be against you, as it was against your fathers.

Samuel, having sufficiently secured his own reputation, instead of upbraiding the people upon it with their unkindness to him, sets himself to instruct them, and keep them in the way of their duty, and then the change of the government would be the less damage to them. 1. He reminds them of the great goodness of God to them, and to their fathers; gives them an abstraction of the history of their nation, that, by the consider ation of the great things God had done for them, they might be for ever engaged to love him and serve him. 4. “Come,” says he, v. 7. “Stand still, in token of reverence, when God is speaking to you; stand still in token of attention and compen-ess of mind, and give me leave to reason with you.” Religion has reason on its side, Isa. 1. 18. The way of love is the way of reason. It is to reason with people; not only to exhort and direct, but to persuade; to convince men’s judgments, and so to gain their wills and affections. Let reason rule men, and they will be good. He reasons of the righteous acts of the Lord; that is, “both the benefits he has bestowed upon you, in performance of his promises, and the punishments he has inflicted on you for your sins.” His favours are called his righteous acts, (Judg. 5. 11.) because he gives them just to his own honour. He not only puts them in mind of what God had done for them in their days, but of what he had done of old, in the days of their fathers, because the present age had the benefit of God’s former favours. We may suppose that his discourse was much larger than as here related.

1. He reminds them of their deliverance out of Egypt; into that house of bondage Jacob and his father and his brethren. When they were oppressed, they cried unto God, with Moses and Aaron, from mean beginnings, to be their deliverers, and the founders of their state and settlement in Canaan, v. 6, 8.

2. He reminds them of the miseries and calamities which their fathers brought themselves into, by forgetting God, and serving other gods; (v. 9.) they enslaved themselves, for they were sold as criminals and captives into the hands of oppressors; they exposed themselves to the desolation of war, their neighbours fought against them.

3. He reminds them of their fathers’ repentance and humiliation before God for their idolatries. They said, We have sinned, v. 10. Let not them imitate the sins of their fathers, for, what they had done amiss they had many a time wished undone again; in the day of their distress they had sought unto God, and had promised to serve him, let their children therefore reckon that God at all times, which they found good in bad times.

4. He reminds them of the glorious deliverances God had wrought for them, the victories he had blessed them with, and their happy settlements, many a time, after days of trouble and distress, v. 11. He specifies some of their judges. Gideon and Jephthah; great conquerors in their time; among the rest he mentions Judges, whom we read not of any where else: he might be some eminent person, that was instrumental of salvation to them, though not recorded in the book of Judges; such a one as Shamar, of whom it is said, that he delivered Israel, but not that he judged them, Judg. 3. 31. Perhaps, this Bedan guarded and delivered them on one side, at the same time when some other of the judges appeared and acted for them on the other side. Some think it was the same with Jair, so the learned Mr. Poole; others, the same as with Samson, whom was Ben Dan, a son of Dan, of that tribe, and the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, Be Dan, in Dan, in the camp of Dan. Samuel mentions himself, not to his own praise, but to the honour of God, who had made him an instrument of subduing the Philistines.

But last, he puts them in mind of God’s late fav-our to the present generation, in gratifying them with a king, when they would prescribe to God, such a one, to save them out of the hand of Nahash king of Ammon, v. 12, 13. Now it appears that that was the immediate occasion of their desiring a king: Nahash threatened them: they moved Samuel to nominate a general: he told them God was Commander-in-chief in all their wars, and they needed no other; what was wanting in them, should be made up by his power; The Lord is your King; but they insisted on it, Nay, but a king shall reign over us. “And now,” said he, “you have a king; a king of your own asking, let that be spoken to your shame; but a king of God’s making, let that be spoken to his honour, and the glory of his grace.” God did not set them off then, when they, in ef- fect, cast him off.

II. He shows them that they were now upon their good behaviour, they and their king; let them not think that they had now cut themselves off from all dependence upon God, and that now, having a king of their own, the making of their own fortunes (as men foolishly call it) was in their own hands; no, still their judgment must proceed from the Lord. He tells them plainly,

1. That their obedience to God would certainly be their happiness; (v. 14.) if they would not revolt from God to idols, nor rebel against him, by break- ing his commandments, but would persevere in their allegiance to him, would fear his wrath, serve his interests, and obey his will, then they and their king should certainly be happy: but observe how the promise is expressed, Then ye shall continue, following the Lord; that is, (i.) “Ye shall continue in the way of your duty, which will be your honour and comfort.” Note, To those that are sincere in their religion, God will give grace to persevere in it, those that follow God faithfully, God will enable to continue following him. And observe, Following God is a work that is its own wages. It is the matter of a promise as well as of a precept. (2.) “Ye shall continue under the divine guidance and protection. Ye shall be after the Lord, so it is in the original; that is, “He will go before you to lead and prosper you, and make your way plain; The Lord is with you, while you are with him.”

2. That their disobedience would as certainly be their ruin; (v. 15.) “If ye rebel, think not that your having a king will secure you against God’s judgments, and that now having in this instance made yourselves more mighty than God, you may sell as cheap a rate as they can. No, the hand of the Lord will be against you, as it was against your fathers when they offended him, in the days of the Judges.” We mistake if we think that we can evade God’s justice by shaking off his dominion. If God shall not rule us, yet he will judge us.

16. Now therefore stand and see this great thing, which the Lord will do before your eyes. 17. Is it not wheat-harvest to- day? I will call unto the Lord, and he shall send thunder and rain; that ye may perceive and see that your wickedness is great, which ye have done in the sight of the Lord, in asking you a king. 18. So Samuel called unto the Lord; and the Lord sent thunder and rain that day: and all the people greatly feared the Lord and Samuel. 19. And all the people said unto Samuel, Pray for thy servants unto the Lord thy God, that we die not: for we have added unto all our sins this evil, to ask us a king. 20. And Samuel said unto the people, Fear not: ye have done all this wickedness; yet turn not aside from following the Lord, but serve him with all your heart; 21. And turn ye not aside: for then should ye go after vain things, which cannot profit nor deliver; for they are vain:"
22. For the Lord will not forsake his people for his great name's sake; because it hath pleased the Lord to make you his people.
23. Moreover, as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you: but I will teach you the good and the right way: 24. Only fear the Lord, and serve him in truth with all your heart; for consider how great things he hath done, for you. 25. But if ye shall still do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both ye and your king.

Two things Samuel here aims at:
I. To convince the people of their sin in desiring a king. They were now rejoicing before God, in and with their king, (ch. 11. 15,) and offering to God the sacrifices of praise, which they hoped God would accept of; and this perhaps made them think that there was no harm in their asking a king, but really they had done well in it; therefore Samuel here, in a second person,isNaN(1) and expressed to the Lord his displeasure against them, in the sight of the Lord. Note, Though we meet with prosperity and success in a way of sin, yet we must not therefore think the more favourably of it. They have a king, and if they conduct themselves well, their king may be a very great blessing to them, and yet Samuel shall have them perceive and see that their wickedness is great in asking a king. We must never think well of any thing that God disapproves by his word, though in his providence he seems to smile upon it.

Observe, 1. The expressions of God's displeasure against them for asking a king. At Samuel's word, God sent prodigious thunder and rain upon them, at a season of the year when, in that country, the like was never seen or known before, v. 16. 18. Thunder and rain have natural causes, and sometimes terrible effects. But Samuel made it appear that this was designed by the almighty power of God, on purpose to convince them that they had done very wickedly in asking a king, not only by its coming in an unusual time, in wheat harvest, and this on a fair clear day, when there appeared not to the eye any signs of a storm, but by his giving notice of it before. Had there happened to be thunder and rain at the time when he was speaking to them, he might have improved it for their awakening and conviction, as we may in a like case; but to make it no less than a miracle, before it came, (1.) He spoke to them of it; (v. 16, 17.) Stand and see this great thing. He had bidden them stand and hear, (v. 7.) but because he did not see that his reasoning with them affected them, (so stupid were they and unthinking,) now he bids them stand and see. If what he said in a still small voice did not reach their hearts, nor do any thing which he should attempt to make it reach, it shall be God speaking to them in dreadful claps of thunder, and the great right of his strength. He appealed to this as a sign, "I will call upon the Lord, he shall send thunder; shall send it just now, to confirm the word of his servant, and to make you see that I said true, when I told you that God was angry with you for asking a king." And the event proved him a true prophet of the sign, and wonder came to pass. (2.) He spake to God for it. Samuel called unto the Lord, and, in answer to his prayer, even while he was yet speaking, the Lord sent thunder and rain. By this Samuel made it appear, not only what a powerful influence God has upon this earth, that he could, of a sudden, when natural causes did not work towards it, produce this dreadful rain and thunder, and bring them out of his treasures, (Ps. 135. 7,) but also what a powerful interest he had in heaven, that God would thus hearken to the voice of a man, (Josh. 10. 14,) and answer him in the secret place of thunder, Ps. 81. 7. Samuel, that son of prayer, was still famous for success in prayer.

Now by this extraordinary thunder and rain sent on this occasion, [1.] God testified his displeasure against them in the same way in which he had formerly testified it, and at the prayer of Samuel too, against the Philistines; (ch. 7. 10.) The Lord discomfited them with a great thunder. Now that Israel rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit, he turned to be their Enemy, and fought against them with the same weapons which, not long before, had been employed against their adversaries, Isa. 63. 10. [2.] He showed them their folly in desiring a king, which would greatly deprive them of their own strength, inasmuch as they were more taken away from the arm of God, or from the power of prayer. Could their king thunder with a voice like God? Job 40. 9. Could their prince command such forces as the prophet could by his prayers? [3.] He intimated to them, that how sincere and prosperous soever their condition seemed to be now that they had a king, like the weather in wheat-harvest, yet if God should wish, he could soon change the face of the heavens, and persecute them with his tempest, as the psalmist speaks.

2. The impressions which this made upon the people. It startled them very much, as well it might. (1.) They greatly feared the Lord and Samuel. Though when they had a king, they were ready to think they must fear him only, God made them know that he is greatly to be feared, and his prophets far more so. Not only did they fear in their king, God taught them to rejoice with trembling. (2.) They own their sin and folly in desiring a king; (v. 19.) We have added to all our sins this evil. Some people will not be brought to a sight of their sins by any gentler methods than storms and thunders. Samuel did not extort this confession from them till the matter was settled and the king confirmed, lest it should look as if he designed by it rather to establish himself in the government, than to bring them to repentance. Now that they were flattering themselves in their own eyes, their iniquity was found to be hateful, Ps. 36. 2. (3.) They earnestly begged Samuel's prayers; (v. 19.) Pray for thy servants, that we die not. They were apprehensive of their danger from the wrath of God, and could not expect that he should hear their prayers for themselves, and therefore they entreated Samuel to pray for them. Now they see their need of him whom a while ago they slighted. Thus many that will not have Christ to reign over them, would yet be glad to have him to intercede for them, to turn away the wrath of God. And the time may come, when those that have despised and ridiculed praying people, will value their prayers, and desire a share in them. "Pray" (said they) "to the Lord thy God; we know not how to call him ours, but thou hast any interest in him, improve it for us."
storm. Fear not; though God will frown upon his people, yet he will not forsake them, (v. 22.) for his great name’s sake; do not you forsake him then.” Every transgression in the covenant, though it displease the Lord, yet does not throw us out of covenant, and therefore God’s just rebukes must not drive us from our hopes and mercies. The fixedness of God’s choice is owing to the freeness of it; we may therefore hope he will not forsake his people, because it has pleased him to make them his people. Had he chosen them for their good merits, we might fear he would cast them off for their bad merits: but, choosing them for his name’s sake, for his name’s sake he will not leave them.

2. He is阵 against idolatry; “Turn not aside from God and the covenant which your fathers made,” v. 20. and again, v. 21. “for if ye turn aside from God, whatever ye turn aside to, you will find it is a vain thing, that can never answer your expectations, but will certainly deceive you if you trust to it; it is a broken reed, a broken cistern.” Idols are so, they are vanity and a lie: whatever we make a god of, we shall find it so. Creatures in their own place are good things, but when put in God’s place, they are vain things. Idols could not profit those that sought to them in their wants, nor deliver those that sought to them in their straits, for they were vain, and not what they pretended to be. An idol is nothing in the world, 1 Cor. 8. 4.

3. He comforts them with an assurance that he would continue his care and concern for them, v. 23. They desired him to pray for them; (v. 19.) he might have said, “Go to Saul and put him to pray for you, the king that you have put in my room;” but so far is he from upbarring them with their disrespect to him, that he promises them much more than they asked. (1.) They asked it of him as a favour; he promised it as a duty, and startles at the thought of neglecting it. Pray for you! says he, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in not doing it. Note, It is a sin against God, not to pray for the Israel of God, especially for those of them that are under our charge: and good men are afraid of the guilt of omissions. (2.) They asked him to pray for them at this time, and upon this occasion, but he promises to continue his prayers for them, and not to cease as long as he lived. Our rule is, to pray without ceasing; we sin if we restrain prayer in general, and in particular if we cease praying for the church. (3.) They asked him only to pray for them; but he promises to do more for them, not only to pray for them, but to teach them; though they were not willing to be under his government as a judge, he would not therefore deny them his instructions as a prophet. And they may be sure he would teach them no other than the good and the right way: the right way is certainly the good way; the way of duty, the way of pleasure and profit.

4. He concludes with an earnest exhortation to practical religion and serious godliness, v. 24, 25. The great duty here pressed upon us, is, to fear the Lord. He had said, (v. 20.) “Fear not with a slavish fear,” but here, “Fear the Lord with a filial fear. As the fruit and evidence of this, serve him in the duties of religious worship, and of a godly conversation; in truth and sincerity, and not in show and profession only, but with your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind.” And two things he urges by way of motive: (1.) That they were bound in gratitude to serve God, considering what great things he had done for them, to engage them for ever to his service. (2.) That they were bound in interest to serve him, considering what great things he would do against them, if they should still do wickedly; “Ye shall be destroyed by the judgments of God, both ye and your king that you are so proud of, and expect so much from; and that will be a blessing to you if you keep in with God.” Thus, as a faithful watchman, he gave them warning, and so delivered his own soul.

CHAP. XIII.

They that desired a king like all the nations, fancied that, when they had one, they should look very great and considerable; but in this chapter we find it proved otherwise. While Samuel was joined in composition with Saul, things went well; (ch. 11. 7.) but now that Saul began to reign alone, all went to decay, and Samuel’s words began to be fulfilled. Ye shall be consumed, both you and your king; for never was the state of Israel further gone in a consumption than in this chapter. 1. Saul appears here a very silly prince. 1. Infatuated in his councils, v. 1-3. 2. Invaded by his neighbours, v. 4-5. 3. Deserted by his soldiers, v. 6-7. 4. Disordered in his own spirit, and sacrificing in confusion, v. 8-10. 5. Chidden by Samuel, v. 11-13. 6. Rejected of God from being a king, v. 14. 7. The people appear here a very miserable people; 1. Diseartened and dispersed, v. 6, 7. 2. Diminished, v. 15, 16. 3. Plundered, v. 17, 18. 4. Disarmed, v. 19, 23. This they got by casting off God’s government, and making themselves like the nations; all their glory departed from them.

1. SAUL reigned one year; and when he had reigned two years over Israel, 2. Saul chose him three thousand men of Israel; whereas two thousand were with Saul in Michmash and in mount Beth-el, and a thousand were with Jonathan in Gibeah of Benjamin: and the rest of the people he sent every man to his tent. 3. And Jonathan smote the garrison of the Philistines that was in Geba; and the Philistines heard of it. And Saul blew the trumpet throughout all the land, saying, Let the Hebrews hear. 4. And all Israel heard say, that Saul had smitten a garrison of the Philistines, and that Israel also was had in abomination with the Philistines. And the people were called together after Saul to Gilgal. 5. And the Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel, thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and people as the sand which is on the sea-shore in multitude: and they came up and pitched in Michmash, eastward from Beth-aven. 6. When the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait, (for the people were distressed,) then the people did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits. 7. And some of the Hebrews went over Jordan to the land of Gad and Gilead. As for Saul, he was yet in Gilgal; and all the people followed him trembling.

We are not told wherein it was that the people of Israel offended God, so as to forfeit his presence, and turn his hand against them, as Samuel had threatened; (ch. 12. 15.) but doubtless they left God, else he had not left them, as here it appears he did; for,

1. Saul was very weak and impolitic, and did not order his affairs with discretion. Saul was the son of one year, so the first words are in the original a phrase which we make to signify the date of his
I.

And Ii:12. wish and now was him, reach, kept the had nience. ed many; honorary people of considerable; make rant tive like birth:

2. chose him a band of three thousand men, of which he himself commanded two thousand, and his son Jonathan one thousand; (v. 2.) the rest of the people he dismissed to their tents. If he intended these only for the guard of his person, and his honor ary attendants, it was impolitic to have so many; for a standing army, in apprehension of danger from the Philistines, it was no less impolitic to have so few; and, perhaps, the confidence he put in this select number, and his disbarring the rest of that brave army with which he lately beat the Ammonites, (ch. 11. 8, 11.) was looked upon as an affront to the Philistines, and gave them reason to think, he had too little reason he had so few at his call when he had occasion for them. The prince that relies on a particular party, weakens his own interest in the whole community.

2. He ordered his son Jonathan to surprise and destroy the garrison of the Philistines that lay near him in Geba, v. 3. I wish there were no ground for supposing it to have been a violation or infrac tion of some articles with the Philistines, and that we are done treacherously and perfidiously; the reason why I suspect it, is, because it is said, for doing it, Israel was had in abomination, or, as the word is, did stink with the Philistines, (v. 4.) as men void of common honesty, and whose word could not be relied on. If it was so, we will lay the blame, not on Jonathan who did it, but on Saul, his prince and father, who ordered him to do it, and, perhaps, kept him in ignorance of the truth of the matter. Nothing makes the name of Israel so odious to them that are without, so much as the fraud and dishonesty of those that are called by that worthy name. If professors of religion cheat and over reach, break their word, and betray their trust, religion suffers by it, and is had in abomination with the Philistines. Whom may one trust, if not an Israelite? one that, it is expected, should be without

3. When he had thus exasperated the Philistines, then he began to raise forces, which, if he had act ed wisely, he would have done before. When the Philistines had a vast army ready to pour in upon him, to avenge the wrong he had done them, then was he blowing the trumpet through the land, among a careless, if not a disaffected people, say ing, Lay he heart as much as might fit came to Saul to Gilgal, v. 4. But now the generality, we may suppose, drew back, either in dislike of Saul's politics, or in dread of the Philistines' power, who, if he had summoned them sooner, would have been as ready at his beck as they were when he marched against the Ammonites. We often find that after-wit would have done much better before, and have prevented much incon venience

II. Never did the Philistines appear in such a formidable body as they did now, upon this provocation which Saul gave them; we may suppose they had great assistance from their allies, for, (v. 5.) beside six thousand horse, which, in those times, when horses were not so much used in war as they now are, was a great body, they had an incredible number of chariots, thirty thousand in all. Most of them, we may suppose, were carriages for the bag and baggage of so vast an army, not chariots of war. But their foot was innumerable as the sand of the sea-shore; so jealous were they for the honour of their nation, and so much enraged at the baseness of the Israelites in destroying their garrison. If Saul had had his son Jonathan with him, he would have given the Philistines this provocation, he and his prince might the better have borne this threatening trouble which they had now brought on themselves by their own folly.

III. Never were the people of Israel so faint hearted, so sneaking, so very cowardly, as they were now. Some considerable numbers, it may be come to Saul to Gilgal, but, hearing of the Philistines' numbers and preparations, their spirits sank within them; some think, because they did not find Samuel there with Saul. They that, a while age, were weary of him, and wished for a king, now had small joy of their king, unless they could see him under Samuel's direction. Sooner or later, men will be made to see that God and his prophets are their best friends. Now that they saw the Philistines making war upon them, and Samuel not coming to help them, they know not what to do; men's hearts failed them for fear. And, 1. Some abscended. Rather than run upon death among the Philistines, they buried themselves alive in caves and thickets, v. 6. See what work sin makes; it exposes men to perils, and then robs them of their courage, and dissipates them. A single person, by faith, can say, I will not be afraid of ten thousand; (Ps. s. 6.) but here, thousands of degenerate Israel- cians trembled at the approach of a great crowd of Philistines. Guilt makes men cowards. 2. Others fled, v. 7. They went over Jordan to the land of Gilead, as far as they could from the danger, and to a place where they had lately been victorious over the Ammonites: where they had triumphed, they had hoped to be sheltered. 3. These that stayed with Saul, followed him trembling, expecting no other than to be cut off, and having their hands and hearts very much weakened by the desertion of so many of their troops. And, perhaps, Saul himself, though he had so much honour as to stand his ground, yet had no courage to spare, wherewith to inspire his trembling soldiers.

8. And he tarried seven days, according to the set time that Samuel had appointed: but Samuel came not to Gilgal; and the people were scattered from him. 9. And Saul said, Bring hither a burnt-offering to me, and peace-offerings. And he offered the burnt-offering. 10. And it came to pass, that, as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, behold, Samuel came; and Saul went out to meet him, that he might salute him. 11. And Saul said, What hast thou done? And Saul said, Because I saw that the people were scattered from me, and that thou camest not within the days appointed, and that the Philistines gathered themselves together at Michmash; 12. Therefore, said I, the Philistines will come down now upon me to Gilgal, and I have not made supplication unto the Lord: I forced myself therefore, and offered a burnt-offering. 13 And Samuel said to Saul, Thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God, which he commanded thee; for now would the Lord have established by kingdom upon Israel for ever. 14. But now thy kingdom shall not continue: the Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the Lord hath commanded him to be captain over his people, because thou hast not kept that which the Lord commanded thee.

Here is,

I. Saul's offence in offering sacrifice before Samuel came. Samuel, when he anointed him, had ordered him to tarry for him seven days in Gilgal, promising that, at the end of those days, he would be sure to come to him, and both offer sacrifices for him, and direct him what he should do. This we had, ch. 10. 8. Perhaps that order, though insertned there, was given him afterward; or was given him as a general rule to be observed in every public congress at Gilgal; or, as is most probable, though not mentioned again, was lately repeated with reference to this particular occasion; for, it is plain that Samuel himself understood it as obliging him from God now to stay till Samuel came, else he would not have made so many excuses as he did, for not staying, v. 11. This order Saul broke; he stayed till the seventh day; yet had not part of his commandment been executed before Samuel died. Perhaps, he began to reproach Samuel as false to his word, careless of his country, and disrespectful to his prince; and thought it more fit that Samuel should wait for him, than he for Samuel. However, 1. He presumed to offer sacrifice without Samuel, and nothing appears to the contrary but that he did it himself, though he was neither priest nor prophet, as if, because he was a king, he might do as he pleased, without any authority or purpose of his own, which King Uzziah paid dear for, 2 Chron. 26. 16, &c. 2. He determined to engage the Philistines without Samuel's directions, though he had promised to show him what he should do. So self-sufficient Saul was, that he thought it not worth while to stay for a prophet of the Lord, either to pray for him, or advise him.

This was Saul's offence, and that which aggraved it, was, (1.) That, for aught that appears, he did not send any messenger to Samuel, to know his mind, to represent the case to him, and to receive fresh directions from him, though he had enough about him that were swift enough of foot at this time. (2.) That when Samuel came, he rather seemed to boast of what he had done, than to repent of it; for he went forth to salute him, as his brother sacrificer, and seemed pleased with the opposition he made to Samuel. God's hand was against him, for Samuel could come according to his word, before the seven days were expired. Thus the offerers of the latter days think the promise of Christ's coming is broken, because he does not come in their time, though it is certain he will come at the set time. (4.) That when he was charged with disobedience, he justified himself in what he had done, and gave no sign at all of repentance for it. It is not sinning that ruins men, but sinning and not repenting; falling and not getting up again. See what excuses he made, v. 11, 12. He would have this act of disobedience pass, [1.] For an instance of his prudence; the people were most of them scattered from him, and he had no other way than this, to keep those with him that remained, and to avoid any thing hurtful to himself. If Samuel neglected the public concerns, he would not. [2.] For an instance of his piety; he would be thought very devout, and in great care not to engage the Philistines till he had by prayer and sacrifice engaged God on his side. "The Philistines," said he, "will come down upon me, before I have made my supplication to the Lord, and then I am undone. What is to be done before I have said my prayers!" Thus he covered his disobedience to God's command, with a pretence of concern for God's favour. Hypocrites lay a great stress upon the external performances of religion, thinking thereby to excuse their neglect of the weightier matters of the law. And yet, lastly, He owns it went against his conscience to do it; I forced myself, and offered a burnt-offering; perhaps boasting that he had broken through his convictions, and got the better of them; or, at least, thinking this exculpated his fault, that he knew he should not have done as he did, but did it with reluctance. Foolish man! to think that God would be well pleased with sacrifices offered in direct opposition both to his general and particular command.

II. The sentence passed upon Saul for this offence: Samuel found him standing by his burnt-offering and his meat offering. He was sent to him with heavy tidings, and let him know that the sacrifice of the wicked is abomination to the Lord, much more when he brings it, as Saul did, with a wicked mind. 1. He shows him the aggravations of his crime; and says to this king, Thou art wicked; which it is not for any but a prophet of the Lord to say, Job 34. 18. He charges him with being an enemy to himself and his interest. Thou hast broken the covenant of the Lord, and wilt not serve him any more, or make the sacrifice of the Lord his will have thy own will and way." The sentence is, in effect, the same with Mene tekel. Only now there seems room left for Saul's repentance, upon which this sentence should have been reversed; but, upon the next act of disobedience, it was made irreversible, ch. 15. 29. And now, better a thousand times he had continued in obscurity tending his asses, than to be enthroned and so soon deterioared.

But was not this, hard, to pass so severe a sentence upon him and his house for a single error, and that seemed so small, and in excuse for which he had so much to say? No, The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and does no man any wrong; will be justifed when he speaks, and clear when he judges. By this, (1.) He shows that there is no sin little, because no little God to sin against; but that every sin, is a forrenor, on the heavenly kingdom, for which he stood fast. (2.) He shows, that disobedience to an express command, though in a small matter, is a great provocation; as in the case of our first parents. (3.) He warns us to take heed of our spirits; for that which to men may seem but a small offence, yet to him that knows from what principle, and with what disposition of mind it is done, may appear a heinous crime. (4.) God, in rejecting Saul for an error seemingly little, sets off, as by a Its, the lustre of his mercy, in forgiving such great sins as those of David, Manasseh, and others. (5.) We are taught hereby, how necessary it is that we wait on our God continually. Saul lost his kingdom for want of two or three hours' patience.

15. And Samuel arose, and gat him up from Gilgal unto Gibeah of Benjamin. And Saul numbered the people that were present with him, about six hundred men. 16. And Saul, and Jonathan his son, and the people that were present with him, abode in Gibeah of Benjamin: but the Philistines encamped in Michmash. 17. And the spoilers came out of the camp of the Philistines in three companies: one company turned unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual: 18. And another company turned the way to Bethhoron; and another company turned to the way of the border that looketh to the valley of Zeboim, toward the wilderness. 19. Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel; (for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears;) 20. But all the Israelites went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his axe, and his mattock. 21. Yet they had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulter's, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads. 22. So it came to pass, in the day of battle, that there was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people that were with Saul and Jonathan: but with Saul, and with Jonathan his son, was there found. 23. And the garrison of the Philistines went out to the passage of Michmash.

Here is, 1. Samuel gone in displeasure. Saul has set up for himself, and now he is left to himself; Samuel gat him from Gilgal, (v. 15.) and it does not appear that he either prayed with him, or directed him. Yet, in going up to Gibeah of Benjamin, which was Saul's city, he intimated that he had not quite abandoned him, but waited there to do him a kindness another time. Or, he went to the college of the prophets, there to pray for Saul, when he did not think fit to pray with him. 2. Saul goes after him to Gibeah, and there musters his army, and finds his whole number to be but six hundred men, v. 13, 16. Thus were they for their sin diminished and brought low. The Philistines ravaged the country, and put all the adjacent parts under contribution. The body of their army, or standing camp, as it is called in the margin, (v. 23.) lay in an advantageous pass at Michmash, but thence they sent out three several parties or detachments that took several ways, to plunder the country, and bring in provisions for the army, v. 17, 18. By these the land of Israel was both terrified and impoverished, and the Philistines animated and enriched. This was the sin of Israel brought upon them. Isa. 42. 24. 4. The Israelites that took the field with Saul were unarmed, had only slings and clubs, but not a sword or spear among them all, except what Saul and Jonathan themselves had, v. 19-22. See here, (1.) How politic the Philistines were, when they had power in their hands, and did what they pleased in Israel; they put down all the smith's shops, transplanted the smiths into their own country, and forbade any Israelite, under severe penalties, to exercise the trade or mystery of working in brass or iron, though they had rich mines of both, and in such plenty, that with them he was to be supplied. 20. Asher, His shoes shall be iron and brass, Deut. 33. 25. This was subtly done of the Philistines, for hereby they not only prevented the people of Israel from making themselves weapons of war by which they would both be disused to military exercises and unburthened when there was occasion, but obliged them to a dependence upon them, even for the instruments of husbandry; they must go to them, if they could, to come on other of their grievances, which were dispersed in the country, to have their iron work done, and no more might an Israelite do than use a file; (v. 20, 21.) and no doubt the Philistines' smiths brought the Israelites long files for work done. (2.) How impolitic Saul was, that did not, in the beginning of his reign, set himself to redress this grievance. Samuel's not doing it, was very excusable, he fought with other artillery; but Saul, that pretended to be a king, like the kings of the nations, to leave his soldiers without swords and spears, and take no care to provide them, especially when he might have done it out of the spoils of the Ammonites whom he conquered in the beginning of his reign, was such a piece of negligence, as could by no means be excused. (3.) How slothful and mean-spirited the Israelites were, that suffered the Philistines thus to impose upon them, and had no thought or spirit to help themselves. It was reckoned very bad with them, when there was not a shield or spear found among forty thousand in Israel; (Judg. 5. 8.) and it was no better now, when there was never an Israelite with a sword by his side, but the king and his son; never a soldier, never a gentleman: surely they were reduced to this, or began to be so, in Samuel's time, for we never find him with a sword or spear in his hand. If they had not been dispirited, they could not have been disarmed, but it was sin that made them naked to their shame.

CHAP. XIV.

We left the host of Israel in a very ill posture, in the close of the foregoing chapter; we saw in them neither wisdom, nor strength, nor goodness, to give us ground to expect that they had a general access to the army of the Philistines; yet here we find that infinitesimal power which works without means, and that infinite goodness which gives without merit, glorified in a happy turn of events. Wherever we see the Lord's workmen, there is power: the man of war, that was an example of the Israelites, and a type of Christ, had a mind that was full of courage and goodness. The Lord will not forsake his people for his great name's sake, ch. 12. 22. In this chapter, we have, I. The host of the Philistines trampled upon, and triumphed over, by the faith and courage of a man, who was known to his father, (v. 1. . .) with his armour-bearer only, made a brave attack upon them, encouraging himself in the Lord his God, v. 4. . . He challenged them, (v. 8. . .) and, upon their acceptance of the challenge, charged them with such fury, or rather such faith, that he put them to flight, and set them one against another, (v. 13. . .) which gave opportunity to Saul and his forces, with much victory, to blow, and gain a victory, v. 16. . . II. The host of Israel troubled and perplexed by the rashness and folly of Saul, who adjured the people to eat no food till night, which, I. Brought Jonathan into a panic, v. 5. . . 20. II. Was a temptation, when the time of their fast was expired, to eat with the blood, v. 31. . . 35. 3. Jonathan's error, through ignorance, had like to have been his death, but the people rescued him, v. 36. . . III. In the close, we have a general account of Saul's exploits, (v. 47, 48.) and of his family, v. 49. . .
NOW it came to pass upon a day, that Jonathan the son of Saul said unto the young man that bare his armour, Come, and let us go over to the Philistines' garrison that is on the other side. But he told not his father. 2. And Saul tarried in the uttermost part of Gibeah, under a pomegranate-tree, which is in Migron: and the people that were with him were about six hundred men; 3. And Ahiah, the son of Ahitub, I-chabod's brother, the son of Phinehas, the son of Eli, the Lord's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod. And the people knew not that Jonathan was gone. 4. And between the passages, by which Jonathan sought to go over unto the Philistines' garrison, there was a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side: and the name of the one was Bozez, and the name of the other Seneh. 5. The fore-front of the one was situate northward over against Michmash, and the other southward over against Gibeah. 6. And Jonathan said to the young man that bare his armour, Come, and let us go over unto the garrison of these uncircumcised: it may be that the Lord will work for us: for there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few. 7. And his armour-bearer said unto him, Do all that is in thine heart: turn thee; behold, I am with thee according to thy heart. 8. Then said Jonathan, Behold, we will pass over unto these men, and we will discover ourselves unto them. 9. If they say thus unto us, Tarry until we come to you; then we will stand still in our place, and will not go up unto them. 10. But if they say thus, Come up unto us; then we will go up: for the Lord hath delivered them into our hand; and this shall be a sign unto us. 11. And both of them discovered themselves unto the garrison of the Philistines: and the Philistines said, Behold, the Hebrews come forth out of the holes where they had hid themselves. 12. And the men of the garrison answered Jonathan and his armour-bearer, and said, Come up to us, and we will show you a thing. And Jonathan said unto his armour-bearer, Come up after me; for the Lord hath delivered them into the hand of Israel. 13. And Jonathan climbed up upon his hands and upon his feet, and his armour-bearer after him: and they fell before Jonathan; and his armour-bearer slew after him. 14. And that first slaughter, which Jonathan and his armour-bearer made, was about twenty men, within as it were a half-acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough. 15. And there was trembling in the host, in the field, and among all the people; the garrison, and the spoilers, they also trembled; and the earth quaked: so it was a very great trembling. We must here take notice, I. Of the goodness of God in restraining the Philistines, who had the best armies of stout men in the field, from falling upon that little bandful of timorous trembling people that Saul had with him, whom they would easily have swallowed up at once. It is an invisible power that sets bounds to the malice of the church's enemies, and suffers them not to do that which we should think there is nothing to hinder them from. II. Of the meekness of Saul, who seems here to have been quite at a loss, and unable to help himself. 1. He pitched his tent under a tree, and had but six hundred men with him, v. 2. Where were now the three thousand men he had chosen, and put such a confidence in? ch. 13. 2. Those whom he trusted too much to, failed him when he most needed them. He durst not stay at Gibeah, but got into some obscure place, in the uttermost part of the city, under a pomegranate tree, under Rimmon, so the last time, v. 3. 3. He would not get near Gibeah, in the caves of which these six hundred Benjamites that escaped, hid themselves, Judg. 20. 47. Some think that Saul took shelter there, so mean and abject was his spirit, now that he was fallen under God's displeasure, every hour expecting the Philistines upon him, and, thereby, the accomplishment of Samuel's threatening, ch. 15. 14. Those can never think themselves safe, that see themselves cast out of God's protection. 2. Now he sent for a priest, and the ark; a priest from Shiloh, and the ark from Kirjath-jearim, v. 3. 18. Saul had once offended by offering sacrifice himself; (ch. 13. 9.) now he resolves never to fall into that error again, and therefore sends for a priest, and hopes to compromise the matter with God Almighty by a partial reformation, as many do, whose hearts are unchanged. Samuel, the Lord's prophet, had forsoaked him, but he thinks he can make up that loss, by commanding Ahiah, the Lord's priest, to attend him, and he will not make him stay for him nor reprove him, as Samuel had done, but will do just as he bids him, v. 18, 19. Many love to have just such ministers as will be what they would have them to be, and prosper smooth things to them; and their lowering of them because they are priests, they hope, will alone for their enemy to those ministers that stand faithfully and plainly with them. He will also have the ark brought, perhaps, to upbraid Samuel, who, in the days of his government, for aught that appears, had not made any public use of it; or in hopes that that would make up the deficiency of his forces; one would have supposed, that they could never have brought the ark into the camp again, since the last time, v. 18, when it was said, to save them, but did itself fall into the Philistines' hands. But it is common for those that have lost the substance of religion, to be most fond of the shadows of it, as here is a deserted prince courting a deserted priest. III. Of the bravery and piety of Jonathan, the son of Saul, who was much fitter than the father to wear the crown. A great imp (says Bishop Hall) "out of a crab stock." 1. He resolved to go incognito—unknown to any one, into the camp of the Philistines; he did not acquaint his father with his design, for he knew he would forbid him; nor the people, for he knew they would all discourage him; and because he resolved not to heed their objections, he resolved not to hear them, nor ask their advice, v. 1, 3. Nor had he so great an opinion of the priest, as to consult him, but, being conscious of a divine impulse putting him upon it, he threw himself into the mouth of danger, in hopes of doing service to his country. The way of access to the enemies' camp is described (v. 4, 5) to be peculiarly difficult, and their natural intrenchments seemed impregnable; yet that does not discourage him: the strength and sharpness of the rocks do but harden and whet his resolutions. General views may be suggested by opposition and take pleasure in breaking through it.

2. He encouraged his armour-bearer, a young man that attended him, to go alone with him in this daring enterprise; (v. 6.) "Come, and let us put our lives in our hands, and go over to the enemies' garrison, and try what we can do to put them into confusion." See whence he draws his encouragements. (1.) They are uncircumcised, and have not the seal of the covenant in their flesh, as we have not. Fear not, we shall do well enough with them, for they are not under the protection of God's covenant, as we are, cannot call him their's, as we can, by the sign of circumcision." If such as are enemies to us, are also strangers to God, we need not fear them. (2.) "God is able to make us too victorious over their unnumbered regiments. There is no restraint to the Lord, no limitation to the Holy One, but it is by many or by few." This is a truth easily granted in general, that it is all alike to Omnipotence, what the instruments are by which it works; and yet it is not so easy to apply it to a particular case: when we are but few and feeble, then to believe that God can not only save us, but save by us, this is an instance of faith, which, wherever it is, shall obtain a good report. Let this strengthen the weak and hearten us to do our part, though it be pleasing with God for the enforcing of our petitions, and with ourselves for the silencing of our fears, It is nothing with God to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power, 2 Chron. 14. 11. (3.) "Who knows, but he that can use us for his glory, will do it? It may be the Lord will work for us, work with us, work a sign or miracle for us;" so the Chaldees. We may encourage ourselves with hope, that he will work for us, though we have not ground on which to build an assurance. An active faith will venture far in God's cause upon an, It may be. His armour-bearer, or esquire, as if he had learned to carry, not his arms only, but his heart, promised to stand by him, and follow him wheresoever he went, v. 7. We have reason to think that Jonathan felt a divine impulse and impression, putting him upon this bold adventure, in which he was encouraged by his servant's concurrence, though danger was so great which he ran upon, that he had rather tempted God, than trusted him. And perhaps, he had an actual regard to that word of Joshua, (ch. 23. 10.) One man of you shall chase a thousand, borrowed from Moses, Deut. 32. 50.

3. How bold soever his resolution was, he resolved to follow Providence in the execution of it, which he believed, would guide him with its course. (Ps. 32. 8.) and which therefore he would carefully attend, and take hints of direction from.

See, (1.) How he put himself upon Providence, and resolved to be determined by it. "Come," (says he to his confidant,) "we will discover ourselves to the enemy, as those that are not afraid to look them in the face, (v. 8.) and then, if they be so cautious as to bid us stand, we will advance no further, taking that for thereby intimating of Providence, that God will not be adverse to our enterprise, but that he prepares, as well as we, to give them a warm reception: (v. 9.) but if they be so presumptuous as to challenge us, and the first sentinel we meet with bids us march on, we will push forward, and make as brisk an onset, assuredly gathering from thence that it is the will of God we should act offensively, and then, not doubting but he will stand by us," (v. 10.) and upon this issue he puts it, firmly believing, as we all should, (1.) That God has the governing of the hearts and tongues of all men, even of those that know him not, nor have any regard to him, and serves his own purposes by them, though they mean not so, neither doth their heart approve their actions, yet God could discover his mind to him if he pleased, and would do so, because he depended upon him, as surely by the mouth of a Philistine, as by the mouth of a priest. (2.) That God will, some way or other, direct the steps of those that acknowledge him in all their ways, and seek unto him for direction, with full purpose of heart to follow his conduct. Sometimes we find most comfort in that which is least our own doing, and into which we have been led by the unexpected, but well observed, turns of Providence.

(2.) Providence gave him the sign he expected, and he answered the signal. He and his armour-bearer did not surprise the Philistines when they were asleep, but discovered themselves to them by day-light, v. 11. The guards of the Philistines, (1.) Disarmed them, upbraided them with the cowardice of many of their people, and looked upon them as a contemptible branch of the meekers, (2.) The Hebrews came forth out of their holes. If some of Christ's soldiers play the coward, others that play the man, may, perhaps, be upbraided with it. (2.) They defied them; (v. 12.) Come, and we will show you a thing; as if they came like children to gaze about them; but meaning, as Goliath, (ch. 17. 44.) that they would give them as meat to the fowls of the air. They bantred them, not doubting but to make them return, and now (v. 13,) though they had nothing to cover him, nor any but his own armor to second him, nor any human probability of any thing but death before him.

4. The wonderful success of this daring enterprise. The Philistines, instead of falling upon Jonathan, to slay him, or take prisoner, fell before him, (v. 13.) unaccountably, upon the first blow he gave. They fell; that is, (1.) They were many of them slain by him and his armour-bearer; (v. 14.) twenty Philistines fell presently. It was not so much the name of Jonathan, that made them yield so tamely, though some think that he was become terrible to them, since he smote one of their garrisons, (ch. 13. 3.) but it was God's right hand, and his arm, that got him this victory.

(2.) The rest were put to flight, and fell upon one another, (v. 15.) There was a trembling in the host. There was no visible cause for fear, they were so numerous, bold, advantageously posted; the Israelites had fled before them, not an enemy made head against them, but one gentleman and his man, and yet they shook like an aspen-leaf; the consternation was general, they all trembled, even the soldiers; those that had been most bold and foremost shared in the common fright, the joints of their knees were a trembling against another, and yet none of them could tell why, or wherefore; it is called a trembling of God, so the original phrase is, signifying, not only, as we render it, a very great trembling which they could not resist, nor reason themselves clear of, but that it was
16. And the watchmen of Saul in Gibeah of Benjamin looked; and, behold, the multitude melted away, and they went on beating down one another. 17. Then said Saul unto the people that were with him, Number now, and see who is gone from us. And when they had numbered, behold, Jonathan and his armour-bearer were not there. 18. And Saul said unto Abiah, Bring hither the ark of God: (for the ark of God was at that time with the children of Israel.) 19. And it came to pass, while Saul talked unto the priest, that the noise that was in the host of the Philistines went on and increased; and Saul said unto the priest, Withdraw thine hand. 20. And Saul and all the people that were with him assembled themselves, and they came to the battle: and, behold, every man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture. 21. Moreover, the Hebrews that were with the Philistines before that time, which went up with them into the camp from the country round about, even they also turned to be with the Israelites that were with Saul and Jonathan. 22. Likewise all the men of Israel which had hid themselves in mount Ephraim, when they heard that the Philistines fled, even they also followed hard after them in the battle. 23. So the Lord saved Israel that day: and the battle passed over unto Beth-aven.

We have here the prosecution and improvement of the wonderful advantages which Jonathan and his armour-bearer gained against the Philistines.

I. The Philistines were, by the power of God, set against one another. They melted away like snow before the sun, and went on beating down one another, v. 16. for every man's sword was against his fellow, v. 20. When they fled for fear, instead of turning back upon those that chased them, they reckoned those only their enemies that stood in their way, and treated them accordingly. The Philistines were very secure, because all the swords and spears were in their hands, Israel had none, except what Saul and Jonathan had; but now God showed them the folly of that confidence, by making their own swords and spears the instruments of their destruction, and more fatal in their own hands, than if they had been in the hands of Israel. See the like done, Judg. 7. 22. 2 Chron. 20. 23.

II. The Israelites were hereby animated against them.

Notice was soon taken of it by the watchmen of Saul, those that stood sentinel at Gibeah; (v. 16.) they were awed, and every one of them went into great confusion, and that a great slaughter was made among them, and yet, upon search, they found none of their own forces absent, but only Jonathan and his servant, (v. 17.) which, no doubt, greatly animated them, and assured them that it could be no other than the Lord's doing, when there was no more of man's doing than what those two could do against a great host.

2. Saul began to inquire of God, but soon desisted. His spirit was not come down so far as to allow him to consult with Samuel, though, it is probable, he was near him; for we read, (ch. 13. 15.) that he was come to Gibeah of Benjamin; but he called for the ark, (v. 18.) desiring to know whether he should be attacked by the Philistines, and what was to be done upon the disorder they perceived them to be in. Many will consult God about their safety, that would never consult him about their duty. But perceiving by his scouts that the noise in the enemy's camp in creased, he commanded the priest that officiated, to break off abruptly, "Withdraw thine hand," for when Joshua was actually engaged with Amalek, Moses continued still to lift up his hands. It is rather a prohibition to his inquiring of the Lord, either, (1.) Because now he thought he did not need an answer, the case was plain enough. And yet the more evident it was that God did all, the more reason he had to inquire whether he would give him leave to do any thing. Or, (2.) Because now he would not stay for an answer; he was in such haste to fight a falling enemy, that he would not stay to make an end of his devotions, nor hear what answer God would give him. A little thing will divert a vain and carnal mind from religious exercises. He that believeth will not make such haste as this, nor reckon any business so urgent, as not to allow time to take God along with him.

3. He, and all the little force he had, made a valiant and determined, and, in the end, successful attack upon the enemy: and all the people were cried together, so the word is, v. 20. for want of the silver trumpets, wherewith God appointed them to sound an alarm in the day of battle, Numb. 10. 9. They summoned them together by shouting, and their number was not so great, but that they might soon be got together. And now they seem bold and brave, when the work is done to their hands. Our Lord Jesus has conquered our spiritual enemies, routed and dispersed them, so that we are cowards indeed, if we will not stand to our arms, when it is only to pursue the victory and divide the spoil.

4. Every Hebrew, even those from whom one would least have expected it, now turned his hand against the Philistines. 1. Those that had deserted, and gone over to the enemy, and were among them, fought against them; v. 21. some think, they were such as had been taken prisoners by them, and now they were as goads in their sides: it rather seems, that they went in to them voluntarily, but, now that they saw them falling, recovered the hearts of Israelites, and did valiantly for their country. 2. Those that had run their colours, and hid themselves in the mountains, returned to their posts, and joined in with the pursuers, v. 22. hoping, by their great zeal and officiousness now that the danger was over and the victory sure, to atone for their former cowardice. It was not much to their praise to appear now, but it would have been more to their reproach if they had not appeared. Those are remiss and faint-hearted indeed, that will not act in the cause of God, when they see it victorious as well as righteous.

Thus all hands were at work against the Philistines, and every man as many as he could; without sword or spear; yet it is said, v. 23. it was the Lord that saved Israel that day. He did it by them, for without him they could do nothing. Salvation is of the Lord.
And the men of Israel were distressed that day: for Saul had adjured the people, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food until evening, that I may be avenged on mine enemies. So none of the people tasted any food. 25. And all they of the land came to a wood, and there was honey upon the ground. 26. And when the people were come into the wood, behold, the honey dropped; but no man put his hand to his mouth: for the people feared the oath. 27. But Jonathan heard not when his father charged the people with the oath: wherefore he put forth the end of the rod that was in his hand, and dipped it in a honey-comb, and put his hand to his mouth; and his eyes were enlightened. 28. Then answered one of the people, and said, Thy father straightly charged the people with an oath, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food this day. And the people were faint. 29. Then said Jonathan, My father hath troubled the land: see, I pray you, how mine eyes have been enlightened, because I tasted a little of this honey; 30. How much more, if haply the people had eaten freely to-day of the spoil of their enemies which they found? for had there not been now a much greater slaughter among the Philistines? 31. And they smote the Philistines that day from Michmac to Ajalon: and the people were very faint. 32. And the people flew upon the spoil, and took sheep, and oxen, and calves, and slew them on the ground: and the people did eat them with the blood. 33. Then they told Saul, saying, Behold, the people sin against the Lord, in that they eat with the blood. And he said, Ye have transgressed: roll a great stone unto me this day. 34. And Saul said, Disperse yourselves among the people, and say unto them, Bring me hither every man his ox, and every man his sheep, and slay them here, and eat; and sin not against the Lord in eating with the blood. And all the people brought every man his ox with him that night, and slew them there. 35. And Saul built an altar unto the Lord: the same was the first altar that he built unto the Lord.

We have here an account of the distress of the children of Israel, in even the days of their triumphs. Such allays are all present joys subject to! and such obstructions does many a good cause meet with, even when it seems most prosperous, through the management of instruments.

I. Saul forbade the people, under the penalty of a curse, to taste any food that day, v. 24. Here we will suppose, 1. That as king he had power to put his soldiers under this interdict, and to bind it on with a curse; and therefore they submitted to it, and God so far owned it, as to discover, by the lot, that Jonathan was the delinquent that had meddled with the accursed thing; (though ignorantly,) on which account, God would not be at that time merited of them. 2. That he did it with a good intention, lest the people, who perhaps had been kept for some time at short allowance, when they were plenty of victuals in the deserted camp of the Philistines, should fall greedy upon the spoil, and lose time in pursuing the enemy, and some of them, it may be, glut themselves to that degree, as not to be fit for any more service that day. To prevent this, he forbade them to taste any food, and laid himself, it is likely, under the same restraint. And yet his making this severe order was, (1.) Impolitic, and very unwise; for if it gained time, it lost strength for the pursuit. (2.) It was impious and disobedging to the people, and worse than muzzling the mouth of the ox, when he treads out the corn. To forbid them to feast had been commendable, but to forbid them so much as to taste, though so hungry, was barbarous. (3.) It was impious to enforce the prohibition with a curse and an oath. Had he no penalty less than an anathema, wherewith to support his military discipline? Death for such a crime had been too much, but especially death with a curse. Though superiors may chide and correct, they may not curse their inferiors; our rule is, Bless, and curse not. When David speaks of an enemy he had that loved cursing, perhaps he meant Saul, Ps. 109. 17, 18.

II. The people observed his order, but it had many inconveniences attending it. 1. The soldiers were contented; for in their pursuits of the enemy, it happened that they went into gardens of wild honey, that it dropped from the trees upon the ground; the Philistines having perhaps, in their flight, broken in upon the honey-combs, for their own refreshment, and left them running. Canaan flowed with honey, and here is an instance of it. They sucked honey out of the rock, the flinty rock; Deut. 32. 13. yet, for fear of the curse, they did not take it. They might have eaten the honey, but the name of Israelites, that can deny themselves and their own appetites, even when they are most craving, and the delights of sense most tempting, for fear of guilt and a curse, and the table becoming a snare. Let us never feed ourselves, much less feast ourselves, without fear. 2. Jonathan fell under the curse through ignorance. He heard not of the charge his father had given; for, having committed the lines, the chase, and therefore might justly be looked upon as exempted from the charge, and not intended in it. But it seems it was taken for granted, and he himself did not object against it afterward, that it extended to him, though absent upon so grand an occasion. He, not knowing any peril in it, took up a piece of a honey-comb, upon the end of his staff, and sucked it, v. 27. and was sensibly refreshed by it; his eyes were enlightened; (2.) hid him himself through hunger and faintness; it made his countenance look pleasant and cheerful, for it was such as a stander-by might discern, v. 29. See how mine eyes have been enlightened. He thought no harm, nor feared any, till one of the people acquainted him with the order, and then he found himself in a snare. Many a good son has been thus entangled and distressed, more ways than one, by his own brain. He was an incurable sinner; for his part, lost the crown he was heir to, by his father's folly, which, it may be, this was an ill omen of. 3. The soldiers were faint, and grew feeble in the pursuit of the Philistines. Jonathan foresaw this would be the effect of it, their spirits would flag, and their strength would fail, for want of sustenance. Such is the nature of our bodies, that they soon grow unfit for service, if they be supplied with fresh recruits. Daily work cannot be done without daily bread, which therefore our Father in heaven graciously gives us. It is bread that strengthens man's heart; therefore Jonathan reas ned very well. If the people had eaten freely, there had been much greater slaughter, (v. 36.) but, as it was, they were very faint, too much fatigued, so the Chaldee, and began to think more of their meat than of their work. 4. The worst effect of all, was, that, at evening, when the restraint was taken off, and they returned to their food again, they were so greedy and eager upon it, that they ate the flesh with the blood, expressly contrary to the law of God, v. 32. Two hungry meals, we say, make the third a glutton; it was so here. They would not stay to have their meat either duly killed, for they slew them upon the ground, and did not hang them up, as they used to do, that the blood might all run out of them, or duly dressed, but fell greedily upon it, before it was half boiled, or half roasted, v. 32. Saul, being informed of it, reproved them for the sin, v. 33. Ye have transgressed; but did not, as he should have done, reflect upon himself as having been accessory to it, and having made the Lord's people to transgress.

To put a stop to this irregularity, Saul ordered them to set up a great stone before him, and let all that had cattle to kill, for their present use, bring them thither, and kill them under his eye upon that stone, v. 33. and the people did so, v. 34. so easily were they restrained and reformed when their prince took care to do his part. If magistrates would but use their power as they might, people would be made better than they are, with more ease than is imagined.

Lastly, On this occasion Saul built an altar, v. 35. that he might offer sacrifice, either by way of acknowledgment of the victory they had obtained, or by way of atonement for the sin they had been guilty of. The same was the first altar that he built, and perhaps the rolling of the great stone to kill the beasts on, reminded him of converting it into an altar, else he had not thought of it. Saul was turning aside from God, and yet now he begins to build altars, being most zealous (as many are) for the form of godliness then when he was denying the power of it. See Hos. 8. 14. Israel has forgotten his Maker, and built his altars in the hasty stones, v. 6. He began to build that altar; he laid the first stone, but was so hasty to pursue his victory, that he could not stay to finish it.

36. And Saul said, Let us go down after the Philistines by night, and spoil them until the morning light, and let us not leave a man of them. And they said, Do whatsoever seemeth good unto thee. Then said the priest, Let us draw near hither unto God. 37. And Saul asked counsel of God, Shall I go down after the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into the hand of Israel? But he answered him not that day. 38. And Saul said, Draw ye near hither all the chief of the people; and know and see wherein this sin hath been this day: 39. For, as the Lord liveth, which saveth Israel, though it be in Jonathan my son, he shall surely die. But there was not a man among all the people that answered him. 40. Then said he unto all Israel, Be ye on one side, and I and Jonathan my son will be on the other side. And the people said unto Saul, Do what seemeth good unto thee. 41. Therefore Saul said unto the Lord God of Israel, Give a perfect lot. And Saul and Jonathan were taken: but the people escaped. 42. And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan my son. And Jonathan was taken. 43. Then Saul said to Jonathan, Tell me what thou hast done. And Jonathan told him, and said, I did but taste a little honey with the end of the rod that was in mine hand, and, lo, I must die. 44. And Saul answered, God do so, and more also: for thou shalt surely die, Jonathan. 45. And the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not. 46. Then Saul went up from following the Philistines: and the Philistines went to their own place.

Here is, I. Saul's boasting against the Philistines; he proposed, as soon as his soldiers had got their suppers, to pursue them all night, and not leave a man of them, v. 36. Here he showed much zeal, but little discretion; for his army, thus fatigued, could as ill spare a night's sleep, as a man could. But it is common for rash and foolish men, to consider no body but themselves, and, so they may but have their humour, not to care what hardships they put upon those that are under them. However, his people were so obsequious to their king, that they would by no means oppose the motion, but resolved to make the best of it, and, if he will go on, they will follow him. Do whatsoever seemeth good to thee. Only the priest thought it convenient to go with them, and counsel with them; and then made known to himself, whom he might go with, and who might supply them with provisions, that were broken off abruptly, v. 19. and to consult the oracle, Let us draw hither unto God. Princes and great men have need of such about them, as will thus be their remembrancers, wherever they go, to take God along with them. And when the priest proposed it, Saul could not, for shame, reject the motion, but asked counsel of God, (v. 37.) Shall I go down after the Philistines? And shall I speed? 38. If his finding Saul on his son Jonathan: and the rest of this paragraph is wholly concerning him; for while he is prosecuted, the Philistines made their escape. We know not what mischief may ensue upon one rash resolve.

1. God, by giving an intimation of his displeasure, but Saul upon searching for an accused thing. When, by the priest, he consulted the oracle to answer him not, v. 37. Note, When God denies our prayers, it concerns us to inquire what the sin is that has provoked him to do so. Let us see where the sin is, (v. 38.) for God's ear is not heavy that it cannot hear, but it is sin that separates between us and him. If God turns away our prayer, we have reason to suspect it is for some iniquity regarded in our hearts, which we are concerned to find out, that we may put it away, may mortify it, and put it to death. Saul swears by his Maker, that whatever sin the Achan that troubled the camp, by eating the forbidden fruit, should certainly die, though it were Jonathan himself; that is, though ever so dear to himself and the people, little thinking that Jonathan was the man; (v. 39.)
"He shall surely die; the curse shall be executed upon him." But none of the people answered him; that is, none of those who knew Jonathan had broken the order, would inform against him.

2. Jonathan was discovered by lot to be the offender. Saul would have cast lots between himself and Jonathan on the one side, and the people on the other, perhaps, because he was as confident of Jonathan's innocence in this matter, as of his own, v. 40. The people, seeing him in a heat, durst not gainsay anything he proposed, but acquiesced. "Do as seemeth good unto thee." Before he cast lots, he prayed that God would give a perfect lot; (v. 41.) that is, make a full discovery of this matter, and that he would show the innocent. This was with an air of impartial justice. Judges should desire that truth may come out, whoever may suffer by it. Lots should be cast with prayer, because they are a solemn appeal to Providence, and by them we beg of God to direct and determine us; (Acts 1:26.) for which reason some have condemned games, that depend purely upon lot or chance, as making too bold with a sacred thing. Jonathan at length was taken; (v. 42.) Providence designing hereby to countenance and support a lawful authority, and to put an honour upon the administration of public justice in general, reserving another way to bring off one that had done nothing worthy of death.

3. Jonathan ingenuously confesses the fact, and Saul, with an angry curse, passes sentence upon him. Jonathan denies not the truth, nor goes about to conceal it, only he thinks it hard that he must die for it, v. 43. He might very fairly have pleaded his invincible ignorance of the law, or have insisted upon his merit, but he submitted to the necessity with a great and generous mind, "God's and my father's will be done;" thus he showed as much valor in receiving the messengers of death himself, as in sending them among the Philistines. It is as brave to yield in some cases, as it is in most cases to fight. Saul is not mollified by his filial submission, nor the hardness of his case; but as one that affected to be thought firm to his word, and much more to his oath, even then when it bound him hardest, with another imprecation he gives judgment upon Jonathan; (v. 44.) God do so, and more also to me, if I do not execute the law upon thee, for thou shalt surely die, Jonathan. (1.) He did come in the name of God, without consulting the oracle; Jonathan had a very good plea in arrest of the judgment; what he had done was not malum in se—bad in itself; and as for the prohibition of it, he was ignorant of that, so that he could not be charged with rebellion or disobedience. (2.) He did it in fury. Had Jonathan been worthy to die, yet it had become a judge, much more a father, to pass sentence with tenderness and compassion, such a sentence on such a head as his, and God perfectly divested of all humanity and natural affection. Justice is debased, when it is administered with wrath and bitterness. (3.) He backed it with a curse upon himself, if he did not see the sentence executed; and this curse did return upon his own head; Jonathan escaped, but God did so to Saul, and more also; for he was rejected of God, and made an anathema. Let none upon any occasion do, in the name of God, what is contrary to the law, lest the law say Amen to them, and make their own tongues to fall upon them, Ps. 64. 8. He that rolleth this stone, it will return upon him. Yet we have reason to think that Saul's bowels yearned toward Jonathan, so that he really punished himself, and very justly, when he seemed so severe upon Jonathan. God made him feel the smart of his own rash edict, which might make him fear being again guilty of the like. By all these vexations accidents, God did likewise correct him for his presumption, in offering sacrifice without Samuel. An expedition so ill begun, could not end without some rebukes.

4. The people rescued Jonathan out of his father's hands, but Hither they had expressed themselves very observant of Saul, what seemed good to him they acquiesced in; (v. 36, 40.) but when Jonathan is in danger, Saul's word is no longer a law to them, but with the utmost zeal they oppose the execution of his sentence, "Shall Jonathan die? That blessing, that darling, of his country? Shall that life be sacrificed to a punctilio of law and honour, which was so bravely exposed for the public service, and to which owe our lives and triumphs? No, we will never stand by, and see him thus treated, whom God delights to honour." It is good to see Israelites zealous for the protection of those whom God has made instruments of public good. Saul had sworn that Jonathan should die, but they oppose their oath to his, and swear he shall not die; As the Lord liveth, there shall not only not his head, but not a hair of his head fall to the ground: they did not refuse him by violence, but by reason and resolution; and Josephus says, they made their prayer to God, that he might be loosed from the curse. They plead for him, that he hath wrought with God this day; that is, he has owned God's cause, and God has owned his endeavours, and therefore his life is too precious to be thrown away upon a nicety. We may suppose, Saul had not so perfectly forgotten the relation of a father, but that he was willing enough to have Jonathan rescued, and well contented to have that done, which yet he would not do himself; and he that knows the heart of a father, knows not how to blame him.

Lastly, The design against the Philistines is quashed by this incident; (v. 46.) Saul went up from following them, and so an opportunity was lost of completing the victory. When Israel's shields are clashing together, the public safety and service suffer by it.

47. So Saul took the kingdom over Israel, and fought against all his enemies on every side, against Moab, and against the children of Ammon, and against Edom, and against the kings of Zobah, and against the Philistines: and whithersoever he turned himself, he vexed them. 48. And he gathered a host, and smote the Amalekites, and delivered Israel out of the hands of them that spoilt them. 49. Now the sons of Saul were Jonathan, and Ishui, and Melchi-shua: and the names of his two daughters were these; the name of the first-born Merab, and the name of the younger Michal: 50. And the name of Saul's wife was Ahinoam, the daughter of Ahimaaz: and the name of the captain of his host was Abner, the son of Ner, Saul's uncle: 51. And Kish was the father of Saul; and Ner, the father of Abner, was the son of Abiel. 52. And there was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul: and when Saul saw any strong man, or any valiant man, he took him unto him.

Here is a general account of Saul's court and camp.

1. Of his court and family. The names of his sons and daughters, v. 49. and of his wife, and his cousin-german that was general of his army, v. 50. There is mention of another wife of Saul's, 2 Sam. 21. 8. Rizpah, a secondary wife, and of the children he had by her.

2. Of his camp and military actions. (1) How he leived his army; when he saw any strong valiant man, that was remarkably fit for service, he took him unto him, v. 32. as Samuel had told them the manner of the king would be; (ch. 8. 11.) and if he must have a standing army, it was his prudence to fill it up with the eldest men he could make choice of. (2) How he employed his army; he guarded his country against the insults of its enemies on every side, and prevented their incursions, v. 47, 48. It is supposed that he acted only defensively against those that used to invade the borders of Israel, and whithersoever he turned himself, as there was occasion, he vexed them, by checking and disappointing them. But the enemies he struggled most with, were the Philistines, with them he had sore war, all his days, v. 32. He had little reason to be proud of his royal dignity, nor had any of his neighbours cause to envy him, he had little enjoyment of himself after he took the kingdom. He could not vex his enemies without some vexation to himself, such thorns are crowns quilted with.

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter, we have the final rejection of Saul from being king, for his disobedience to God's command, in not utterly destroying the Amalekites. By his wars and victories, he hoped to magnify and perpetuate his own name and honour, but, by his mismanagement of them, he ruined himself, and laid his honour in the dust. Here is, 1. The commission God gave him to destroy the Amalekites, with a command to do it utterly, v. 1 - 3. II. Saul's preparation for this expedition, v. 4 - 6. III. His success, and partial execution of this commission, v. 7 - 9. IV. His examination before Samuel, and sentence past upon him, notwithstanding the many frivolous plea's he made to excuse himself, v. 10 - 31. V. The slaying of Agag, v. 32, 33. VI. Samuel's final farewell to Saul, v. 34, 35.

1. SAMUEL also said unto Saul, The Lord sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now therefore hearken thou unto the voice of the words of the Lord. 2. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way when he came up from Egypt. 3. Now go, and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass. 4. And Saul gathered the people together, and numbered them in Telin, two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand men of Judah. 5. And Saul came to a city of Amalek, and laid wait in the valley. 6. And Saul said unto the Kenites, Go, depart, get you down from among the Amalekites, lest I destroy you with them: for ye showed kindness to all the children of Israel when they came up out of Egypt. So the Kenites departed from among the Amalekites. 7. And Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou comest to Shur, that is over against Egypt. 8. And he took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive, and utterly destroyed all the people with the edge of the sword. 9. But Saul and the people spared Agag, and the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them: but every thing that was vile and refuse, that they destroyed utterly.

Here,

I. Samuel, in God's name, solemnly requires Saul to be obedient to the command of God, and plainly intimates that he was now about to put him upon a trial, in one particular instance, whether he would be obedient or not, v. 1. And the making of this so expressly the trial of his obedience, did very much aggravate his disobedience. 1. He reminds him of what God had done for him. "The Lord sent me to anoint thee, to be a king." God gave thee the power, and therefore he expects thou shouldst use thy power for him. He put honour upon thee, and now thou must study how to do him honour. He made thee king over Israel, and now thou must plead Israel's cause, and avenge their quarrells. Thou art advanced to command Israel, but know that thou art a subject to the God of Israel, and must be commanded by him. Men's preferment, instead of discharging them from their obedience to God, obliges them so much the more to obey. Samuel had himself been employed to anoint Saul, and therefore was the fitter to be sent with these orders to him. 2. He tells him, in general, that, in consideration of this, what ever God commanded him to do, he was bound to do it. Now therefore hearken to the voice of the Lord. Note, God's favours to us lay strong obligations upon us, to obey him to the full. This we must render, Ps. 116. 12.

II. He appoints him a particular piece of service, in which he must now show his obedience to God, more than in any thing he had done yet. Samuel promises God's authority to the command, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the Lord of all hosts, of Israel's hosts: he also gives him a reason for the command, that the severity he must use might not seem hard. "I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, v. 2. God had an ancient and inveterate war with the Amalekites, for the injuries they did to his people Israel, when he brought them out of Egypt: we have the story, Exod. 17. 8, &c. and the crime is aggravated, Deut. 25. 18. he basely smote the hindmost of them, and feared not God; God then swore that he would have war with Amalek from generation to generation, and that, in process of time, he would utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek; that is the work that Saul is now appointed to do, v. 3. "Go, and smite Amalek. Israel is now strong, and the measure of the iniquity of Amalek is now full; now go and make a full riddance of that devoted nation." He is expressly commanded to kill and slay all before him, both man and woman, infant and suckling, and not spare them out of pity; ox and sheep, camel and ass, and not spare them out of covetousness. Note, 1. Injuries done to God's Israel, will certainly be reckoned for sooner or later, especially the opposition given them, when they are coming out of Egypt. 2. God often bears long with those that are marked for ruin. The sentence past, is not executed speedily. 3. Though he bear long, he will not bear always. The year of recompense for the controversy of Israel, will come at last. Though divine vengeance strikes slow, it strikes sure. 4. The longer judgment is delayed, the more severe it is when it comes. 5. God chooses out instruments to do his work, that are fittest for it. This was bloody work, and therefore Saul must do it, that was a rough and severe man.
III. Saul hereupon musters his forces, and makes a descent upon the country of Amaleck; it was an immense army that he brought into the field, (v. 4.) two hundred thousand footmen. When he was to engage the Philistines and the success was hazardous, he had but six hundred attending him; (ch. 13. 15.) but now that he was to attack the Amalekites, by express order from heaven, in which he was sure of victory, he had thousands at his call. But whatsoever it was at other times, it was not now for the honour of Judah, that their forces were numbered by themselves, for their quota was scandalously short, (v. 6.) and this was the reason, but the twentieth part of the whole, for they were but ten thousand, when the other ten tribes (for I except Levi) brought into the field two hundred thousand. The day of Judah's honour drew near, but was not yet come. Saul numbered them in Telaim, which signifies lambs. He numbered them like lambs, so the vulgar Latin; numbered them by the paschal lambs, so the Chaldee, allowing, to ten a lamb, a way of numbering used by the Jews in the latter times of their nation. Saul drew all his forces to the city of Amaleck, that city was their metropolis, (v. 5) that he might provoke them to give him battle.

IV. He gave friendly advice to the Kenites, to separate themselves from the Amalekites, among whom they dwelt, while this execution was in doing, v. 6. Herein he did prudently and piously follow the direction Samuel gave him. The Kenites were of the family and kindred of Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, a people that dwelt in tents, which made it easy to them, upon every occasion, to remove to other lands not appropriated; many of them, at this time, dwelt among the Amalekites, where, though they dwelt in tents, they were fortified by nature, for they put their tent in a rock; and as it was not possible they could live anywhere, Saul affected fastnesses, Numb. 24. 21. Balaam had there foretold, that they should be wasted; (v. 22.) however, Saul must not waste them. But, 1. He acknowledges the kindness of their ancestors to Israel, when they came out of Egypt. Jethro and his family had been very helpful and serviceable to them in their passage through the wilderness, had been to them instead of eyes, and had been their memory and their helper as posterity in many ages after. Thus a good man leaves the divine blessing for an inheritance to his children's children; those that come after us, may be repaying the benefit of our good works, when we are in our graves. God is not unrighteous to forget the kindness shown to his people; but they shall be remembered another day, at furthest in the great day, and recompensed in the resurrection of the just. I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; God's remembering the kindness of the Kenites' ancestors, in favour to them, at the same time when he was punishing the injuries done by the ancestors of the Amalekites, helped to clear the righteousness of God in that dispensation. If he entail favours, why may he not entail frowns? He esposes his people's cause, so as to bless those that bless them; and therefore as to curse those that curse them, Numb. 24. Gen. 13. 3. They cannot require the kindness, nor avenge the injuries, done them, themselves, but God will do both. 2. He desires them to remove their tents from among the Amalekites; Go, depart, get you down from among them. When destroying judgments are abroad, God will take care to separate between the precious and the vile, and to hide the meek of the earth in the day of his anger. It is impossible, and beyond the power of God's enemies, and it is our duty and interest to come out from among them, lest we share in their sins and plagues, Rev. 18. 4. The Jews have a saying, Woe to the wicked man, and woe to his neighbour.

V. Saul prevailed against the Amalekites, for it was rather an execution of condoned malefactors, than a war with contending enemies; the issue could not be dubious when the one was just, and the call so clear; He smote them, (v. 7.) utterly destroyed them, v. 8. Now they paid dear for the sin of their ancestors; God sometimes days up iniquity for the children. They were idolaters, and were guilty of many other sins, for which they deserved to be punished under the wrath of God. Yet when God would reckon with them, he fastened upon the sin of their ancestors in abusing his Israel, as the ground of his quarrel. Lord, how unsearchable are thy judgments, yet how incontestable is thy righteousness!

VI. Yet he did his work by halves, v. 9. 1. He spared Agag, because he was a king like himself; and, perhaps, in hope to get a great ransom for him. 2. He spared the best of the cattle, and destroyed only the refuse, that was good for little. Many of the people, we may suppose, made their escape, and took their effects with them into other countries, and therefore we read of Amalekites after this, but that could not be helped; it was Saul's fault, that he did not destroy such as came to his hands, and were in his power. That which was now destroyed, was, in effect, sacrificed to the justice of God, as the God whom we rejoice belongeth; and for Saul to think the torn and the sick, the lame and the lean, good enough for that, while he reserved for his own fields, and his own table, the firstlings and the fat, was really to honour himself more than God.

10. Then came the word of the Lord unto Samuel, saying, 11. It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king: for he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandments. And it grieved Samuel; and he cried unto the Lord all night. 12. And when Samuel rose early to meet Saul in the morning, it was told Samuel, saying, Saul came to Carmel, and, behold, he set him up a place, and is gone about, and passed on, and gone down to Gilgal. 13. And Samuel came to Saul: and Saul said unto him, Blessed be thou of the Lord: I have performed the commandment of the Lord. 14. And Samuel said, What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear? 15. And Saul said, They have brought them from the Amalekites: for the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God; and the rest we have utterly destroyed. 16. Then Samuel said unto Saul, Stay, and I will tell thee what the Lord hath said to me this night. And he said unto him, Say on. 17. And Samuel said, When thou wast little in thine own sight, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel, and the Lord anointed thee king over Israel? 18. And the Lord sent thee on a journey, and said, Go, and utterly destroy the sinners the Amalekites, and fight against them until they be con-him up a triumphal arch, or some monument of his victory, at Carmel, a city in the mountains of Judah, seeking his own honour more than the honour of God, for he set up this place (or hand, as the word is) for himself: he had more need to have been repenting of his sin and making his peace with God, than boasting of his victory. 2. That he had marched in great state to Gilgal, for that seems to be intended in the expression, he is gone out and passed on, and gone down, with a great deal of pomp and parade. There Samuel gave him the meeting.

(1.) Saul makes his boast to Samuel of his obedience, because that was the thing by which he was now to signalize himself; (v. 13.) "Blessed be thou of the Lord, for thou sentest me upon a good errand, in which I have had great success, and I have fulfilled thy command; and if I have done very likely, if his conscience had not flown in his face at this time, and charged him with disobedience, he would not have been so forward to proclaim his obedience; for by this he hoped to prevent Samuel's reproving him. Thus sinners think, by justifying themselves, to escape being judged of the Lord; whereas the only way to do that, is, by judging ourselves. They that boast most of their reputation, are mostly suspected of partiality and hypocrisy in it.

(2.) Samuel convicts him by a plain demonstration of his disobedience. "Hast thou performed the commandment of the Lord? What means then the bleating of the sheep," v. 14. Saul would needs have it thought that God Almighty was wonderfully beholden to him for the good service he had done; but Samuel shows him that God was so far from being a debtor to him, that he had given him occasion of action against him, and produces for evidence the bleating of the sheep and the lowing of the oxen, which, perhaps, Saul appointed to bring up the rear of his triumph, but Samuel appeals to them as witnesses against him; he need not go far to disprove him. The noise the cattle made, like the rust of the silver, (Jam. 5. 3.) would be a witness against him. Note, It is no new thing for the plausible professions and protestations of hypocrites to be contradicted and disproved by the most plain and undeniable evidence. Many boast of their obedience to the command of God; but what mean then their indulgence of the flesh, their love of the world, their passion and uncharitableness, and their neglect of holy duties, which witness against them? (2.) Saul insists upon his own justification against this charge, v. 15. The fact of which he devey, the sheep and oxen were brought from the Amalekites. But, [1.] It was not his fault, for the people spared them; as if they durst have done it without the express orders of Saul, when they knew it was against the express orders of Samuel. Note, Those that are willing to justify themselves, are commonly very forward to condemn others, and to lay the blame upon any rather than take it to themselves. Sin is always laid upon another; but if we observe the way in which this is done, we shall not easily be disappointed. It is a sorry subterfuge of an impetuous heart that will not confess its guilt, to lay the blame on those that were either tempted, or partners, or only followers in it. [2.] It was with a good intention; "It was to sacrifice to the Lord thy God; he is thy God, and thou wilt not be against any thing that is done, as this, for his honour." This was a false plea for his sake; and he did not take away their own profit in sparing the cattle: but if it had been true, it had been frivolous, for God hates robbery for burnt-offering; God appointed these cattle to be sacrificed to him in the field, and therefore will give to those no thanks that bring them to be sacrificed at his altar; for he will be served in his own way, and according to the rule he himself has prescribed. Nor will a good intention justify a bad action.

(4.) Samuel overrules, or rather overlooks, his plea, and proceeds, in God's name, to give judgment against him. He premises his authority; what he was about to say was, what the Lord had said to him; (v. 15.) otherwise he would have been far from passing so severe a censure upon him. Those who complain that their ministers are too harsh with them, should remember he is God's servant, and this is God's word. He is simple but merciful, and must say as they are hidden; and therefore be willing, as Samuel himself was here, that they should say so; he delivers his message faithfully.

[1.] He reminds him of the honour God had done him in making him king; (v. 17.) when he was little in his own sight, God regarded the lowness of his state, and rewarded the lowliness of his spirit. Note, Those that are advanced to honour and wealth, ought often to remember their mean beginnings, that they may never think highly of themselves, but always study to do great things for the God that has advanced them. [2.] He lays before him the plainness of the orders he was to execute, v. 18. The Lord sent thee on a journey; so easy was the service, and so certain the success, that it was rather to be called a journey, than a war; the work is a journey, Ps. 126. 2; a journey of mercy, Hagg. 2. 7. He was sent to Amalek, to war against him, and set aside the consideration of his own profit, so far as to have destroyed all that belonged to Amalek, he would have been no loser by it at last, nor have gone this warfare on his own charges; God would, no doubt, have made it up to him, so that he should have no need of spoil. And therefore, [5.] He shows him how inexusable he was, in aiming to make a handle of this expedition, and to陇e the himself of doing it, v. 19. Wherefore then didst thou fly upon the spoil, and convert that to thine own use, which was to have been destroyed for God's honour? See what evil the love of money is the root of; but see what is the sinfulness of sin, and that in it which above any thing else makes it evil in the sight of the Lord: it is disobedience; thou didst not obey the voice of the Lord. [6.] Saul repeats his vindication of his action, that though through contention of conviction, he resolved to abide by it, v. 20, 21. He denies the charge, v. 20. Yea, I have obeyed, I have done all I should do; for he had done all which he thought he needed to do, so much wiser was he in his own eyes than God himself; God bade him kill all, and yet he puts in among the instances of his obedience, that he had brought Agag alive, which he thought was as good as if he had killed him. Thus his carnal, selfish hearts think to excuse themselves from God's commandments with their own equivalents. He insists upon it, that he has utterly destroyed the Amalekites themselves, which was the main thing intended: but as to the spoil, he owns it should have been utterly destroyed; so that he knew his Lord's will, and was under no mistake about the command; but he thought that would be willful waste; the cattle of the Midianites was taken for a prey in Moses's time, Num. 31. 22, 23. And why not the cattle of the Amalekites now? Better it should be a prey to the Israelites, than to the fowls of the air and the wild beasts; and therefore he connived at the people in carrying it away; but it was their doing, and not his; and besides, it was for sacrifice to the Lord here at Gilgal, whether they were now bringing them. See what a hard thing it is to convince the heart of obedience to their sin, and to strip them of their fig-leaves.

(5.) Samuel gives a full answer to his apology, since he did insist upon it, v. 22, 23. He appeals to his own conscience, Has the Lord as great delight in sacrifices as in obedience? Though Saul was not a man of any great acquaintance with religion, yet he could not but know this; [1.] that nothing is so pleasing to God as obedience, no, not sacrifice and offering, and the fat of rams. See here what we should aim at and endeavour in all the exercises of religion, even acceptance with God, that he may delight in what we do. If God be well pleased with us and our services we are happy, we have gained ourselves a name, and it is not a question Mark. 16. 20. But if not? Is. 1. 11. Now, here we are plainely told, that humble, sincere, and conscientious obedience to the will of God, is more pleasing and acceptable to him than all burnt-offering and sacrifices. A careful conformity to moral precepts recommends us to God more than all ceremonial observances. Mic. 6. 6. 8. Hos. 6. 6. Obedience is enjoined by the eternal law of nature, but sacrifice only by a positive law; obedience was the law of innocence, but sacrifice supposes sin come into the world, and is but a feeble attempt to take that away which obedience would have prevented. God is more glorified, and self more denied, by obedience than by sacrifice. It is much easier to bring a bullock or lamb to be burnt upon the altar, than to bring every high thought into obedience to God, and the will subject to his will. Obedience is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God; and man's idolatry, and pride is the glory of God. Obedience was that thing which nothing is so provoking to God as disobedience, setting up our wills in competition with his. This is here called rebellion and stubbornness, and is said to be as bad as witchcraft and idolatry, v. 23. This is as bad to set up other gods, as to live in disobedience to the true God. They that are governed by their own corrupt inclinations, in opposition to the command of God, do, in effect, consult the Teraphims, (as the word here is for idolatry,) and the devillers. It was disobedience that made us all sinners; Rom. 5. 19. and this is the malignity of sin, that it is the transgression of the law, and consequently it is enmity to God, Rom. 8. 7. Saul was a king, but if he disobey the command of God, his royal dignity and power will not excuse him from the guilt of rebellion and stubbornness. It is not the rebellion of the people against their prince, but of a prince against God, that is this commandment. Lastly, He reads his doom, in short, "Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, hast despised it, so the Chaldee, hast made nothing of it, so the Seventy, hast cast off the government of it; therefore he has rejected thee, despised and made nothing of thee, but cast thee off from being king, He that made thee king has determined to unmake thee again." Those are unfit and unworthy to rule over men, who are not willing that God should rule over them.

24. And Saul said unto Samuel, I have sinned: for I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord, and thy words; because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice. 25. Now, therefore, I pray thee, pardon my sin, and turn again with me, that I may worship the Lord. 26. And Samuel said unto Saul, will not return with thee; for thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee from being king over Israel. 27. And as Samuel turned about to go away, he laid hold upon the skirt of his mantle, and it rent. 28. And Samuel said unto him, The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou. 29. And also the Strength of Israel will not lie, nor repent: for he is not a man, that he should repent. 30. Then he said, I have sinned; get honour me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people, and before Israel, and turn again with me, that I may worship the Lord thy God. 31. So Samuel turned again after Saul: and Saul worshipped the Lord.

Saul is at length brought to put himself into the dress of a penitent; but it is too evident, that he excusing himself, of a penitent, and is not one indeed. Observe,

1. How poorly he expresses his repentance. It was with much ado that he was made sensible of his fault, and not till he was threatened with being deposed; that touched him in a tender part, then he began to relent, and not till then; when Samuel told him he was rejected from being king, then he said, I have sinned, v. 24. His confession was not from a pious and godly heart, but excited by the rack, and forced from him.

We observe here, several bad signs of the hypocrisy of his repentance, and that it came short even of Ahab's.

1. He made his application to Samuel only, and seemed most solicitous to stand right in his opinion, and to gain his favour. He makes a little god of him, only to preserve his reputation with the people, because they all knew Samuel to be a prophet, and the man that had been the instrument of his preferment. Thinking it would please Samuel, and be a sort of bribe to him, he puts it into his confession, I have transgressed the commandments of the Lord, and thy word; as if he had been in God's stead, v. 24. David, though convinced by the ministry of Nathan, yet in his confession, has his eye to God alone, not to Nathan; (Ps. 31. 4.) Against thee, only, have I sinned: but Saul, ignorantly enough, confesses his sin as a transgression of Samuel's word; whereas his word was no other than a declaration of the commandment of the Lord. He also applies to Samuel for forgiveness. (v. 25.) I pray thee, pardon my sin; as if any could forgive sin but God only. Those wretchedly deceive themselves, who when they are fallen into scabrous sin, think it enough to make their peace with the church and their ministers, by the show and plausible profession of repentance, without taking care to make their peace with God by the sincerity of it. The most charitable construction we can put upon this of Saul here, is, to suppose that he looked upon Samuel as a sort of mediator between him and God, and intended an address to God in his application to him: however it was very weak.

2. He excused his fault even in the confession of it, and that is never the fashion of a true penitent; (v. 24.) "I did it, because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice." We have reason enough to think that it was purely his own doing, and not the people's; however, if they were forward to do it, it is plain, by what we have read before, that he knew how to keep up his authority among them, and did not stand afraid of them. So Samuel, and frivolous, whatever he pretended, he did not really fear the people: but it is common for sinners, in excusing their faults, to plead the thoughts and workings of their own minds, those being things, which, how groundless soever, no man can disprove; but they forget that God searcheth the heart.

3. All his care was to save his credit, and preserve his interest in the people, lest they should revolt from him, or at least despise him; therefore he courts Samuel with so much earnestness (v. 25.) to turn again with him, and assist in a public thanksgiving for the victory; very importunate he was in this matter, as when he laid hold on the skirts of his mantle to detain him (v. 27.) Not that he cared for Samuel, but he feared if Samuel forsake him, the people would do so too. Many seem zealously affected to good ministers and good people, only for the sake of their own interest and reputation, while in heart they hate them. But his expression was very gross when he said, (v. 30.) I have sinned, yet honour me, I pray thee, before my people. Is this the language of a penitent? No, but the contrary; "I have sinned, and thou, me rather, too; and no man can laethe me so much as I laethe myself." Yet how often do we meet with the copies of this hypocrisy of Saul! It is very common for those who are convinced of sin, to show themselves very solicitous to be honoured before the people. Whereas he that has lost the honour of an innocent, can pretend to no other than that of a penitent, and it is the honour of a penitent to take shame to himself.

II. How little he got by these thin shows of repentance. What point did he gain by them?

1. Samuel repeated the sentence passed upon him, so far was he from giving him any hopes of the repeal of it, v. 26. The same with v. 25. He that covers his sins, shall never prosper, Prov. 28. 13. Samuel refused to turn back with him, but turned aside to go to the city, v. 27. He observed the impression he made upon the first view, he thought it altogether unfit for him so far to countenance one whom God had rejected, as to join with him in giving thanks to God for a victory, which he was made to serve rather Saul's covetousness than God's glory. Yet afterward he did turn again with him; (v. 31.) upon further thoughts, and, probably, by divine direction, either to prevent a mutiny among the people, or perhaps, not to detest the name of Saul, which is preserved for him. And so the Lord would not reject him, when he had been brought to offer sacrifice in his stead. (v. 32.) He is not said Samuel presided in that worship, but to do justice on Agag, v. 22.

2. He illustrated the sentence by a sign, which Saul himself, by his rudeness, gave occasion for. When Samuel was turning from him, he tore his clothes to detain him, (v. 27.) so loath was he to part with the prophet: but Samuel put a construction upon the act, which Saul did not; and, which he could do; he made it to signify the rending of the kingdom from him; (v. 28.) and that, like this, was his own doing. "He hath rent it from thee, and given it to a neighbour better than thou." namely, to David, who afterward, upon an occasion, cut off the skirt of Saul's robe, (ch. 24. 4.) upon which Saul said, (v. 20.) I know that thou shalt surely be king: perhaps remembering this sign, the tearing of the skirt, Saul's mantle. (v. 30.)

3. He ratified it by a solemn declaration of its being irreversible: v. 29. The Strength of Israel will not lie: The Eternity, or Victory of Israel, so some read it: The Holy One, so the Arabic: The most noble One, so the Syriac: the triumphant King of Israel, so Bishop Patrick: "He is determined to depose thee, and he will not change his purpose. He is not a man that he should repent. He is not a man that he should repent. Men are fickle and alter their minds, feeble and cannot effect their purposes; something happens which they could not foresee, by which their measures are broken; but with God it is not so. God has sometimes repented of the evil which he thought to have done, upon the sinner's repenting; but here repentance
32. Then said Samuel, Bring you hither to me Agag the king of the Amalekites: and Agag came unto him delicately. And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past.

33. And Samuel said, As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal.

34. Then Samuel went to Ramah; and Saul went up to his house to Gibeah of Saul. 35. And Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death: nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul: and the Lord repented that he had made Saul king over Israel.

Samuel, as a prophet, is here set over kings, Jer. 1. 10.

I. He destroys king Agag, doubtless, by such special direction from heaven, as none now can pretend to. He hewed Agag in pieces: some think he only ordered it to be done; or, perhaps he did it with his own hands, as a sacrifice to God's injured justice; v. 33, and sacrifices used to be cut in pieces. Now observe in this,

1. How Agag's present vain hopes were frustrated. He came delicately, in a stately manner, to show that he was a king, and therefore to be treated with respect; or, in a soft effeminate manner, as one never used to hardship, that could not set the sole of his foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy. Deut. 28. 56. to move compassion: and he said, "Surely, now that the heat of the battle is over, the bitterness of death is past," v. 32. Having escaped the sword of Saul, that man of war, he thought he was in no danger from Samuel, an old prophet, a man of peace. Note, (1.) There is bitterness in death, it is terrible to nature. Surely death is bitter, so divers versions read those words of Agag; as the Seventy read the former clause. He came trembling: death will dismay the stoutest heart. (2.) Many think the bitterness of death is past, when it is not so; they put that evil day far from them, which is very near. True believers may, through grace, say this, upon good grounds, though death be not past, the bitterness of it is, O death, where is thy sting?

2. How his former wicked practices were now punished. Samuel calls him to account, not only for the sins of his ancestors, but his own sins, Thy sword hath made women childless, v. 33. He trod in the steps of his ancestor's cruelty, and those under him, it is likely, did the same; justly therefore is all the righteous blood shed by Amalek, required of this generation, Matth. 23. 36. Agag, that was delicate and luxurious himself, was cruel and barbarous to others: we commonly see that those who are indulgent of their appetites, are not less indulgent of their passions. But blood will be reckoned for; even kings must account to the King of kings for the guiltless blood they shed; no cause to be shown was that crime of king Manasseh, which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kings 24. 4. See Rev. 13. 10.

II. He deserts king Saul; takes leave of him, v. 34. and never came any more to see him, v. 35. to advise or assist him in any of his affairs, because Saul did not desire his company, nor would he be advised by him. He looked upon him as rejected of God, and therefore he forsook him: though he might sometimes see him accidentally, as ch. 19. 24. yet he never came to see him out of kindness or respect. Yet he mourned for Saul, thinking it a very lamentable thing, that a man who stood so fair for great things, should ruin himself so foolishly. He mourned for the bad state of the country, to which Saul was 1 kely to have been so greatly blessing, but now would prove a curse and a plague. He mourned for his everlasting state, having no hopes of bringing him to repentance: when he wept for him, it is likely he made supplication, but the Lord had repented that he had made Saul king, and resolved to undo that work of his, so that Samuel's prayers prevailed not for him. Observe, We must mourn for the rejection of sinners, 1. Though we withdraw from them, and dare not converse familiarly with them. Thus the prophet determines to leave his people and go from them, and yet to keep day and night for them, Jer. 9. 1, 2. 2. Though they do not mourn for themselves, Saul seems unconcerned at the tokens of God's displeasure which he lay under, and yet Samuel mourns day and night for him. Jerusalem was secure when Christ wept over it.

CHAP. XVI.

At this chapter begins the story of David, one that makes as great a figure in the sacred story, as almost any of the worthies of the Old Testament; one that both with his sword and with his pen served the honour of God and the interests of Israel, as much as most ever did, and was as illustrous a type of Christ. Here, I. Samuel is appointed and commissioned to anoint a king among the sons of Jesse at Beth-lehem, v. 1. 5. II. All his elder sons are passed by, and David the youngest is pitched upon and anointed, v. 6. 13. III. Saul growing melancholy, David is pitched upon to relieve him by music, v. 14. 23. Thus small are the beginnings of that great man.

1. And the Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? fill thine horn with oil, and go; I will send thee to Jesse the Beth-lehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons. 2. And Samuel said, How can I go? if Saul hear it, he will kill me. And the Lord said, Take a heifer with thee, and say, I am come to sacrifice to the Lord. 3. And call Jesse to the sacrifice, and I will show thee what thou shalt do: and thou shalt anoint unto me him whom I name unto thee. 4. And Samuel did that which the Lord spake, and came to Beth-lehem: and the elders of the town trembled at his coming, and said, Comest thou peaceably? 5. And he said, Peaceably: I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord; sanctify yourselves, and come with me to the sacrifice. And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice.

Samuel was retired to his own house in Ramah, with a resolution not to appear any more in public business, but to add to himself wholly to the instructing and training up the sons of the prophets, over whom he presided, as we find, ch. 19. 20. He promised himself more satisfaction in young prophets than in young princes; and we do not find that, to his dying day, God called him out to any public action relating to the state, but only here to anoint David.
I. Samuel

I. God reproveth him for continuing so long to mourn for the rejection of Saul. He does not blame him for mourning on that occasion, but for exceeding in his sorrows.

2. How long wilt thou mourn for Saul? v. 1. We do not find that he mourned at all for the setting aside of his own family, and the despoiling of his own sons; but for the rejecting of Saul and his seed he mourns without measure. For the former was done by the people's foolish discontent, this by the righteous wrath of God. Yet he must find time to recover himself, and not go mourning to his grave. 1. Because God has rejected him, and he ought to acquiesce in the divine justice, and forget his affection to Saul; if God will be glorified in his ruin, Samuel ought to be satisfied. Besides, to what purpose should he weep? The decree is gone forth, and all his prayers and tears cannot prevail for the reversing of it, 2 Sam. 12. 22, 23. 2. Because Israel shall be no loser by it, and Samuel must prefer the public welfare before his own private affection to his friend. "Mourn not for Saul, for I have provided me a king." The people provided them a king and he proved bad, now I will provide me one, a man after my own heart. See Ps. 89. 20. If Saul and his sons be rejected, Israel shall not be as sheep having no shepherd; I have another in store for them, let thy joy of him swallow up thy grief for the rejected prince."

II. He sends him to Beth-lehem, to anoint one of the sons of Jesse, a person, probably, not unknown to Samuel. Fill thine horn with oil. Saul was anointed with a glass vial of oil, scanty and brittle, David with a horn of oil, which was more plentiful and durable; hence we read of a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David, Luke 1. 69.

III. Samuel objects the peril of going on this errand; (v. 2.) If Saul hear it he will kill me. By this it appears, I. That Saul was grown very wicked and outrageous since his rejection, else Samuel would not have mentioned this. What imperty would he not be guilty of, who durst kill Samuel? 2. That Samuel's faith was not so strong as one would have expected, else he had not thus feared the rage of Saul. Would not he that sent him, protect him and bear him out? But the best men are not perfect in their faith, nor will fear be wholly cast out any where on this side heaven. But this may be understood as Samuel's desire of direction from heaven how to manage this matter prudently, so as not to expose himself, or any other, more than necessary,

IV. God orders him to cover his design with a sacrifice. Say, I am come to sacrifice; and it was true he did, and it was proper that he should, when he came to anoint a king, ch. 11. 15. As a prophet, he might sacrifice when and where God appointed him; and it was not at all inconsistent with the laws of truth, to say, he came to sacrifice, when really he did so, though he had also a further end, which he thought fit to conceal. Let him give notice of a sacrifice too, (by his ἄντρο, who, here, is the principal man of the city,) and his family to come to the feast upon the sacrifice; and, says God, I will show thee what thou shalt do. Those that go about God's work in God's way, shall be directed step by step, wherever they are at a loss, to do it in the best manner.

V. Samuel went accordingly to Beth-lehem, not in person, or with any retainer, only a servant to lead the horn. Yet the elders of Beth-lehem trembled at his coming, fearing it was an indication of God's displeasure against them, and that he came to denounced judgment on the iniquities of the place; guilt causes fear. Yet indeed it becomes us to stand in awe of God's messengers, and to tremble at his word; or, they feared it might be an occasion of Saul's displeasure against them, for, probably, they knew how much he was exasperated at Samuel, and feared he would pick a quarrel with them for entertaining him. They asked him, "Comest thou peaceably? Art thou in peace thyself and not flying from Saul? Art thou at peace with us, and not come with any message of wrath?" We should all covet earnestly to stand upon good terms with God's prophets, and desire to hear the word of God, or their prayers, against us. When the Son of David was born King of the Jews, all Jerusalem was troubled, Matth. 2. 3. Samuel kept at home, and it was a strange thing to see him so far from his own house; they therefore concluded it must needs be some extraordinary occasion that brought him, and feared the worst till he satisfied them; (v. 5.) "I come peaceably, for I come to sacrifice, not to be a message of wrath between you and God, but with the methods of peace and reconciliation; and therefore you may bid me welcome, and need not fear my coming; therefore sanctify yourselves, and prepare to join with me in the sacrifice, that you may have the benefit of it." Note, Before solemn ordinances there must be a solemn preparation. When we are to offer spiritual sacrifices, it concerns us, first, to be in a state of peace with God, and with one another, as well as with the world, and renewing the dedication of ourselves to God, to sanctify ourselves. When our Lord Jesus came into the world, though men had reason enough to tremble, fearing that his errand was to condemn the world, yet he gave full assurance that he came peaceably, for he came to sacrifice, and he brought his offering along with him; a body hast thou prepared me; let us sanctify ourselves, that we may have an interest in his sacrifice." Samuel said, "I come peaceably, for I come to sacrifice." Note, Those that come to sacrifice, should come peaceably; religious exercises must not be performed tumultuously.

VI. He had a particular regard to Jesse and his sons, for with them his private business lay, with which it is likely, he acquaintance Jesse at his first coming, and took up his lodging at his house. He spoke to all the elders to sanctify themselves, but he sanctified Jesse, and his sons, by praying with them and instructing them. Perhaps he had acquaintance with them before, and it appears, ch. 20. 29. (where we read of the sacrifices that family had,) that it was a devout religious family. Samuel assisted them in their family preparations for the public sacrifice, and, it is probable, chose out David, and anointed him, at the family solemnities, before the sacrifice, yet was not the sacrifice offered till he was recognized. Perhaps he offered private sacrifices, like Job, according to the number of them all, (Job 1. 5.) and under colour of that, called for them all to appear before him. When signal blessings are coming into a family, they ought to sanctify themselves.

6. And it came to pass, when they were come, that he looked on Eliab, and said, Surely the Lord's anointed is before him. 7. But the Lord said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart. 8. Then Jesse called Abinadab, and made him pass before Samuel. And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this. 9. Then Jesse made Shammah to pass by. And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this. 10. Again, Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel. And Samuel said unto Jesse, The \textit{LORD} hath not chosen these. 11. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and, behold, he keepeth the sheep. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Send and fetch him: for we will not sit down till he come hither. 12. And he sent and brought him in. Now he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to. And the \textit{LORD} said, Arise, anoint him: for this is he. 13. Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren: and the Spirit of \textit{the L ORD} came upon David from that day forward. So Samuel rose up, and went to Ramah.

If the sons of Jesse were told that God would provide himself a king among them, as he had said, (v. 1.) we may well suppose they all made the best appearance they could; and each hoped he should be the man; but here we are told, They sent and brought him in, passed by, who stood fairest for the preferment. Eliab, the eldest, was privately presented first to Samuel, probably none being present but Jesse only, and Samuel thought he must needs be the man; (v. 6.) Surely this \textit{is the L ORD's} anointed. The prophets themselves, when they spake from under the divine direction, were as liable to mistake as other men; as Nathan, 2 Sam. 7, 9. But God rectified the prophet's mistake, by a secret messenger to his mind. (v. 7.) \textit{Look not on his countenance.} It was strange that Samuel, who had been so wretchedly disappointed in Saul, whose countenance and stature recommended him as much as any man's could, should be so forward to judge of a man by that rule. When God would please the people with a king, he chose a proper man, but when he would have one after his own heart, he should not be chosen by the outside; men judge by the sight of the eyes, but God does not; (Isa. 11. 3.) \textit{The L ORD looks on the heart; that is, 1. He knows it.} We can tell how men \\textit{look,} but he can tell what they \textit{are.} Man looks on the \textit{eyes,} so the original word is, and is pleased with the liveliness and sprightliness that appear in them; but God looks on the heart, and sees the thoughts and intents of that. 2. He judges of men by it. The good disposition of the heart, the holiness and goodness of that, recommend us to God, and are in \textit{his sight of great price.} (1 Pet. 3, 4.) not the majesty of the \textit{look,} or the strength and stature of the body; let us reckon that to be true beauty which is within, and judge of men, as far as we are capable, by their minds, not their \\textit{mien}. When Eliab was set aside, Abinadab and Shammah, and, after them, four more of the sons of Jesse, seven in all, were presented to Samuel, as likely for his purpose; but Samuel, who now attended more carefully than he did at first to the divine direction, laid them all by, \textit{The L ORD hath not chosen these.} v. 8--10. Men dispose of their honours and estates to their sons, according to their seniority of age, and priority of birth, but God does not. \textit{The elder shall serve the younger.} Had it been left to Samuel, or Jesse, to make the choice, one of these had certainly been chosen; but God will magnify his sovereignty in passing by some that were most promising, as well as in fastening on others that were less so.

II. How David at length was pitched upon. He was the youngest of all the sons of Jesse; his name signifies \textit{beloved,} for he was a type of the beloved Son. Observe, 1. How he was now employed. He was in the fields, \textit{keeping the sheepr.} (v. 11.) and was left there, though there was a sacrifice and a feast at his father's house. The youngest are commonly the fondlings of the family, but, it should seem, David was least set by of all the sons of Jesse; either they did not discern, or did not duly value, the excellent gift. Many are of such a great genius, buried in obscurity and contempt, that it is those whom men despise, and gives abundant honour to that part which lacked. The son of David was he whom men despised, the stone which the builders refused, and yet has a name above every name. David was taken from following the ewes, to feed Jacob, (Ps. 78, 71.) as Moses from keeping the flock of Jethro; an instance of his humility and industry, both of which God delights to put honor upon. We should think a military life, but God saw a pastoral life, (which gives advantage for contemplation and communion with heaven,) the best preparative for kingly power, at least for those graces of the Spirit, which are necessary to the due discharge of that trust which attends it. David was keeping sheep, though it was a time of sacrifice; for there is mercy that takes place of sacrifice.

2. How he was presented to Samuel. "We will not sit down to meat," (perhaps it was not the feast upon the sacrifice, but a common meal,) "till he come hither: for if all the rest be rejected, this must be he." He that was designed not to sit at table at all, is now stayed for as the principal guest. If God will exalt them of low degree, who can hinder?

3. What appearance he made when he did come. Notice was taken of his clothing; no doubt that was according to his employment, mean and coarse, as shepherds' costs commonly are, and he did not change his clothes as Joseph did; (Gen. 41. 14.) but he had a very honest look, not stately, as Sam's, but sweet and lovely, he was ruddy, of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to, (v. 12.) that is, he had a clear complexion, a good eye, and a lovely face; the features extraordinary, and something in his looks that was very charming. Though he was so far from using any art to help his beauty, that his employment exposed it to the sun and wind, yet nature kept its own, and, by the sweetness of his aspect, gave manifest indications of an amiable temper and disposition of mind. Perhaps his modest blush, when he was brought before Samuel, and received by him with surprising respect, made him look much the handsomer.

4. The anointing of him. The Lord told Samuel in his car, (as he had done, ch. 9, 15.) that this was he whom he must anoint, v. 12. Samuel objects not to the meanness of his education, his youth, or the little respect he had in his own family, but, in obedience to the divine command, took his horn of oil, and anointed him, (v. 13.) signifying thereby,

(1.) A divine designation to the government, after the death of Saul, of which here he gave him a full assurance. Not that he was at present invested with the royal power, but it was entailed upon him, to come to him in due time. (2.) A divine communication of gifts and graces, to fit him for the government, and to make him a type of him who was to be the Messiah, the anointed One, who received the spirit, not by measure, but \textit{without measure.} He is said to be anointed in the midst of his brethren, who yet, possibly, did not understand it as a designation to the government, and therefore did not envy David, as Joseph's brethren did him; because they saw no further marks of dignity put upon him, no, not so much as a coat of divers colours. But Bishop Patrick reads it, \textit{He anointed him from the} midst of his brethren, that is, he singled him out from the rest, and privately anointed him, but with a charge to keep his own counsel, and not to let his own brethren know it, as by what we find (ch. 17. 28.) it should seem, Eliab did not. It is computed that David was now about twenty years old; if so, his troubles by Saul lasted ten years, for he was thirty years old when Saul died. Dr. Lightfoot reckons him to be about twenty-five, and that his troubles lasted but five years.

5. The happy effects of this anointing, the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward, v. 13. The anointing him was not an empty ceremony, but a divine power went along with that instituted sign, and he found himself immediately advanced in wisdom and courage, and decorous for the public, with all the qualifications of a prince, though not at all advanced in his outward circumstances. This would abundantly satisfy him that his election was of God. The best evidence of our being predestinated to the kingdom of glory, is, our being sealed with the Spirit of promise, and our experience of a work of grace in our hearts. Some think that his courage, by which he slew the lion and the bear, and his extraordinary skill in music, were the effects and evidences of the Spirit's coming upon him. However, this made him the sweet psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. 23. 1. Samuel, having done this, went to Ramah in safety, and we never read of him again but once, (ch. 19. 18.) till we read of his death; now he retired to die in peace, since his eyes had seen the salvation, even the sceptre brought into the tribe of Judah.

14. But the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him. 15. And Saul's servants said unto him, Behold now, an evil spirit from God troubleth thee. 16. Let our lord now command thy servants, which are before thee, to seek out a man who is a cunning player on a harp: and it shall come to pass, when the evil spirit from God is upon thee, that he shall play with his hand, and thou shalt be well. 17. And Saul said unto his servants, Provide me now a man that can play well, and bring him to me. 18. Then answered one of the servants, and said, Behold, I have seen a son of Jesse the Beth-lehemite, that is cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the Lord is with him. 19. Wherefore Saul sent messengers unto Jesse, and said, Send me David thy son, which is with the sheep. 20. And Jesse took an ass laden with bread, and a bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them by David his son unto Saul. 21. And David came to Saul, and stood before him: and he loved him greatly; and he became his armour-bearer. 22. And Saul sent to Jesse, saying, Let David, I pray thee, stand before me; for he hath found favour in my sight. 23. And it came to pass, when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took a harp, and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him.

We have here Saul falling, and David rising.

I. Here is Saul made a terror to himself; (v. 14.) The Spirit of the Lord departed from him. He having forsaken God and his duty, God, in a way of righteous judgment, withdrew from him those assistances of the good Spirit with which he was directed, animated, and encouraged in his government and wars. He lost all his good qualities. This was the effect of his rejecting God, and an evidence of his being rejected by him. Now God took his mercy from Saul, (as it is expressed, 2 Sam. 7. 15.) for when the Spirit of God was withdrawn from him, all good goes. When men grieve and quench the Spirit, by wilful sin, he departs, and will not always strive. The consequence of this was, that an evil spirit from God troubled him. They that drive the good Spirit away from them, do of course become a prey to the evil spirit. If God and his grace do not rule us, sin and Satan will have possession of us. The Devil, by the divine permission, troubled and terrified Saul, by means of the corrupt humour of his body, and passions of his mind. He grew fretful, and peevish, and discontented; timorous and suspicious, ever and anon starting and trembling; he was sometimes, says Josephus, as if he had been chocked or strangled, and a perfect demoniac by fits. This made him unfit for business, precipitate in his counsels, the contempt of his enemies, and a barthen to all about him.

II. Here is David made a physician to Saul, and by that means brought to court; a physician that helped him against the worst of diseases, when none else could. David was newly anointed privately to the kingdom; it would be of use to him to go to court, and see the world: it is here brought about for him, without any contrivance of his own or his friends. Note, Those whom God designs for any service, his providence shall concur with his grace to prepare and qualify them for it.

Saul is disannointed; his servants have the honesty and courage to tell him what his distemper was; (v. 15.) An evil spirit, not by chance, but from God, and his providence, troubled thee. Now,

1. The means they all advise him to for his relief, was, music; (v. 16.) Let us have a cunning player on a harp, and David to attend his sound. His better friends had been to him, if they had advised him, since the evil spirit was from the Lord, to give all diligence to make his peace with God by true repentance, to send for Samuel to pray with him, and to intercede with God for him; then might he not only have had some present relief, but the good spirit would have returned to him. But their project is to make him merry, and so cure him. Many whose consciences are convinced and startled, are for ever ruined by such methods as these, which drown all care of the soul in the delights of sense. Yet Saul's servants did not amiss to send for music, as a help to cheer up the spirits, if they had but withal sent for a prophet to give him good counsel. And (as Bishop Hall observes) it was well they did not send for a witch or diviner, by his enchantments to cast out the evil spirit. Some demoniacal wicked practice of some that have worn the christian name, who consult the Devil in their distresses, and make hell their refuge. It will be no less a miracle of divine grace, if these who thus agree with Satan, ever break off from him again.

2. One of his servants recommended David to him, as a fit person to be employed in the use of these means, little imagining that he was the man whom Samuel meant, when he told Saul, a neighbour of his, better than he, should have the King-
1. And therefore matters, designed is therefore sent court or allayed ed Saul's before brought to Providence the mind, and cunning in playing, but a man of courage and conduct, a mighty valiant man, and prudent in matters, fit to be further preferred, and (which crowned his character) the Lord is with him. By this it appears, that though David, after he was anointed, returned to his country-business, and there remained on his head no marks of the oil, so careful was he to keep that secret, yet the workings of the Providence of the oil, could not be hid; and so made him shine in obscurity, so that all his neighbours observed with wonder the great improvements of his mind on a sudden. David, even in his shepherd's garb, is become an oracle, a champion, and every thing that is great. His fame reached the court soon, for Saul was inquisitive after such young men, ch. 14. 52. When the Spirit of God comes upon a man, he will make his face to shine.

3. David is hereupon sent for to court. And it seems,

(1.) His father was very willing to part with him, sent him very readily, and a present with him to Saul; (v. 20.) the present was, according to the usage of those times, bread and wine, (compare ch. 10. 3, 4.) therefore acceptable, because expressive of the homage and allegiance of him that sent. Probably, it was, who knew what his son David was, designed far, was aware that Providence was here-in fitting him for it, and therefore he would not force Providence by sending him to court uncalled, yet he followed Providence very cheerfully, when he saw it plainly putting him in the way of preference. Some suggest, that when Jesse received that message, Send me David thy son, he began to be afraid that Saul had got some intimation of his being anointed, and determined to drive him from his asylum; therefore Jesse sent a present to pacify him; but it is probable, that the person, whoever he was, that brought the message, gave him an account on what design he was sent for.

(2.) Saul became very kind to him, (v. 21.) loved him greatly, and designed to make him his armour bearer, and (contrary to the manner of the king, ch. 8. 11.) got his father's leave to keep him in his service. (v. 22.) Let David, I pray thee, stand before me. And good reason he had to respect him, for he did him a great deal of service with his music, v. 23. His instrumental music with his harp is the only kind mentioned, but it should seem by the account Josephus gives of it, that he added vocal music to it, and sung hymns, probably divine hymns, songs of praise, to his harp. David's music was Saul's physic. [1.] Music has a natural tendency to compose and exhilarate the mind, when it is disturbed and saddened. Elishua used it for the calming of his spirits, 2 Kings 3. 15. On some it has a greater influence and effect than on others, and, probably, Saul was one of those. Not that it charmed the evil spirit, but it made his spirit sedate, and allayed those tumults of the animal spirits, by which the Devil had advantage against him. The beams of the sun (it is the learned Rocharp's comparison cannot be cut with a sword, quenched with water, or blown out with wind, but, by closing the window-shutters, they may be kept out of the chamber. Music cannot work upon the Devil, but it may shut up the passages by which he had access to the mind.

[2.] David's music was extraordinary, and in mercy to him, that he might gain a reputation at court, as one that had the Lord with him. God made his performance in music more successful, in this case, than that of others would have been. Saul found, even after he had conceived an enmity to David, that no one else could do him the same service, (ch. 19. 9, 10.) which was a great aggravation of his outrage against him. It is pity that music, which may be so serviceable to the good temper of the mind, should ever be used. We are to the sun of vanity and luxury, and made an occasion of drawing the heart away from God and serious things; if that be to any the effect of it, it drives away the good Spirit, not the evil Spirit.

CHAP. XVII.

David is the man whom God now delights to honour, for he is a man after his own heart. We read in this chapter, how Providence made him famous in the court; we read in this chapter, how Providence made him much more famous in the camp, and, by both means, fitted him for the throne to which he was designated. In the court he was only Saul's physician, but in the camp, Israel's champion, there he fairly fought, and beat Goliath of Gath. In the story observe, I. What a figure Goliath made, and how daringly he challenged the armies of Israel, v. 1.-11. II. What a mean figure David made, when Providence brought him to the army, v. 12.-30. III. The unparalleled bravery wherewith David undertook to encounter this Philistine, v. 31.-39. IV. The pious resolution with which he attacked him, v. 40.-47. V. The glorious victory he obtained over him with a sling and a stone, and the advantage which the Israelites therein took, v. 48.-51. VI. The great notice which was hereupon taken of David at court, v. 55. 58.

1. NOW the Philistines gathered together their armies to battle, and were gathered together at Shochoh, which belongeth to Judah, and pitched between Shochoh and Azekah, in Ephesdamim. 2. And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by the valley of Elah, and set the battle in array against the Philistines.

3. And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and Israel stood on a mountain on the other side: and there was a valley between them. 4. And there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath, of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span. 5. And he had a helmet of brass upon his head, and he was armed with a coat of mail; and the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass. 6. And he had greaves of brass upon his legs, and a target of brass between his shoulders. 7. And the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam, and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron: and one bearing a shield went before him. 8. And he stood and cried unto the armies of Israel, and said unto them, Why are ye come out to set your battle in array? Am not I a Philistine, and you servants to Saul? choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. 9. If he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants: but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us. 10. And the Philistine said, I defy the armies of Israel this day: give me a man, that we may fight together. 11. When Saul and all Israel heard those words of the
I. SAMUEL, XVII.

Philistine, they were dismayed, and greatly afraid.

It was not long ago that the Philistines were soundly beaten, and put to the worse, before Israel, and would have been totally routed, if Saul's rashness had not prevented; but here we have them making head again. Observe,

1. How they defied Israel with their armies, v. 1. They made a descent upon the Israelites' country, and possessed themselves, as it should seem, of some part of it, for they encamped in a place which be-longed to Judah. Israel's ground had never been footing for Philistine armies, if Israel had been faithful to their God. The Philistines (it is probable) had heard that Samuel had fallen out with Saul, and for this reason, and because he had continued to make this attempt for the retrieving of the credit they had lately lost. The enemies of the church are watchful to take all advantages, and they never have greater advantages, than when her protectors have provoked God's Spirit and prophets to leave them. Saul mustered his forces, and faced them, v. 2, 3. And now we must take notice, 1. That evil spirit, for the present, had left Saul, ch. 16. 23. David's harp having given him some relief, perhaps, the alarms and affairs of the war prevented the return of the distemper. Business is a good antidote against melancholy. Let the mind have something without to fasten on, and employ itself about, and it will be less in danger of prey ing upon itself. God, in mercy to Israel, suspended the judgment if a while; for how distracted must the affairs of the public have been, if, at this juncture, the prince had been distracted? 2. That David, for the present, was returned to Beth-lehem, and had left the court, v. 15. When Saul had no further occasion to use him for the relief of his distemper, though, being anointed, he had a very good private reason, and, having a grant of the place of Saul's armour-bearer, he had a very plausible pretence to have continued his attendance, as a retainee to the court, yet he went home to Beth-lehem, and returned to keep his father's sheep; this was a rare instance, in a young man that stood so fair for preferment, of humility, and affection to his parents. He knew better than most do, how to come down again after he had begun to rise, and strangely preferred the retirements of a pastoral life before all the pleasures and gaieties of the court. None more fit for honour than he, nor that deserved it better, and yet none more desirous of it.

II. How they defied Israel with their champion Goliath, whom they took as proud of, as he was of himself, hoping by him to recover their reputation and dominion. Perhaps the army of the Israelites was superior in number and strength to that of the Philistines, which made the Philistines determine a battle, and stand by with their design rather to put the issue upon a single combat, in which, having such a champion, they hoped to gain the victory. Now concerning this champion, ob serve,

1. His prodigious size. He was the son of the sons of Anak, who at Gath kept their ground in Joshua's time, (Josh. 11. 22.) and kept up a race of giants there, of which Goliath was the head, and it is apparent, by the proportions of the largest. He was in height six cubits and a span, v. 4. The learned bishop Cumberland has made it out, that the scripture cubit was above twenty-one inches, (above three inches more than our half-yard,) and a span was half a cubit, by which computation, Goliath wanted but eight inches of four yards in height, eleven feet and four inches.

es. A monstrous stature, and which made him very formidable, especially if he had strength and spirit proportionable.

2. His armour; art, as well as nature, made him terrible. He was well furnished with defensive armours, v. 5, 6. A helmet of brass on his head, a coat of mail, made of brass plates laid over one another, like the scales of a fish; and because his legs would not bear him upon the back of an ordinary man, he wore brass boots, and a large corselet of brass about his neck. The coat is said to weigh five thousand shekels, and a shekel was half an ounce avoirdupois. A vast weight for a man to carry, all the other parts of his armour being proportionable. But some think it should be translated, not the weight of the coat, but the value of it, was five thousand shekels; so much it cost. This defensive armour was all upon the precedent, of which the description only is here described, v. 7. It was like a weaver's beam; his arm could manage that, which an ordinary man could scarcely heave. His shield only, which was the lightest of all his accoutrements, was carried before him by his esquire, probably, for state; for he that was clad in brass, little needed a shield.

3. His challenge. The Philistines having chosen him for their champion, to save themselves from the hazard of a battle, he here throws down the gauntlet, and bids defiance to the armies of Israel, v. 8-10. He came into the valley that lay between the camps, and his voice, probably, being as much stronger than other people's as his arm was, he cried so as to make them all hear him. Give me a man, that we may fight together. He looks upon himself with admiration, because he was so much taller and ponderous than all about him; his heart (says Bishop Hall) nothing but a lump of proud flesh. He looks upon Israel with disdain, because they had none among them of such a monstrous bulk, and defies them to find a man among them, bold enough to enter the lists with him. (1.) He upbraids them with their folly in drawing an army together, "Why are ye come to set the battle in array? How dare you oppose the mighty Philistines?" Or, "Why should the two armies engage, when the controversy may be sooner decided, with only the expense of one life, and the hazard of another?" (2.) He offers to put the war entirely upon the issue of the duel he proposes; "If your champion kills me, we will be your servants; if I kill him, you shall be our." This (says Bishop Patrick) was only a bravado, for no nation would be willing thus to venture its fate and its army, when there was a single man who was incapable; notwithstanding Goliath's stipulation here, when he was killed, the Philistines did not stand to his word, nor submit themselves servants to Israel. When he boasts, I am a Philistine, and you servants to Saul, he would have it thought a great piece of condescension in him, who was a chief ruler, to enter the lists with an Israelite; for he looked on them as no better than slaves. The Chaldee paraphrase brings him in, boasting that he was just such a man, that had killed Hophni and Phinehas, and taken the ark prisoner; but that the Philistines had never given him so much as the command of a regiment in recompense of his services, whereas Saul had been made king for his services: "Let him therefore take up the challenge." 4. The terror this struck upon Israel; (v. 11.) Saul and all Israel were greatly afraid. The people would not have been dismayed, but that they observed Saul's courage failed him; and it is not to be expected, that if the leader be a coward, the followers should be bold. We found before, when the spirit of the Lord came upon Saul, (ch. 11. 6.) none could be more daring, more forward, to answer the challenge of Nahash the Ammonite; but now that the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him,

even the big looks and big words of a single Philis-tine made him change colour. But where was Jonathan all this while? Why did he not accept the challenge, who, in the late war, had so bravely engaged a whole army of Philistines? Doubtless, he felt not himself stirred up of God to it, as he did then. As the best, so the bravest men, are no more than what God makes them. Jonathan must now sit still, because the honour of engaging Goliath is reserved for David. In great and good actions, the wind of the Spirit blows when and where he listeth.

Now the pious Israelites lament their king’s breach with Samuel.

12. Now David was the son of that Ephrahite of Bethlehem-Judah, whose name was Jesse; and he had eight sons: and the man went among men for an old man in the days of Saul. 13. And the three eldest sons of Jesse went and followed Saul to the battle: and the names of his three sons that got to the battle were Eliab the first-born; and next unto him, Abinadab; and the third, Shammah. 14. And David was the youngest: and the three eldest followed Saul. 15. But David went and returned from Saul to feed his father’s sheep at Bethlehem. 16. And the Philistine drew near morning and evening, and presented himself forty days. 17. And Jesse said unto David his son, Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and run to the camp to thy brethren: 18.
And carry these ten cheeses unto the captain of their thousand, and look how thy brethren fare, and take their pledge. 19.
Now Saul, and they, and all the men of Israel, were in the valley of Elah, fighting with the Philistines. 20. And David rose up early in the morning, and left the sheep with a keeper, and took, and went, as Jesse had commanded him: and he came to the trench as the host was going forth to the fight, and shouted for the battle. 21. For Israel and the Philistines had put the battle in array, army against army. 22. And David left his carriage in the hand of the keeper of the carriage, and ran into the army, and came and saluted his brethren. 23.
And as he talked with them, behold, there came up the champion, (the Philistine of Gath, Goliath by name,) out of the armies of the Philistines, and spake according to the same words: and David heard them.
24. And all the men of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from him, and were sore afraid. 25. And the men of Israel said, Have ye seen this man that is come up?
surely to defy Israel is he come up: and it shall be, that the man who killeth him, the knight will enrich him with great riches, and will give him his daughter, and make his father’s house free in Israel. 26. And David spoke to the men that stood by him, saying,

What shall be done to the man that killeth this Philistine, and taketh away the reproach from Israel? for who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should defy the armies of the living God? 27. And the people answered him after this manner, saying, So shall it be done to the man that killeth him.
28. And Eliab, his eldest brother, heard when he spake unto the men; and Eliab’s anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why camest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art cometh down to see the battle. 29. And David said, What have I now done? Is there not a cause?
30. And he turned from him toward another, and spoke after the same manner: and the people answered him again after the former manner.

Forty days the two armies lay encamped facing one another, each advantageously posted; but neither forward to engage. Either they were parley-ing, and treating of an accommodation, or waiting for recruits; and perhaps there were frequent skirmishes between small detached parties. All this while, twice a day, morning and evening, did the insulting champion appear in the field, and repeat his challenge; his own heart growing more and more proud for his not being answered, and the people of Israel more and more timorous; while God designed hereby to ripen him for destruction, and to make Israel’s deliverance the more illusrious. All this while, David is keeping his father’s sheep, but at the end of forty days, Providence brings him to the field, to win and wear the laurel, which no other Israelite dares venture for.

We have in these verses,

I. The present state of his family. His father was old, v. 12, he went among men for an old man, was taken notice of for his great age, above what was usual at that time, and therefore was excused from public services, and went not in person to the wars, but sent his sons; he had the honours paid him that were due to his age, his hoary head was a crown of glory to him. David’s three elder brethren, who perhaps envied his place at the court, got their father to send him home, and let them go to the camp, where they hoped to signalize themsewes, and eclipse him; (v. 13, 14.) while David himself was in far from being on public services, he had done his prince, or ambitious of further preference, that he not only returned from court to the obscurity of his father’s house, but to the care, and toil, and (as it proved, v. 34.) the peril of keeping his father’s sheep. It was the praise of this humility, that it came after he had the honour of a courtier; and the reward of it, that it came before the honour of a courtier; before honour is humility.
Now he had that opportunity of meditation and prayer, and other acts of devotion, which fitted him for what he was destined to, more than all the military exercises of that inglorious camp could do.

II. The orders his father gave him to go visit his brothers in the camp. He did not himself ask leave to go, to satisfy his curiosity, or to gain experience and make observations; but his father sent him on a mean and homely errand, which any of his servants might have done. He must carry some bread and cheese to his brethren, ten loaves with some parched corn for themselves, (v. 17.) and ten cheeses, which it seems, he thought too good for them, but might be acceptable as a present to their colonel, v. 18. David must still be the drudge of the family, though he was to be the greatest ornament of it. He had not so much as an ass, at command, to carry his load, but must take it on his back, and yet run to the camp. Jesse, we thought, was privy to his being anointed, and yet industriously kept him thus mean and obscure, probably, to hide him from the eye of suspicion and envy, knowing that he was anointed to a crown in reversion. He must observe how his brethren fared, whether they were not reduced to short allowance, now that the encampment continued so long, that, if need were, he might send them more provisions. And he must take their pledge, that is, if they had pawned any thing, he must redeem it; take notice of their company, so some observe, whom they associate with, and what sort of life they lead; perhaps David, like Joseph, had formerly brought to his father their evil report, and now he sends him to inquire concerning their manners. See the care of pious parents about their children when they are abroad from them, especially in places of temptation; they are solicitous how they conduct themselves, and particularly what company they keep. Let the children of the virtuous receive accordingly, remembering, that, when they are from under their parents' eye, they are still under God's eye.

III. David's dutiful obedience to his father's command. His prudence and care made him be up early, v. 20, and yet not to leave his sheep without a keeper, so faithful was he in a few things, and therefore the fitter to be made ruler over many things. Though, it seems, he thought too good for them, he pretended to command. God's providence brought him to the camp very seasonably, when both sides had set the battle in array, and, as it should seem, were more likely to come to an engagement than they had yet been, all the forty days, v. 21. Both sides were now preparing to fight. Jesse little thought of sending his son to the army, just at this critical hour; nor was it then wise, in the circumstances of actions and affairs, so as to serve his designs of securing the interests of Israel, and advancing the man after his own heart. Now observe here,

1. How brisk and lively David was, v. 22. Whatever articles he brought, he honestly took care of, and left them with those that had the charge of the bag and baggage; but though he had come a long journey with a great load, he ran into the army, to see what was doing there, and to pay his respects to his brethren. Seeest thou a man thus diligent in his business? He is in the way of preferment, he shall stand before kings.

2. How bold and daring the Philistine was, v. 23. Now that the armies were drawn out into a line of battle, he appeared first to renew his challenge, vainly imagining that he was in the eager chase of his own glory and triumph, whereas really he was but courting his own destruction.

3. How timorous and faint-hearted the men of Israel were. Though they had, for forty days together, been used to his haughty looks and threatening language, and, having seen no execution done by either, might have learned to despise both; yet, upon his approach, they fled from him and were sore afraid, v. 24. One Philistine could never thus have chased a thousand Israelites, and put ten thousand to flight, unless their Rock, being treacherously forsaken by them, had justly sold them and shut them up, Deut. 32. 30.

4. How high Saul bid for a champion. Though he was the tallest of all the men of Israel, and, if he had not been so, while he kept close to God, might himself have taken up the gauntlet which the insolent Philistine threw down, Jethro the priest of the Lord being departed from him, he durst not do it, nor press Jonathan to do it: but whoever will do it, shall have as good pre furnish as he can give him, v. 25. If the hope of wealth and honour will prevail with any man to expose himself so far, as it is proclaimed, that the bold adventurer, if he come hither shall marry the king's daughter, and have a good portion with her, but he, the son of that woman, whether he come off or no, his father's house shall be free in Israel, from all toll, tribute, custom, and services to the crown; or shall be ennobled, and advanced to the peersage.

5. How much concerned David was to assert the honour of God and Israel against the impudent challenges of this champion. He asked what reward was promised to him that should slay this Philistine, v. 26. Though he knew already; not because he was ambitious of the honours, but because he would have it taken notice of, and reported to Saul, how much he resented the indignity hereby done to Israel and Israel's God. He might have presumed so far upon his acquaintance and interest at court, as to have gone himself to Saul to offer his service; but his modesty would not let him so presume. But he would be content to be one of his son's proverbs, Not put forth thyself in the presence of the king, and stand not in the place of great men; (Prov. 25. 6.) yet his zeal put him upon that method which, he hoped, would bring him into this great engagement. Two considerations, it seems, fired David with a holy indignation. (1.) That the challenger was one that was uncircumcised, a stranger to God, and out of covenant with him. (2.) That the man thus coming against the living God devoted to him, employed by him and for him, so that the affronts done to them, reflected upon the living God himself, and that he cannot bear. When therefore some had told him, what was the reward proposed for killing the Philistine, (v. 27.) he asked others, (v. 30.) with the same resentment, which he expected would at length come to Saul's ear.

6. How he was humbled, and discouraged by his elder brother Eliab, who, taking notice of his forwardness, fell into a passion upon it, and gave David very abusive language, v. 28. Consider it,

(1.) As the fruit of Eliab's jealousy. He was the eldest brother and David the youngest; and, perhaps, it had been customary with him (as it is with too many elder brothers) to trample upon him, and take every occasion to chide him. But those who thus exalt themselves over the younger, perhaps live to see themselves, by a righteous providence, abased, and those whom they were abusive to, exalted. Time may come when the elder may serve the younger. But Eliab was now vexed that his younger brother should speak these bold words against the Philistine which he himself durst not say. He knew what honour David had had already in the court, and if he could only conduct himself well in the camp, (from which he thought he had found means effectually to seclude him, v. 15.) the glory of his elder brother would be eclipsed and stained; and therefore, (such is the nature of jealousy,) he would rather that Goliath should triumph over Israel, than that David should be the man that should triumph over him. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous, but who can stand before envy, especially the envy of a brother, which Jonathan, the son of Joseph, and David here, experienced the keenness of? See Prov. 18. 19. It is very ill-favoured language that Eliab here gives him; not only unjust and unkind, but, at this time, basely ungrateful; for David was now sent by his father, as Joseph by his, on a kind visit to his brethren. Eliab intended, in what he said, not only to grieve and discourage David himself, and quench that noble fire which he perceived glowing in his breast, but to represent him to those about him as an idle proud lad, not fit to be taken notice of. He gives them to understand that his business was only to keep sheep, and falsely insinuates that he was a careless, unfaithful, shepherd; though he had left his charge in good hands, v. 20, yet he must tauntingly be asked, with whom hast thou left those few sheep? Though he came down now to the camp in obedience to his father and Kindness to his brethren, and Eliab knew it, yet this is turned to his reproach; "Thou art come down, not to do any service, but to gratify thy rash and envious passions, and to look about thyself, and from thence he will infer the pride and naughtiness of his heart, and pretends to know it as certainly as if he were in his bosom. David could appeal to God concerning his humility and sincerity, (Ps. 17. 3-15.) and at this time gave proofs of both, and yet could not escape this hard character from his own brother. See the folly, absurdity, and wickedness, of his proud and envious passion; how groundless its jealousies and suspicions are, how unfit its characters, how injurious its representations, how bitter its invectives, and how indecent its language. God, by his grace, keep us from such a spirit! (2.) As a trial of David's meekness, patience, and constancy; a short trial it was, and he approved himself well in it: for, [1.] He bore the provocation with admirable temper; v. 29. What have I now done? What fault have I committed, for which I should thus be chidden? Is there not a cause for me coming to the camp, when my father sent me? Is there not a cause, for my resenting the injury done to Israel's honour by Goliath's challenge? He had right and reason on his side, and knew it, and therefore did not render railing for railing, but with a soft answer turned away his brother's wrath. This conquest of his own passion was, in some respects, more honourable than that of Goliath. He that hath rule over his own spirit, is better than the mighty. It was no time for David to quarrel with his brother, when the Philistines were upon them. The more threatening the church's enemies are, the more forbearing her friends should be with one another. [2.] He broke through the discouragement with admirable resolution. He would not be driven off from his thoughts of engaging the Philistines by the ill-will of his brother. Those that undertake great and public services, must not think it strange if they be discomfited and opposed by those from whom they had reason to expect support and assistance; but must humbly go on with their work, in the face not only of their enemies' threats, but of their friends' slights and suspicions.

31. And when the words were heard which David spake, they rehearsed them before Saul; and he sent for him. 32. And David said to Saul, Let no man's heart fail because of him: thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine. 33. And Saul said to David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth. 34. And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion, and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock; 35. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth: and when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard, and smote him, and slew him. 36. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear; and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God. 37. David said, moreover, The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. And Saul said unto David, Go, and the Lord be with thee. 38. And Saul armed David with his armour, and he put a helmet of brass upon his head; also he armed him with a coat of mail. 39. And David girded his sword upon his armour, and he assayed to go; for he had not proved it. And David said unto Saul, I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them. And David put them off him.

David is at length presented to Saul for his champion, (v. 31.) and he bravely undertakes to fight the Philistine; (v. 32.) Let no man's heart fail because of him: it would have reflected too much upon the valour of his prince, if he had said, Let not thy heart fail; therefore he speaks generally, Let no man's heart fail. A little shepherd, come but this morning from keeping sheep, has more courage than all the mighty men of Israel, and encourages them. Thus does God often send good words to his Israel, and do great things for them, by the weak and foolish things of the world. David only desires a commission from Saul to go and fight with the Philistine, but says nothing to him of the reward he had proposed, because that was not the thing he was ambitious of, but only the honour of serving God and his country, nor would he seem to question Saul's generosity.

Two things David had to do with Saul; I. To get clear of the objection Saul made against his undertaking. "Alas," says Saul, "thou hast a good heart to it, but art by no means an equal match for this Philistine: to engage with him is to throw away a life which may better be reserved for more agreeable services: thou art but a youth, rash and inconsiderate, weak and unversed in arms; he is a man that hath the head and hand of a man, a sword of war, trained up and inured to it from his youth, (v. 33.) and how canst thou expect but that he will be too hard for thee?"

David, as he had answered his brother's passion with meekness, so he answered Saul's fear with faith, and gives a reason of the hope which was in him, that he should conquer the Philistine to the satisfaction of Saul. We have reason to fear that Saul had not been acquainted with, or regard to, the word of God, and therefore David, in reasoning with him, fetched not his arguments and encouragements from thence, how much soever he had an eye to that in his own mind: but he argues from experience; though he was but a youth, and never in the wars, yet perhaps he had done as much as the killing of Goliath came to; for he had had, by divine assistance, spirit enough to encounter, and strength enough to subdue, a lion once, and another time a bear, that robbed him of his lambs: (v. 34-36.) to these he compares this uncircumcised Philistine, looks upon him as much a ravenous beast as either of them, and therefore doubts not but to deal as easily with him; and hereby gives Saul to understand... stand, that he was not so unex-erienced in hazard-ous conflicts, as he took him to be.

1. He tells his story like a man of spirit; he is not ashamed of the attack on his father's sheep, which his brother had just now upbraided him with; so far is he from concealing it, that from his employment as a shepherd, he fetches the experience that now animated him. But he lets those about him know that he was no ordinary shepherd. Whatever our profession or calling is, be it ever so mean, we should labour to excel in it, and do the business of it in the best manner.

2. (1.) He approved himself very careful and tender of his flock, though it was not his own, but his father's. He could not see a lamb in distress but he would venture his life to rescue it. This temper made him fit to be a king, to whom the lives of his subjects should be dear, and their blood precious, (Ps. 72. 14,) and fit to be a type of Christ the good Shepherd, who gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom, (Isa. 40. 11,) and who not only ventured, but laid down his life for the sheep. Thus too was David fit to be an example to ministers, with the utmost care and diligence to watch for souls, that they be not a prey to the roaring lion. (2.) He approved himself very bold and brave in the defence of his flock. This was that which he was now concerned to give proof of, and better evidence could not be demanded of this! Only servant not only rescued the lambs, but, to revenge the injury, slew both the lion and the bear.

3. He applies his story like a man of faith. He owns (v. 37.) it was the Lord that delivered him from the lion and the bear; to him he gives the praise of that great achievement, and from thence he infers, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. The lion and the bear were enemies one of the other, and it was in defence of my own interest that I attacked them; but this Philistine is an enemy to God and Israel, defies the armies of the living God, and it is for their honour that I attack him. Note, (1.) Our experiences ought to be approved by us, as our encouragements to trust in God, and venture in the way of duty. He that has delivered, does and will. (2.) By the care which common Providence takes of the inferior creatures, and which it gives them to live in, we may be encouraged to depend upon that special Providence which surrounds the Israel of God. He that sets bounds to the waves of the sea and the rage of wild beasts, can and will restrain the wrath of wicked men. St. Paul seems to allude to this of David; (2 Tim. 4. 17, 18.) 'I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion, and therefore, I trust, the Lord shall deliver me.' And perhaps David here takes some of the story of Samson, and encouraged himself with it; for his slaying of a lion was a happy presage of his many illustrious victories over the Philistines in single combat.

Thus David took off Saul's objection against his undertaking, and gained a commission to fight the Philistine, with which Saul gave him a hearty good wish; since he would not venture himself, he prayed for him that would, Go, and the Lord be with thee: a good word, if it was not spoken customarily, and in a formal manner, as too often it is.

If. But David has somewhat to do likewise, to get clear of the armour wherewith Saul would, by all means, have him dressed up, when he went upon this great action; (v. 38.) He armed David with his armour; not that which he wore himself, the disproportion of his stature would not admit that, but such as he kept in his armoury; little thinking that he on whom he now put his helmet and coat of mail must shortly inherit his crown and robe. David being not yet resolved which way to attack his enemy, girded on his sword, not knowing, as yet, but he should have occasion to make use of it; but he found the armour would but incumber him, and would be rather a burden than his defence, and therefore he desires leave of Saul to put them off again; I cannot go with these, for I have not proved them, that is, ‘I have never been accustomed to such accoutrements as these.' We may suppose Saul's armour to be very fine and very firm; but what good would it do David, if it were not fit, or if he knew not how to manage himself in it? Hence he proposes that him at things above their education and usage, and covet the attire and armour of princes, forget that that is the best for us, which we are fit for and accustomed to; if we had our desire, we should wish to be in our own coat again, and should say, 'We cannot go with these;' we had therefore better go without them.

40. And he took his staff in his hand, and chose him five smooth stones out of the brook, and put them in a shepherd's bag which he had, even in a scrip; and his sling was in his hand: and he drew near to the Philistine. 41. And the Philistine came on, and drew near unto David; and the man that bare the shield went before him. 42. And when the Philistine looked about and saw David, he disdained him; for he was but a youth, and ruddy, and of a fair countenance. 43. And the Philistine said unto David, Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And the Philistine cursed David by his gods. 44. And the Philistine said to David, Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field. 45. Then said David to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. 46. This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand; and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee; and I will give the carcases of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth; that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel. 47. And all this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the Lord's, and he will give you into our hands.

We are now coming near this famous combat, and have in these verses, the preparations and remonstrances made on both sides.

I. The preparations made on both sides for the encounter. The Philistine was already fixed, as he had been daily for the last forty days; well might he go with his armour, for he had sufficiently proved it. Only we are told, (v. 41.) that he came on and drew near; a signal, it is likely, being given that his challenge was accepted, and, as if he distrusted his helmet and coat of mail, a man went before him, carrying his shield; for his own hands are full with his sword and spear, v. 45. But what arms and ammunition is David furnished with? Truly none but what he brought with him as a shepherd; no breast-plate, or corselet, but his plain shepherd's coat; no spear, but his staff; no sword or bow, but his sling; no quiver, but his scrip; nor any arrows, but, instead of them, five smooth stones picked out of the brook, v. 40. By this it appeared that his confidence was purely in the power of God, by faith in his own strength, and in the providence of his own, and that, now at length, he who put it into his heart to fight the Philistine, put it into his head with what weapons to do it.

II. The conference which precedes the encounter. In which observe,

1. How very proud Goliath was. (1.) With what scorn he looked upon his adversary, v. 42. He looked upon labour, expecting to meet some tall strong man; but when he saw what a man he met with whom he was to engage, he disdained him, thought it below him to enter the lists with him, fearing that the contemptibleness of the champion he contended with would lessen the glory of his victory. He took notice of his person, that he was but a youth, not come to his strength, ruddy and of a fair countenance, fitter to accompany the virgins of David in their dances, (if mixed dancing was then in use,) than to lead on the host of Israel in their battles. He took notice of his array with great indignation; (v. 43.) "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with smite? Dost thou think to beat me as easily as thou dost thy shepherd's dog?" (2.) With what confidence he presumed upon his success. He cursed David by his gods, imprecating the impotent vengeance of his idols against him, thinking it those shot-balls thrown about him would secure him success; and therefore, in confidence of that, he darts his menaces, as if threatening words would kill; (v. 44.) "Come to me, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air; it will be a tender and delicate feast for them." Thus the security and presumption of fools destroy them.

2. How very pious David was. His speech savours nothing of ostentation, but God is all in all in it, v. 45-47.

(1.) He derives his authority from God. "I come to thee, by warrant and commission from heaven, in the name of the Lord, who has called me to, and animated me for, this undertaking; who, by his universal providence, is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts; and therefore has power to do what he pleases; and, by the special grace of his covenant, is the God of the armies of Israel, and therefore has this command, and will so employ his power for their protection, and against those who have impiously defied them." The name of God David relied on, as Goliath did on his sword and spear. See Ps. 29. 7. —18. 10. 11.

(2.) He depends for success upon God, v. 46. David speaks with as much assurance as Goliath had done, but upon better ground; it is his faith that says, "This is the Lord which delivereth the into my hand; and not only thy carcasse, but the carcasses of the host of the Philistines, shall be given to the birds and beasts of prey."

(3.) He devotes the praise and glory of all to God. He did not, like Goliath, seek his own honour, but the honour of God; not doubting but by the success of this action, [1.] All the world should be made to know that there is a God, and that the God of Israel is a living and true God, and all other pretended deities are vanity and a lie. [2.] All Israel (whom he calls not this army, but this assembly, or church, because they were now religiously attending the going of their God and King, as they used to do in the sanctuary) all Israel shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear, (v. 47.) but can, when he pleases, save without either and against both, Ps. 46. 9. David addresses himself to this combat rather as a priest that was going to offer a sacrifice to the justice of God, than as a soldier that was going to engage an enemy of his country.

48. And it came to pass, when the Philistine arose, and came and drew nigh to meet David, that David hasted, and ran toward the army to meet the Philistine. 49. And David put his hand into his bag, and took thence a stone, and slang it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead, that the stone sunk into his forehead; and he fell upon his face to the earth. 50. So David prevailed over the Philistine with a sling and with a stone, and smote the Philistine, and slew him; but there was no sword in the hand of David. 51. Therefore David ran, and stood upon the Philistine, and took his sword, and drew it out of the sheath thereof, and slew him, and cut off his head therewith. And when the Philistines saw their champion was dead, they fled. 52. And the men of Israel and of Judah arose, and shouted, and pursued the Philistines, until thou came to the valley, and to the gates of Ekron: and the wounded of the Philistines fell down by the way to Shaaraim, even unto Gath, and unto Ekron. 53. And the children of Israel returned from chasing after the Philistines, and they spoiled their tents. 54. And David took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Jerusalem: but he put his armour in his tent. 55. And when Saul saw David go forth against the Philistine, he said unto Abner, the captain of the host, Abner, whose son is this youth? And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I cannot tell. 56. And the king said, Inquire thou whose son the stripling is 57. And as David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, Abner took him, and brought him before Saul, with the head of the Philistine in his hand. 58. And Saul said to him, Whose son art thou, thou young man? And David answered, I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Beth-lehemite.

Here is, 1. The engagement between the two champions, v. 48. To this engagement, (1.) The Philistine advanced with a great deal of state and gravity: if he must encounter a pignym, yet it shall be with the magnificence of a giant and a grandee. This is intimated in the manner of expression. He arose, and came, and drew nigh, like a stalking mountain, overlaide with brass and iron, to meet David. (2.) David advanced with no less activity and cheerfulness, as one that aimed more to do execution, than to make a figure; he hasted, and ran, being lightly clad, to meet the Philistine. We may imagine with what tenderness and compassion the Israelites saw such a pleasing youth as this, throwing himself into the mouth of destruction; but he knew whom he had believed, and for whom he acted.

I. SAMUEL, XVII.
I. SAMUEL, XVIII.

2. The fall of Goliath in this engagement. He was in no haste, because in no fear, but confident that he should soon at one stroke cleave his adversary's head: but while he was preparing to do it solemnly, David did his business effectually, without and not by stone with sword, shot into the forehead, and, in the twinkling of an eye, fetched him to the ground, v. 49. He knew there were famous slingers in Israel, (Judg. 20. 16.) yet was either so forgetful or presumptuous, as to go with the beaver of his helmet open, and thither, to the only part left exposed, not so much David's art, as God's providence, directed the stone, and brought it with such force that it sunk into his head, notwithstanding the impudence with which his forehead was brazened. See how frail and uncertain life is, even then when it thinks itself best fortified, and how quickly, how easily, and with how small a matter, the passage may be opened for life to go out and death to enter. Goliath himself has not power over the spirit to retain the spirit, Eccl. 8. 8.

Let not the strong man glory in his strength, nor the armed man in his armour. See how God resists the proud, and pours contempt upon those that bid defiance to him and his people. None ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered. One of the rabbins thinks, that when Goliath said to David, Come, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air, he drew up his head so hastily, that his helmet fell off; and so left his broad forehead a fair mark for David. To complete the execution, he drew the sword, and cut off his head, and put it upon his spear; of this he made a trophy for David, and with it cut off his head, v. 51. What need had David to take a sword of his own? His enemy's sword shall serve his purpose, when he has occasion for one. God is greatly glorified, when his proud enemies are cut off with their own sword, and he makes their own tongues to fall upon them, Ps. 64. 8. David's victory over Goliath was typical of the triumphs of Christ, and of David over Satan and all the hosts of darkness, with whom he spoiled, and made a show of them openly; (Col. 2. 15.) and we through him are more than conquerors.

3. The defeat of the Philistines' army hereupon, They relied wholly upon the strength of their champion, and therefore, when they saw him slain, they did not, as Goliath had offered, throw down their shields and be gone; but they pursued him down into Israel (v. 9.) but took flight, being wholly dispirited, and thinking it to no purpose to oppose one before whom such a mighty man was fallen: they fled, (v. 51.) and this put life into the Israelites; they shouted and pursued them, v. 52. David, it is probable, leading them on in the pursuit, even to the gates of their own cities. In their return from the chase, they seized all their baggage, plundered them of their garments, (v. 53.) and enriched themselves with the spoil.

4. David's disposal of his trophies, v. 54. He brought the head of the Philistine to Jerusalem, to be a terror to the Jebusites, who held the stronghold of Zion: it is probable that he carried it in triumph to other cities; his armour he laid up in his tent; only the sword was preserved behind the ephod in the tabernacle as consecrated to God, and a memento of the victory was to remain there; (21. 19.)

5. The notice that was taken of David. Though he had been at court formerly, yet, having been for some time absent, (v. 15.) Saul had forgotten him, being melancholy and mindless, and little thinking that his musician should have spirit enough to be his champion; and therefore, as if he had never seen him before, he asked whose son he was. Abner was a stranger to him, but brought him to Saul himself; (v. 37.) and he gave a modest account of himself, v. 58. And now he was introduced to the court with much greater advantages than before; in which he owned God's hand performing all things for him.

In the close of the foregoing chapter we left David in triumph; now in this chapter we have, I. The improvement of his triumphs; he soon became. 1. Saul's constant attendant, v. 2. 2. Jonathan's covenant friend, v. 1, 3, 4. 3. The darling of his country, v. 5, 7, 16. II. The allays of his triumphs. v. 26-29. Saul's enmity; David performed his conditions bravely, (v. 26-27.) and grew to be more and more esteemed, v. 28-30. Still David is rising, but (as all that aim at the crown of life must expect) he had a great deal of difficulty and opposition to grapple with.

1. And it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David; and Jonathan loved him as his own soul. 2. And Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more home to his father's house. 3. Then Jonathan and David made a covenant, because he loved him as his own soul. 4. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his girdle. And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, and behaved himself wisely: and Saul set him over the men of war; and he was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants.

David was anointed to the crown, to take it out of Saul's hand, and over Jonathan's head; and yet here we find this.

I. That Saul, who was now in possession of the crown, reposed a confidence in him, God so ordering it, that he might by his preference at court be prepared for future service. Saul now took him home with him, and would not suffer him to return again to his retirement, v. 2. And David having signalized himself above the men of war, in taking up the challenge which they declined, Saul set him over the men of war; (v. 5.) not that he made him general. Abner was in that post, but perhaps captain of the life-guard; or, though he was youngest, he ordered him to have the precedence, in recompense of his great services. He employed him in the affairs of government; and David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, showing himself as dutiful as he was bold and courageous. Those that hope to rule, must first learn to obey. He had approved himself to Jesse his father, and now a dutiful servant to Saul his master; those that are good in one relation, it is to be hoped will be so in another.

II. That Jonathan, who was heir to the crown, entered into covenant with him: God so ordering it, that David's way might be the clearer, when his rival was his friend.

1. Jonathan conceived an extraordinary kindness and affection for him, v. 1. When he had made an end of speaking to Saul, he fell perfectly in love. with him. Whether it refers to his conference with Saul before the battle, (ch. 17. 34-37.) or to that after, (v. 18.) in which he spake much more as if that were set down, is uncertain.

But in both David expressed himself with so much prudence, modesty, and piety, such a felicity of expression, with so much boldness and yet so much sweetness, and all this so natural and unaffected, and the more surprising because of the disadvantages of his education and appearance, that the soul od Jonathan was immediately knit unto the soul of David. Doubtless the man of whom David emptied himself on a Philistine army with the same faith and bravery that David had now attacked a Philistine giant: so that there was between them a very near resemblance of affections, dispositions, and counsels, which made their spirits unite so easily, so quickly, so closely, that they seemed but as one soul in two bodies. None had so much reason to dislike David as Jonathan had, because he was to put him by the crown, yet none regards him more. Those that are governed in their love by principles of wisdom and grace, will not suffer their affections to be alienated by any secular regards or considerations: the greater thoughts will swallow up and overrule the lesser.

2. He testified his love to David by a generous present he made him, v. 4. He was concerned to see so great a soul, though lodged in so fair a body, yet depressed and unadorned, and David a shepherd, and not a soldier; therefore he stripped himself of them to dress David up a soldier, and not a shepherd, and therefore takes care to put him speedily into the habit of a courtier, for he gave him a robe, and of a soldier, for he gave him, instead of his staff and sling, a sword and bow, and, instead of his shepherd's scrip, a girdle, either a belt or a sash; and, which made the present much more obliging, they were the same that he himself had worn, and (as a presage of what would follow,) he enriched himself of them to enrich David in them. Saul's would not fit him, but Jonathan's did; their bodies were of a size, a circumstance which well agreed with the suitableness of their minds. When Saul put those marks of honour on David, he put them off again, because he would first earn them, and then wear them; but now that he had given proofs of the spirit of a prince and soldier, he was not ashamed to wear the habits of a prince and soldier. David is seen in Jonathan's clothes, that all may take notice he is Jonathan's second self. Our Lord Jesus had thus showed his love to us, that he stripped himself to clothe us, emptied himself to enrich us; nor he did more than Jonathan, he clothed himself with our rags, whereas Jonathan did not put on David's.

3. He endeavoured the perpetuating of his friendship so entirely satisfied were they in each other, even at the first interview, that they made a covenant with each other, v. 3. Their mutual affection was sincere; and he that bears an honest mind steriles not at assurances. True love desires to be constant. Those who love Christ as their own souls, will be willing to join themselves to him in an everlasting covenant.

II. That both court and country agree to bless him: so entirely satisfied that they agree in their favours; yet David was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also (which was strange) in the sight of Saul's servants, v. 5. The former cordially loved him, the latter could not for shame but caress and compliment him. And it was certainly a great instance of the power of God's grace in David, that he was able to bear all this respect and honour flowing in upon him as suddenly, with our eyes lifted up above these measure. That these clasp so fast, have need of good heads and good hearts: it is harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased.

6. And it came to pass, as they came, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Philistines, that the women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet king Saul, with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music.

7. And the women answered one another as they played, and said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. And Saul was very wroth, and the saying displeased him; and he said, They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands: and what can he have more but the kingdom? 9. And Saul eyed David from that day and forward. And it came to pass, on the morrow, that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he prophesied in the midst of the house; and David played with his hand, as at other times: and there was a javelin in Saul's hand. 11. And Saul cast the javelin; for he said, I will smite David even to the wall with it. And David avoided out of his presence twice.

Now begin David's troubles, and they not only tread on the heels of his triumphs, but take rise from them; such is the vanity of that in this world which seems greatest.
sign that the Spirit of God is departed from men, if they be peevish in their resentments of affronts, envious and suspicious of all about them, and ill-natured in their conduct; for the wisdom from above never proceeds from such a mind.

III. In his fury he aimed to kill David, v. 9, 10. Jealousy is the rage of a man; it made Saul outrageous against David, and impatient to get him out of the way.

1. His fits of phrenzy returned upon him. The very next day after he conceived malice against David, the evil spirit from God, that had formerly haunted him, seized him again. Those that indulge themselves in envy and uncharitableness, give place to the Devil, and prepare for the re-entry of the unclean spirit, with seven others more wicked. Where envy is, there is confusion. Saul pretended a religious ecstasy; he prophesied in the midst of the house; that is, he had the gestures and notions of a prophet, and humoured the thing well enough to decoy David into a snare, and that he might be fearless of any danger, and off his guard; and, perhaps, designing, if he could but kill him, to impute it to a divine impulse, and to charge it upon the spirit of prophecy with which he seemed to be animated; but really it was a hellish fury that actuated him.

2. David, though advanced to a much higher post of honour, disdained not, for his master's service, to return to his harp; he played with his harp, as at other times. Let not the higher think any thing below them, whereby they may do good, and be serviceable to those they are obliged to.

3. He took this opportunity to endeavour the death of David. A sword in a madman's hand is a dangerous thing, especially such a madman as Saul was, that was mad with malice. Yet he had a javelin in his dart in his hand, with which he projected and endeavoured to slay David; not in a sudden passion, but deliberately: I will smite David to the wall with it; with such a desperate force did he throw it. Justly does David complain of his enemies, that they hated him with a cruel hatred, Ps. 25. 19. No life is thought too precious to be sacrificed to malice. If a grateful sense of the great service David had done to the public could not assuage Saul's fury, what would he think he should have allowed himself to consider the kindness he was now doing to himself, relieving him, so as no one else could, against the worst of troubles. Those are possessed with a devilish spirit indeed, that render evil for good. Compare David, with his harp in his hand, aiming to serve Saul, and Saul, with his javelin in his hand, aiming to slay David; and observe the sweetness and usefulness of God's persecuted people, and the bruithess and barbarity of their persecutors. The blood-thirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul, Prov. 29. 10.

4. David happily avoided the blow twice, namely, now, and afterwards, ch. 19. 10. He did not throw the javelin at Saul again; he withdrew, not fighting, but flying, for his own preservation. Though he had both strength and courage enough, enough of all right, to make resistance and revenge the injury, yet he did no more than secure himself, by getting out of the way of it. David, no doubt, had a watchful eye upon Saul's hand, and the javelin in it, and did as bravely in running from it, as he did lately in running upon Goliath. Yet his safety must be ascribed to the watchful eye of God's providence upon him, saving his servant from the hurtful sword; and by this narrow escape it seemed he was designed for something extraordinary.

12. And Saul was afraid of David, because the Lord was with him, and was departed from Saul. 13. Therefore Saul removed him from him, and made him his captain over a thousand: and he went out and came in before the people. 14. And David behaved himself wisely in all his ways; and the Lord was with him. 15. Wherefore, when Saul saw that he behaved himself very wisely, he was afraid of him. 16. But all Israel and Judah loved David, because he went out and came in before them. 17. And Saul said to David, Behold, my elder daughter Merab, her will I give thee to wife; only be thou valiant for me, and fight the Lord's battles: for Saul said, Let not mine hand be upon him, but let the hand of the Philistines be upon him. 18. And David said unto Saul, Who am I? and what is my life, or my father's family in Israel, that I should be son-in-law to the king? 19. But it came to pass, at the time when Merab, Saul's daughter, should have been given to David, that she was given unto Adriel the Meholathite to wife. 20. And Michal, Saul's daughter, loved David: and they told Saul, and the thing pleased him. 21. And Saul said, I will give him her, that she may be a snare to him, and that the hand of the Philistines may be against him. Wherefore Saul said to David, Thou shalt this day be my son-in-law in the one of the twain. 22. And Saul commanded his servants, saying, Commune with David secretly, and say, Behold, the king hath delight in thee, and all his servants love thee: now, therefore, be the king's son-in-law. 23. And Saul's servants spake those words in the ears of David. And David said, Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a king's son-in-law, seeing that I am a poor man, and lightly esteemed? 24. And the servants of Saul told him, saying, On this manner spake David. 25. And Saul said, Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any dowry, but a hundred foreskins of the Philistines, to be avenged of the king's enemies. But Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines. 26. And when his servants told David these words, it pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law: and the days were not expired. 27. Wherefore David arose, he and his men, and slew of the Philistines two hundred men; and David brought their foreskins, and they gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son-in-law. And Saul gave him Michal his daughter to wife. 28. And Saul saw and knew that the Lord was with David, and that Michal, Saul's daug ter, loved him. 29. And Saul was yet the more afraid of David; and Saul became David's enemy continually. 30. Then the princes of the Philistines went forth: and it came to pass, after they went forth, that David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul; so that his name was much set by.

Saul had now, in effect, proclaimed war with David; he began in open hostility, when he threw the javelin at him; now we are told, how his enmity proceeded, and how David received the attack of it.

I. See how Saul expressed his malice against David.

1. He was afraid of him, v. 12. Perhaps he pretended to be afraid that David would do him mischief, to force his way to the crown. Those that design ill against others, are commonly willing to have it thought that others design ill against them; but David's withdrawing, (v. 11.) was a plain evidence that he was far from such a thought. However, he really stood in awe of him, as Herod feared John, Mark 6. 20. Saul was sensible he had lost the favourable presence of God himself, and that David had it, and for this reason, he feared him. Note, Those are truly great and good, who are reverenced by those that have God with them. The more wisely David behaved himself, the more Saul feared him, v. 15. and again, v. 29. Men think the way to be feared, is, to hector and threaten, which makes them feared by fools only, but despised by the wise and good; whereas the way to be both feared and loved, feared by those to whom we would wish to be a terror, and loved by those to whom we would wish to be a delight, is, to behave ourselves. Wisdom makes the face to shine, and commands respect.

2. He removed him from court, and gave him a regiment in the country, v. 13. He made him captain over a thousand, that he might be under his eye, because he hated the sight of him; and that he might not secure the interest of the courtiers. Yet herein he did impolitically; for he gave David an opportunity of ingraining himself in the people, who therefore loved him, (v. 16.) because he went out and came in before them; that is, he presided in the business of his country, civil as well as military, and gave universal satisfaction.

3. He stirred him up to take all occasions of quarrelling with the Philistines and engaging them, (v. 17.) insinuating to him, that hereby he would do good service to his prince, Be thou valiant for me; and good service to his God, Fight the Lord's battles; and a kindness to himself too, for hereby he would qualify himself for the honour he designed him, which was to marry his eldest daughter to him. This he had merited by killing Goliath, for it was promised by proclamation to him that should do that exploit; (ch. 17. 25.) but David was so modest, as not to demand it, and now, when Saul proposed it, it was with design of mischief to him, to make him venture upon hazardous attempts, saying in his heart, Let the hand of the Philistines be upon him, hoping they would sometime or other be the death of him, yet how could he expect this, when he saw that God was with him?

4. He did what he could to provoke him to discontent and mutiny, by breaking his promise with him, and giving his daughter to another, when the time was come that she should have been given to him, v. 19. This was as great an affront as he could possibly put upon him, and touched him both in his honour and in his love: he therefore thought David's resentments of it would break out in some indecency or other, in word or deed, which might give him an advantage against him, to take him off by course of law. Thus evil men seek mischief.

5. When he was disappointed in this, he preferred him his other daughter, (who it seems had a secret kindness for David, v. 20.) but with this design, that she might be a snare to him, v. 21. (1.) Perhaps he hoped that she would, even after her marriage to David, take part with her father against his husband, and give him an opportunity of doing him an unkindness. However, (2.) The condition of the marriage, he hoped, would be his destruction; for (so zealous will Saul seem against the Philistines) the conditions of the marriage must be, that he killed a hundred Philistines, and, as proofs that those he had slain were uncircumcised, he must bring in their foreskins cut off; this would be a just reproach upon the Philistines, who hated circumcision, as it was an ordinance of God; and perhaps David, in doing this, would the more exasperate them against him, and make them seek to be revenged on him, which was the thing that Saul desired and designed, much more than to be avenged on the Philistines: For Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines, v. 25. See here, (1.) What cheats bad men put upon themselves, who think they will hurt others, except when the evil spirit was actually upon him, to aim at David's life himself, for even he could not but conceive horror at the thought of murdering such an innocent and excellent person; but he thought that to expose him to the Philistines had nothing bad in it; Let not my hand be upon him, but the hand of the Philistines; whereas the malicious design against him was as truly murder as God's was, and he had hands to execute it. (2.) What cheats they put upon the world. Saul pretended extraordinary kindness for David, even then when he aimed at his ruin, and was actually plotting it: Thou shalt be my Son-in-law, says he, (v. 21.) notwithstanding he hated him implacably. Perhaps David refers to this, when (Ps. 55. 21.) he speaks of his enemy, as one whose soul was smoother than oil, and gave him an opportunity in his heart. It is probable that Saul's employing his servants to persuade David to enter into a treaty of a match with his daughter Michal, (v. 22.) arose from an apprehension that either his having cheated him about his elder daughter, (v. 19.) or the hardness of the terms he intended now to propose, would make him decline it.

II. See how David conducted himself, when the tide of Saul's displeasure ran thus high against him.

1. He behaved himself wisely in all his ways, v. 14. He perceived Saul's jealousy of him, which made him very cautious and circumspect in every thing he said and did, and careful to give no offence. He did not complain of hard measure, nor make himself the head of a party, but managed all the affairs he was intrusted with, as one that must it his business to do real service to his king and country, looking upon that to be the end of his preferment. And then the Lord was with him to give him success in all his undertakings. Though he conducted Saul's ill-will by it, yet he obtained God's favour. Compare this with Ps. 101. 2. where it is David's promise, I will behave myself wisely; and that promise he here performed; and it is his prayer, O! when wilt thou come unto me? And that answer, the Lord was with him. However blind Fortune may seem to favour fools, God will own and bless those that behave them selves wisely.
good services to Israel. When the princes of the Philistines began to move towards another war, David was ready to oppose them, and behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, v. 36. The law dispersed with men from going to war the third year after they were married, (Deut. 24. 5.) but David loved his country too well to make use of that dispensation. Many that have showed themselves forward to serve the public when they have been in pursuit of preferment, have declined it when they have gained their point; but David acted from more generous principles.

Lastly, observe how God brought good to David out of Saul’s projects against him. 1. Saul gave him his daughter Michal to be his wife, but, in this respect, that marriage was a kindness to him, that his being Saul’s son-in-law, made his succeeding him much the less invidious, especially when so many of his sons were slain with him, ch. 31. 2. Saul thought, by putting him upon dangerous services, to have him taken off, but that very thing confirmed his interest in the people; for the more he did against the Philistines, the better they loved him, so that his name was much set by, (v. 30.) which would make his coming to the crown the more easy. Thus God makes even the wrath of man to praise him, and serves his designs of kindness to his own people by it.

CHAP. XIX.

Immediately after David’s marriage, which should have secured him Saul’s affections, we find his troubles coming upon him faster than ever, and Saul’s enmity to him the cause of all. His death was vowed, and four fair escapes of his from the lawful sword of Saul, we have an account of in this chapter. The first by the prudent mediation of Jonathan, v. 1. 7. The second by his own quickness, v. 8. 10. The third by Michal’s fidelity, v. 11. 17. The fourth by Samuel’s protection, and a chance, for the present, wrought upon Saul, v. 18. 24. Thus God has many ways of preserving his people. Providence is never at a loss.

1. And Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David. 2. But Jonathan, Saul’s son, delighted much in David: and Jonathan told David, saying, Saul my father seeketh to kill thee. Now, therefore, I pray thee, take heed to thyself, and abide in a secret place, and hide thyself: 3. And I will go out and stand beside my father in the field where thou art, and I will commune with my father of thee; and what I see, that I will tell thee. 4. And Jonathan spake good of David unto Saul his father, and said unto him, Let not the king sin against his servant, against David; because he hath not sinned against thee, and because his works have been to thee-ward very good. 5. For he did put his life in his hand, and slew the Philistine, and the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel: thou savest it, and didst rejoice; wherefore then wilt thou sin against innocent blood, to slay David without a cause? 6. And Saul hearkened unto the voice of Jonathan: and Saul swore, As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain. 7. And Jonathan called David, and Jonathan showed him all those things: and Jonathan brought David to Saul, and he was in his presence as in times past.

Saul and Jonathan appear here in their different characters, with reference to David.

I. Never was enemy so unreasonably cruel as Saul. He spake to his son and all his servants, that they should kill David, v. 1. His projects to take him off, had failed, and therefore he proclaims him an outlaw, and charges all about him, upon their allegiance, to take the first opportunity to kill David. It is strange that he was not ashamed thus to avow his malice, when he could give no reason for it; and that, knowing that all his servants loved him, for so he had said himself, (ch. 18. 22.) he was not afraid of provoking them to rebel by this bloody order. Either malice was not then so politic, or justice was not so corrupted, as it has been since, or else Saul would have had him indicted, and have summoned witnesses to swear treason against him, and so have had him taken off, as Na-both was, by colour of law; but there is least danger from this undesign'd malice. It was strange that he who knew how well Jonathan loved him, should expect him to kill him; but he thought, because he was heir to the crown, he must needs be as envious at David as himself was. And Providence ordered it thus, that he might befriend David in the day of his affliction.

II. Never was friend so surprisingly kind as Jonathan, A friend in need is a friend indeed; such a one Jonathan was to David. He not only continued to delight much in him, though David's glory eclipsed his, but bravely appeared for him now that the stream ran so strong against him. He took care for his present security, by letting him know his danger; (v. 2.) Take heed to thyself, and keep thy hand from harm: Jonathan knew not but some of the servants might be either so obsequious to Saul, or so envious at David, as to put the orders into execution which Saul had given, if they could light on David.

2. He took pains to pacify his father and reconcile him to David. The next morning, he ventured to commune with him concerning David; (v. 3.) not so easily, either because he observed Saul to be drunk, and so was not to be spoken to, or because he hoped that, when he had slept upon it, he would himself revoke the order, or because he could not have an opportunity of speaking to him till morning. His intercession for David was, (1.) Very prudent. It was managed with a great deal of the meekness of wisdom; and he showed himself faithful to his friend by speaking good of him, though he was in great danger of incurring his father's displeasure by it. A rare instance of valuable friendship! He pleads, [1.] The good services David had done to the public, and particularly to Saul; His work has been to thee-ward very good, v. 4. Witness the relief he had given him against his distemper with his harp, and his bold encounter with Goliath, that memorable action, which did, in effect, save Saul's life and kingdom; he appeals to himself concerning that, Thou thy hand against me, and didst rejoice. In that, and other instances, it appeared that David was a favourite of Heaven and a friend to Israel, as well as a good servant to Saul, for by him the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel; so that to order him to be slain, was not only base ingratitude to so good a servant, but a great affront to God, and a great injury to the public. [2.] He pleads his innocence: though he had formerly done many good offices, yet if he had now been chargeable with any crimes, it had been another matter, but he has not sinned against thee; (v. 4.) his blood is innocent, (v. 5.) and if he be slain, it is without cause. And Jonathan had therefore reason to protest against it, because he could not entail any thing upon his family more pernicious than the guilt of innocent blood. (2.) His intercession, being so heartfelt, was prevalent. God inclined the heart of Saul to hearken to the voice of Jonathan. Note, We must be willing to hear reason, and to take all reproof and good advice even from our inferiors; parents from their own children. How forcible are right words! Saul was, for the present, so far convinced of the unreasonableness of his enmity to David, that, [1.] He recalled the bloody warrant for his execution; (v. 6.) As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain. Whether Saul swore here with due solemnity or no, does not appear; perhaps he did, and the matter was of such moment as to deserve it, and of such uncertainty as to need it; but, at other times, Saul swore rashly and profanely, which made the sincerity of this oath justly questionable: for it may be feared that those who can so far jest with an oath as to make a by-word of it, and prostitute it to a trifle, have not such a due sense of the obligation of it, but that, to serve a turn, they will prostitute it to a lie. Some suspect that Saul said and swore this with a malicious design to bring David within his reach again, intending to take the first opportunity to slay him: but as bad as Saul was, we can scarcely think so ill of him; and therefore we suppose that he spake as he thought, for his present, but the convictions soon wore off, and his corruptions prevailed and triumphed over them.

[2.] He renewed the grant of his place at court. Jonathan brought him to Saul, and he was in his presence as in times past, (v. 7.) hoping that now the storm was over, and that his friend Jonathan would be instrumental to keep his father always in this good mind.

8. And there was war again: and David went out and fought with the Philistines, and slew them with a great slaughter; and they fled from him. 9. And the evil spirit from the Lord was upon Saul, as he sat in his house with his javelin in his hand: and David played with his hand. 10. And Saul sought to smite David even to the wall with the javelin; but he slipped away out of Saul’s presence, and he smote the javelin into the wall: and David fled, and escaped that night.

Here,

I. David continues his good services to his king and country. Though Saul had required him evil for good, and even his usefulness was the very thing for which Saul envied him, yet he did not therefore retire in sulleness, and decline public service. Those that are ill paid for doing good, yet must not be weary in well-doing, remembering what a bountiful Benefactor our heavenly Father is, even to the froward and unthankful.

Notwithstanding the many affronts Saul had given to David, yet we find him, (1.) As boldly as ever in his front for the service of his country. The war broke out again with the Philistines, which gave David occasion again to signalize himself: it was with a great deal of bravery that he charged them; he came off victorious, slaying many, and putting the rest to flight. (2.) As cheerful is ever in using his harp for the service of his prince. When Saul was disturbed with his former fits of melancholy, David played with his hand, v. 9. He might have pledged that that was a piece of ser vice now below him; but an humble good man will think nothing below him by which he may do good. He might have objected the danger he was in the last time he did this office for Saul, ch. 18. 10. But he had learned to render good for evil, to trust God with his safety in the way of his duty. See how David was affected when his enemy was sick; (Ps. 33. 13, 14.) which, perhaps, refers to Saul's sickness.

2. Saul continues his malice against David. He that but the other day had sworn by his Maker, that he should not be slain, now endeavours to slay him himself. So inanible, so incurable, is the enmity of the heart of the serpent against that of the woman; so deceitful and desperately wicked is the heart of man without the grace of God, Jer. 17. 9. The fresh honours David had won in this last war with the Philistines, instead of extinguishing Saul's ill-will to him, and confirming his reconciliation, revived his envy and exasperated him yet more. And when he indulged this wicked passion, no marvel that the evil spirit came upon him; (v. 9.) for when we let the sun go down on our wrath, we give place to the devil, (Eph. 4. 26, 27.) we make room for him and invite him. Discomposure of mind, though helped forward by the agency of Satan, commonly owe their original to men's own sins and follies. Saul's fear and jealousy made him a torment to himself, so that he could not sit in his house without a javelin in his hand, pretending it was for his preservation, but designing it for David's destruction; for he endeavoured to kill him to the wall, running at him so violently, that he struck the javelin into the wall, v. 10. So strong was the devil in him, so strong his own rage and passion. Perhaps he thought, if he had killed him now, he had been excusable both before God and man, as being non compos mentis—not right in his mind, and that it would have been imputed to his distraction. But God cannot be deceived by pretences, whatever men may be.

3. God continues his care of David, and still watches over him for good. Saul missed his blow; David was too quick for him and fled, and by a kind providence escaped that night. To these preservations, among others, David often refers in his Psalms, when he speaks of God being his Shield and Buckler, his Rock and Fortress, and delivering his soul from death.

11. Saul also sent messengers unto David's house, to watch him, and to slay him in the morning: and Michal, David's wife, told him, saying, If thou save not thy life to-night, to-morrow thou shalt be slain. 12. So Michal let David down through a window: and he went, and fled, and escaped. 13. And Michal took an image, and laid it in the bed, and put a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster, and covered it with a cloth. 14. And when Saul sent messengers to take David, she said, He is sick. 15. And Saul sent the messengers again to see David, saying, Bring him up to me in the bed, that I may slay him. 16. And when the messengers were come in, behold, there was an image in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster. 17. And Saul said unto Michal, Why hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy, that he is escaped? And Michal answered Saul, He said unto me, Let me go; why should I kill thee?

1. Saul's further design of mischief to David. When he had escaped the javelin, supposing he went straight to his own house, as indeed he did, he sent some of his guards after him to lay wait at the door of his house, and to assassinate him in the morning as soon as he stirred out, v. 11. Josephus says, the design was to seize him, and to hurry him before a court of justice that was ordered to condemn him, and put him to death, as a traitor; but we are here told, it was a shorter way they were to take with him, they were ordered to slay him. Well might David complain that his enemies were bloody men, as he did in the Psalm which he penned at this time, and upon this occasion, (Ps. 59.) when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him. See v. 2, 3, and 7. He complains that swords were in their lips.

12. David's wonderful deliverance out of this danger; Michal was the instrument of it, whom Saul gave to him to be a snare to him, but she procured his protector and helper; often is the devil out-shot with his own bow. How Michal came to know the danger he was in, does not appear; perhaps she had notice sent from court, or, rather, was herself aware of the soldiers about the house, when they were going to bed, though they kept so still and silent, that they said, Who doth hear? as David takes notice of this in that Psalm, v. 7. She, knowing her father's great indignation at David, soon suspected the design, and besmirched herself for her husband's safety.

1. She got David out of the danger. She told him how imminent the peril was, (v. 11.) To morrow thou wilt be slain. She told him, as Josephus paraphrases it, that if the sun saw him there next morning it would never see him more; and then she told him a way of escape. David himself was better versed in the art of fighting than of flying, and had it been lawful, it would have been easy for him to have cleared his house, by dint of sword, from those that haunted it, but Michal let him down through a window, (v. 12.) all the doors being guarded; and so he fled and escaped. And now it was, that, either in his own breast before he went, or in the hiding-place to which he fled, he penned the fifty-ninth Psalm, which is ordered to sing in the morning, and at that time his mind was composed, and, in this great danger, his faith was strong and fixed on God; and whereas the plot was to slay him in the morning, he speaks there with the greatest assurance, (v. 16.) I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning.

2. She practised a deception upon Saul and those whom he employed to be the instruments of his cruelty. When the doors of the house were opened in the morning, and David did not appear, the messengers would search the house for him; and did so. But Michal told them he was sick in bed, (v. 14.) and if they would not believe her, they might see; for (v. 13.) she had put a wooden image in the bed, and wrapt it up close and warm as if it had been David asleep, and not in a condition to be spoken to; the goat's hair about the image was to resemble David's hair, and the wood, his body. Michael can by no means be justified in telling a lie, and covering it thus with a cheat; God's truth needed not her lie: but she intended hereby to keep Saul in suspense for a while, that David might have time to secure himself, not doubting but those messengers would pursue him, if they found he was gone. The messengers had so much humanity as not to offer him any disturbance, when they heard he was sick; for to them that are in that misery, pity should be shown; but Saul, when he heard it, gave positive orders that he should be brought to him, sick or well: (v. 15.) Bring him to me in the bed that I may slay him. It was base and barbarous thus to triumph over a sick man; and to saw the death of one who, for aught he knew, was dying by the hand of nature. So earnestly did he thirst after his blood, and so greedy was his revenge, that he could not be pleased to see him dead, unless he himself was the death of him; though a while ago he said, Let not mine hand be upon him. Thus when men lay the reins on the neck of their passions, they grow more and more outrageous. When the messengers were sent again, the cheat was discovered, v. 16. But by this time it was to be hoped that David was safe, and therefore Michal was not then much concerned at the discovery. Saul chid her for helping David to escape; (v. 17.) Why hast thou deceived me so? What a base spirit was Saul of, to expect that, because Michal was his daughter, she must therefore betray her own husband to him unjustly! Ought she not to forsake and forget her father and her father's house, to cleave to her husband? Those that themselves will be held by no bonds of reason or religion, are ready to think that others should as easily break those bonds. In answer to Saul's chiding, Michal is not so careful of her husband's reputation as she had been of his person, when she makes this her excuse, He said, Let me go; why should I kill the? As her insinuating that she should have hindered his flight, was false, (it was she that put him upon it and furthered it,) so it was an unjust unworthy reflection upon him, to suggest that he threatened to kill her, if she would not let him go, and might confirm Saul in his rage against him. David was far from being so barbarous a man and so imperious a husband, so brutish in his resolves, and so haughty in his menaces, as she here represented him. But David suffered both from friends and foes, and so did the Son of David.

18. So David fled, and escaped, and came to Samuel to Ramah, and told him all that Saul had done to him: and he and Samuel went and dwelt in Nainoth. 19. And it was told Saul, saying, Behold, David is at Nainoth in Ramah. 20. And Saul sent messengers to take David: and when they saw the company of the prophets prophesying, and Saul fell standing as appointed over them, the Spirit of God was upon the messengers of Saul, and they also prophesied. 21. And when it was told Saul, he sent other messengers, and they prophesied likewise. And Saul sent messengers again the third time, and they prophesied also. 22. Then went he also to Ramah, and came to a great well that is in Socho: and he asked and said, Where are Samuel and David? And one said, Behold, they be at Naioth in Ramah. 23. And he went thither to Naioth in Ramah: and the Spirit of God was upon him also, and he went on and prophesied, until he came to Naioth in Ramah. 24. And he stripped off his clothes also, and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and lay down naked all that day, and all that night. Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophets!

Here is,
1. David's place of refuge. Being got away in the night from his own house, he fled not to Bethlehem to his relations, or to any of the cities of Israel that had caressed and cried him up, to make an interest in them for his own preference, but ran straight to Samuel, and told him all that Saul had done to him, v. 18. 1. Because Samuel was the man that had given him assurance of the crown; and his faith in that assurance now beginning to fail, and he being ready to say in his haste, (or, in his flight, as some read it, Ps. 116. 11.) All men are liars, ("not only Saul that promised me my life, but Samuel also that promised me the throne,") whither should he go but to Samuel, for encouragement, in this day of distress, as would support his faith? In flying to Samuel, he made God his Refuge, trusting in the shadow of his wings; where else can a good man think himself safe? 2. Because Samuel, as a prophet, was best able to advise him what to do in this day of his distress. In the Psalm he penned the night before, he had lifted up his prayer to God; and now he takes the first opportunity of waiting upon Samuel, to receive direction and instruction from God. If we expect answers of peace to our prayers, we must have our ears open to God's word, v. 3. Because with Samuel there was a college of prophets with whom he might join in praising God, and the pleasure of that would be the greatest relief imaginable to him in his present distress, he met with little rest or satisfaction. He took the advice of his own counsel, and seek it in Samuel's church. And, doubtless, what little pleasure is to be had in this world, they have it, that live a life of communion with God; so that David retired in the time of trouble, Ps. 27. 4. 6.
2. David's protection in this place. He and Samuel went and dwelt (or lodged) in Naioth, where the school of the prophets was, in Ramah, in a privileged place, for the Philistines them, to not disturb that meeting, ch. 10. 10. But Saul, having notice of it by some of his spies, (v. 19,) set officers to seize David, v. 20. When they did not bring him, he sent more; when they returned not, he sent the third time; (v. 21.) and hearing no tidings of these, he went himself, v. 22. So impatient was he in his thirst after David's blood, so restless to compass his design against him, that he gave an order to one of his山县 to slay him, that he could not perceive that David was under the special protection of Heaven. It was below the king, to go himself on such an errand as this; but persecutors will stoop to any thing, and stick at nothing, to gratify their malice. Saul lays aside all public business to hunt David. How was David delivered, now that he was just ready to fall (like his own lamb formerly) into the mouth of the lion! As he delivered his lamb, by saying the lion, or as Elijah was delivered, by consuming the messengers with fire from heaven, but by turning the lions for the present into lambs.

1. When the messengers came into the congregation where David was among the prophets, the Spirit of God came upon them, and they prophesied: that is, they joined with the rest in praising God. It is not improbable that their lives were seized. And thus, (1.) God secured David: for either they were put into such an ecstasy by the spirit of prophecy, that they could not think of any thing else, and so forgot their errand, and never minded David; or they were by it put, for the present, into so great a frame, that they could not entertain the thought of doing so bad a thing. (2.) He put an honour upon them, by making them the prophets, and the communion of saints, and showed how he can, when he pleases, strike an awe upon the worst of men, by the tokens of his presence in the assemblies of the Faithful, and force them to acknowledge, that God is with them of a truth, 1 Cor. 14. 24, 25. See also the benefit of religious societies, and what good impressions may be made by them on minds that seemed unapt to receive such impressions. And where may the influence of the Spirit be expected, but in the congregations of the saints? (3.) He magnified his power over the spirits of men that made the heart not merely, but mightily, can manage both to serve his own purposes. Balaam prophesied of the happiness of Israel, whom he would have cursed; and some of the Jewish writers think these messengers prophesied of the advancement of David to the throne of Israel.

2. Saul himself was likewise seized with the spirit of prophecy, before he came to the place. Had he would have thought that so bad a man as he had been in no danger of turning into a prophet; yet, when God will take this way of protecting David, even Saul is no sooner come (as Bishop Hall expresses it) within smell of the smoke of Naioth, but he prophesies, as his messengers did, v. 23. He stripped off his royal robe and warlike habiliments, because they were either too fine, or too heavy, for this service, and fell into a trance, as it should seem, or medium, which continued all that day and night. The saints at Damascus were delivered from the rage of the New Testament Saul, by a change wrought on his spirit, but of another nature from this. This was only amazing, but that sanctifying. This for a day, that for ever. Note, Many have great gifts, and yet no grace; prophesy in Christ's name, and yet are disowned by him, Matt. 7. 22. Now the proverb recurs, Is Saul among the prophets? See ch. 10. 12. Then it was different from what it had been, but now contrary. He is rejected of God, and actuated by an evil spirit, and yet among the prophets.

CHAP. XX.

David, having several times narrowly escaped Saul's fury, begins now to consider at last, whether it were not necessary for him to retire into the country, and take up arms in his own defence. But he will not so dare a thing, without consulting his faithful friend Jonathan; how that was done, and what passed between them, we know not, but we have an assurance of supernatural love, as we had in the chapter before of unnatural hatred. 1. David complains to Jonathan of his present distress, and engaged him to be his friend, v. 1.-8. II. Jonathan faithfully continues to grace, and give him intelligence how his father stood affected to him, and renews the covenant of friendship with him, v. 9-23. III. Jonathan, upon trial, finds, to his grief, that his father was implacably enraged against David, v. 24.-34. IV. He gives David notice of this, according to the appointment between them, v. 35.-42.

1. AND David fled from Naioth in Ramah, and came and said before Jonathan, What have I done? what is mine iniquity? and what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life? 2. And he said unto him, God forbid: thou shalt not die: behold, my father will do nothing, either great or small, but that he will show it me; and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so. 3. And David sware moreover, and said, Thy father certainly knoweth that, I have found grace in thine eyes; and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved: but truly, as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death. 4. Then said Jonathan unto David, Whosoever thy soul desireth, I will even do it for thee. 5. And David said unto Jonathan, Behold, to-morrow is the new moon, and I should not fail to sit with the king at meat; but let me go, that I may hide myself in the field until the third day at even. 6. If thy father at all miss me, then say, David earnestly asked leave of me, that he might run to Beth-lehem his city: for there is a yearly sacrifice there for all the family. 7. If he say thus, It is well; thy servant shall have peace: but if he be very wroth, then be sure that evil is determined by him. 8. Therefore thou shalt deal kindly with thy servant; for thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee: notwithstanding, if there be in me iniquity, slay me myself; for why shouldst thou bring me to thy father?

Here,

1. David makes a representation to Jonathan of his present troubles. While Saul lay bound by his trance at Naioth, David escaped to the court, and got to speak with Jonathan. And it was happy for him, that he had such a friend at court, when he had such an enemy on the throne. If there be those that hate and despise us, let us not be disturbed at that, for there are those also that love and respect us; God hath set the one against the other, and so must we. Jonathan was a friend that loved at all times; loved David as well now in distress, and bid him as welcome into his arms, as he had done when he was in his triumph; (ch. 18. 1.) and he was a brother that was born for adversity, Prov. 17. 17. Now, 1. David appeals to Jonathan himself concerning his innocency, and he needed not say much to him for the proof of that, only desires him, that if he knew of any just offence he had given his father, he would tell him, that he might humble himself, and beg his pardon. What have I done? v. 1. 2. He endeavours to convince him, that, notwithstanding his innocency, Saul sought his life. Jonathan, from a principle of filial respect to his father, was very loth to believe that he designed, or would ever do, so wicked a thing, v. 2. He the rather hoped so, because he knew nothing of any such design; and he had usually been more privy to all his counsels. Jonathan, as became a dutiful son, endeavoured to cover his father's shame, as far as was consistent with justice and fidelity to David. Charity is not forward to think evil of any, especially of a parent, 1 Cor. 13. 5. David therefore gives him the assurance of an oath concerning his own danger; swears the peace upon Saul, that he was in fear of his life by him; "As the Lord liveth, that which nothing more sure in that, as thy soul liveth, than which nothing more certain to thee; whatever thou thinkest, there is but a step between me and death," v. 3. And as for Saul's concealing it from Jonathan, it was easy to account for that, he knew the friendship between him and David; and therefore, though in other things he advised with him, yet not in that. None more fit than Jonathan to serve him in every design that was just and honourable; and now he knew him to be a man of more virtue than to be his confidant in so base a design as the murder of David.

II. Jonathan generously offers him his service; (v. 4.) Whosoever thou desirest, he needed not insert the provision of lawful and honest, (for he knew David too well to think he would ask any thing that... was otherwise,) I will even do it for thee.

1. The method of trial he proposes, was very natural, and would certainly discover how Saul stood affected to him. The two next days, Saul was to dine publicly, upon occasion of the solemnities of the new moon, when extraordinary sacrifices were offered, and feasts made upon the sacrifices. Saul was rejected of God, and the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him, and yet he kept up his observance of the holy feasts. There may be the remains of external devotion, where there is nothing but the ruins of real virtue. At these solemn feasts, Saul had either all his children to sit with him, and David had a seat as one of them; or all his great officers, and David had a seat as one of them. However it was, David resolved his seat should be empty (and that it never used to be at a sacred feast) those two days, (v. 5.) and he would abscond till the solemnity was over, and put it upon this issue; if Saul admitted an excuse for his absence, and dispensed with it, he would conclude he had changed his mind, and was reconciled to him; but if he resented it, and was put into a passion by it, it was easy to conclude he designed him a mischief, since it was certain he did not love him so well as to desire his presence for any other end, than he might have an opportunity to do him a mischief, v. 7.

2. The excuse he desires Jonathan to make, for his absence, we have reason to think, was true; that he was invited by his elder brother to Beth-lehem, his own city, to celebrate this new moon with his relations there, because beside the monthly solemnity, in which they held communion with all Israel, they had now a yearly sacrifice, and a holy feast upon it, for all the family, v. 6. They kept a day of thanksgiving in their family for the comforts they enjoyed, and a prayer, for the continuance of them. By this it appears that the family David was of, was a very religious family, a house that had a church in it.

3. The arguments he uses with Jonathan, to persuade him to do this kindness for him, are very pressing. v. 8, 9. That he had entered into a league of friendship with him, and it was Jonathan's own proposal. Thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee. (2.) That he would by no means urge him to espouse his cause, if he was not sure that it was a righteous cause; "If there be iniquity in me, I am so far from desiring or expecting that the covenant between us should bind thee to be a confederate with me in that iniquity, or release thou me from it," and would that thy hand may be first upon me: slay me thyself." No honest man will urge his friend to do a dishonest thing for his sake.

9. And Jonathan said, Far be it from thee: for if I knew certainly that evil were determined by my father to come upon thee, then would not I tell it thee? 10. Then said David to Jonathan, Who shall tell me? or what if thy father answer thee roughly? 1. And Jonathan said unto David, Come, and let us go out into the field. And they went out both of them into the field. 12. And Jonathan said unto David, O Lord God of Israel, when I have sounded my father about to-morrow any time, or the third day, and behold, if there be good towards David, and I then send not unto thee, and show it thee, 13. The Lord do so and much more to Jonathan; but if it please my father to do thee evil, then I will show it thee, and send thee away, that thou mayest go in peace: and the Lord be with thee, as he hath been with my father. 14. And thou shalt not only while yet I live show me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not: 15. But also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever: no, not when the Lord hath cut off the enemies of David every one from the face of the earth. 16. So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying, Let the Lord even require it at the hand of David's enemies. 17. And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him: for he loved him as he loved his own soul. 18. Then Jonathan said to David, To-morrow is the new moon: and thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty. 19. And when thou hast stayed three days, then shalt thou go down quickly, and come to the place where thou didst hide thyself when the business was in hand, and shalt remain by the stone Ezel. 20. And I will shoot three arrows on the side thereof, as though I shot at a mark. 21. And behold, I will send a lad, saying, Go, find out the arrows. If I expressly say unto the lad, Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them; then come thou: for there is peace to thee, and no hurt; as the Lord liveth. 22. But if I say thus unto the young man, Behold, the arrows are beyond thee; go thy way: for the Lord hath sent thee away. 23. And as touching the matter which thou and I have spoken of, behold, the Lord be between thee and me for ever.

Here, 1. Jonathan protests his fidelity to David in his distress. Notwithstanding the strong confidence David had in Jonathan, yet, because he might have some reason to fear that his father's influence, and his own interest, should make him war, or grow cool toward him, Jonathan thought it requisite solemnly to renew the professions of his friendship to him: (v. 9.) "Far be it from thee to think that I suspect thee of any crime, for which I should either slay thee myself, or deliver thee to my father; no, if thou hast any jealousy of that, come, let us go into the field," v. 11. He does not challenge him to the field to fight him for an affront, but to fix him in his friendship. He faithfully promises him that he would let him know, upon trial, he found his father affected toward him, and would make the matter neither better nor worse than it was. "If there be good toward thee, I will show it thee, that thou mayest be easy: (v. 12.) if evil, I will send thee away, that thou mayest be safe;" (v. 13.) and thus would help to deliver him from the evil, if it were real, and from the fear of evil, if it were but imaginary. For the confirmation of his promise, he appeals to God, 1. As a witness; (v. 12.) "O Lord God of Israel, thou knowest I mean sincerely, and think as I speak." The strength of his passion made the manner of his speaking concise and abrupt. 2. As a judge; "The Lord do so, and much more, to Jonathan, v. 13. If I be deceitfully, or break my word with my friend:" he expresses himself thus solemnly, that David might be abundantly assured of his sincerity. And thus God has confirmed his promises to us, that we might have strong consolation, Heb. 6. 17, 18. Jonathan adds to his protestations his hearty prayers, "The Lord be with thee, to protect and prosper thee, as he has been formerly with my father, though now he be withdrawn." This in some degree affirms his belief that David would be in his father's place, and his good wishes that he might prosper in it better than his father now did.

II. He provides for the entail of the covenant of friendship with David upon his posterity; (v. 14-16.) he engages David to be a friend to his family when he was gone; (v. 15.) "Thou shalt promise that thou wilt not cut off thy kindness from my house, even from the day thou didst speak of a natural affection he had to his children, whom he desired it might go well with when he was gone, and for his future welfare he desired to improve his present interest. It also bespeaks his firm belief of David's advancement, and that it would be in the power of his hand to do a kindness or unkindness to his seed; for, in process of time, the Lord would cut off his enemies, Saul himself not excepted: then "Do thou cut off the kindness from my house, nor enge my father's wrongs upon my children." The house of David must likewise be bound to the house of Jonathan from generation to generation; he made a covenant (v. 16.) with the house of David. Note, True friends cannot but covet to transmit to their's after them their mutual affections. Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not. This kindness, 1. He calls the kindness of the Lord, because it is such kindness as the Lord shows to those whom he takes into covenant with himself; for he is a God to them, and to their seed; they are beloved for their father's sake. 2. He secures it by an imprecation, v. 16. The Lord requires it at the hand of David's seed, (for of David himself he had no suspicion,) if they prove so far David's enemies, as to deal wrongfully with the posterity of Jonathan, David's friend, and did not continue the kindness he had towards David, his should hereafter be tempted, for the clearing and confirming of their title to the throne, to do by his seed, as Abimelech had done by the sons of Gideon; (Jud. 9. 5.) and this he would effectually prevent: but the reason given (v. 17.) why Jonathan was so earnest to have the friendship entailed, is purely generous, and has nothing of self in it; it was because he loved him as he loved his own soul, and preferred him above all others, and himself above him. David, though now in disgrace at court, and in distress, was as amiable in the eyes of Jonathan as ever he had been; so pure were the principles on which his friendship was built. Having himself sworn to David, he caused David to swear to him, and (as we read it) to swear again, which David consented to; (for he bears an honest mind, and is not an assurance to swear without his love to him, which he looked upon as a sacred thing. Jonathan's heart was so much upon it, that, when they parted this time, he concludes with a solemn appeal to God, The Lord be with thee and me for ever; (v. 23.) that is, "God himself be judge between us and our families for ever, if on either side this league of friendship be violated." It was in remembrance of this covenant, that David was kind to Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. 9. 7.—21. 7. It will be a kindness to ourselves and our's, to secure an interest in those whom God favours, and to make his friends ours.

III. He settles the method of intelligence, and by what signs and tokens he would give him notice how his father stood affected toward him. He would take it for a signal of safety, and at least the second day, of the new moon, and would be inquired after, v. 18. On the third day, by which time he would be returned from Beth-lehem, he must be at such a place, (v. 19.) and Jonathan would come toward that place with his bow and arrows to shoot for diversion; (v. 20.) would send his lad to fetch his arrows, and if they were shot short of the lad, David must take it for a signal of safety, and not be afraid to show his head; (v. 21.) but if he shot beyond the lad, it was a signal of danger, and he must shift for his safety, v. 22. This expedient he fixed upon, lest he should not have the opportunity, which yet it proved he had, of talking with him, and making the report by word of mouth.

24. So David hid himself in the field: and when the new moon was come, the king sat down to eat meat. 25. And the king sat upon his seat, as at other times, even upon a seat by the wall: and Jonathan arose, and Abner sat by Saul's side, and David's place was empty. 26. Nevertheless Saul spake not any thing that day: for he thought; Something hath befallen him, he is not clean; surely he is not clean. 27. And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month, that David's place was empty: and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat, neither yesterday, nor to-day? 28. And Jonathan answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Beth-lehem: 29. And he said, Let me go, I pray thee; for our family hath a sacrifice in the city; and my brother he hath commanded me to be there: and now if I have found favour in thine eyes, let me get away, I pray thee, and see my brethren. Therefore he cometh not unto the king's table. 30. Then Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman, do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse to thine own confusion, and unto the confusion of thy mother's nakedness? 31. For as long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom. Wherefore now send and fetch him unto me, for he shall surely die. 32. And Jonathan answered Saul his father, and said unto him, Wherefore shall he be slain? what hath he done? 33. And Saul cast a javelin at him to smite him: whereby Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David. 34. So Jonathan arose from the table in fierce anger, and did eat no meat the second day of the month: for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame.

Jonathan is here effectually convinced of that which he was so loath to believe, that his father had an implacable enmity to David, and would certainly be the death of him if it were in his power; and that he had done very dear himself for the conviction.

I. David is missed from the feast on the first day, but nothing is said of him. The king sat upon his seat, to feast upon the peace-offerings, as at other times, v. 25. and yet had his heart as full of envy and malice against David as it would hold: he should first have been reconciled to him, and then come and offered his gift; but, instead of that, he had invited this feast, so as to drink the blood of David. What an abomination was that sacrifice, which was brought with such a wicked mind as this! Prov. 21. 27. When the king came to take his seat, Jonathan arose, in reverence to him, both as his father and as his sovereign; every one knew his place, but David's was empty. It did not use to be so. None more constant than he in attending holy duties; nor had he been absent now, but that he must have come in the peril of his life, self-precipitated, urged to withdraw. In imminent peril present opportunities may be waved, nay, we ought not to throw ourselves into the mouth of danger. Christ himself absconded often, till he knew that his hour was come. But that day Saul took no notice that he missed David, but said within himself, Surely he is not clean, v. 26. Some ceremonial pollution has befallen him, which forbids him to eat of the holy things. till he be washed; he had washed his clothes, and bathed his flesh in water, and been unclean until the even. Saul knew what conscience David made of the law, and that he would rather keep away from the holy feast, than come in his uncleaness. Blessed be God, no uncleaness is now a restraint upon us, but what we may by faith and repentance be washed from in the fountain opened, Ps. 26. 6.

II. He is inquired for the second day, v. 27. Saul asked Jonathan, who he knew was his confidant, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meet? He was his own son by marriage, but he calls him in disdain, the son of Jesse. He asks for him, as if he were not pleased that he should be absent from a religious feast; and so it is an example to masters of families to see to it, that those under their charge be not absent from the worship of God, either in church or prayer in the family. It is a bad thing for us, except in case of necessity, to omit any duty of statedly attending on God in solemn ordinances. Thomas lost a sight of Christ by being once absent from a meeting of the disciples. But that which displeased Saul, was, that thereby he missed the opportunity he expected, of doing David a mischief.

III. Jonathan makes his excuse, v. 28, 29. 1. That he was absent upon a good occasion; keeping the feast in the peril of his life, self-precipitated, by his elder brother, who was now more respectful to him than he had been, (ch. 17. 28.) and that he was gone to pay his respects to his relations, for the keeping up of brotherly love; and no master would deny a servant liberty to do that at proper times. He pleads, 2. That he did not go without leave, humbly asked and obtained from Jonathan, who, as his superior officer, was proper to be applied to for it. Thus he represents David, as not wanting in any instance of respect and duty to the government.

IV. Saul, hereupon, breaks out into a most extravagant passion, and rages like a lion disappointed of his prey. David was out of his reach, but he falls foul upon Jonathan for his sake; (v. 30, 31.) gave him base language, not fit for a gentleman, a prince, to give to any man, especially to his own son, heir apparent to his crown, a son that served him, the greatest stay and ornament of his family, before a deal of company, at a feast, when all should be in good humour, at a sacred feast, by which all irregular passions should be mortified and subdued; yet he does in effect call him, 1. A bastard: Thou son of this woman. Here, according to the foolish and filthy language of men's brutish passion now-a-day, Thou son of a whore. He tells him he was born to the confusion of his mother; that is, he had given the world cause to suspect that he was not the legitimate son of Saul, because he loved him whom Saul hated, and supported him who would be the destruction of their family. 2. A traitor: Thou son of fierce rebellion, so the word is, thou son of an implacable rebel. At other times, he reckoned no counsellor or commander that he had, more trusty and well-beloved than Jonathan; yet now, in his passion, he represents him as dangerous to his crown and life. 3. A fool: Thou hast chosen the son of Jesse for thy friend, to thine own confusion, for while he lives, thou shalt never be established. Jonathan indeed did wisely and well for himself and family, to keep David, whom Saul loved, from being drowned with all Saul's other children, and from being fixed to the throne; yet, for this he is branded as most impolitic. It is good taking God's people for our people, and going with those that have him with them; it will prove to our advantage at last; however for the present it may be thought a disparagement, and a prejudice to our secular interest. It is probable that Saul knew that David was anointed to the kingdom, by the same hand that anointed him, and then Jonathan out himself; was the fool, to think to defeat the counsels of God. Yet nothing will serve him but David must die, and Jonathan must fetch him to execution. See how ill Saul's passion looks, and let it warn us against the indulgence of any thing like it in ourselves. Anger is madness, and he that hates his brother, is a murderer.

V. Jonathan is sorely grieved, and put into disorder by his father's barbarous passion; and the more, because he had with him his son, his trusty counsellor. He was troubled for his father, that he should be such a brute; troubled for his friend, whom he knew to be a friend of God, that he should be so basely abused: he was grieved for David, v. 34. and troubled for himself too, because his father had done him shame; and though most unjustly, yet he must submit to it. One would pity Jonathan, to see how he was put, 1. Into the peril of sin. Much need was there of wisdom and good man to have kept his temper, upon such a provocation as this. His father's reflections upon himself he made no return to; it becomes inferiors to bear with meekness and silence the contumels put upon them in wrath and passion. When thou art the anvil, lie thou still. But his downing David to die, he could not bear; to that he replied with some heat, (v. 32.) Wherefore shall he be put to death? He was saying, that as a generous spirit can never be more easily bear to be abused themselves, than to hear their friends abused. 2. Into the peril of death. Saul was now so outrageous, that he threw a javelin at Jonathan, v. 33. He seemed to be in great care (v. 31.) that Jonathan should be established in his kingdom, and yet now he himself aims at his life. What fools, what savage beasts, and worse, does anger make men? How necessary it is to keep ourselves without anger, and to give way rather than let anger have the upper hand. Jonathan was fully satisfied that evil was determined against David, which put him out of frame exceedingly: he rose from table, thinking it high time, when his life was struck at, and would eat no meat; for they were not to eat of the holy things in their mourning. All the guests, we may suppose, were disconnected, and the mirth of the feast spoiled. He that is cruel, troubles his own flesh, Prov. 11. 17.

35. And it came to pass in the morning, that Jonathan went out into the field at the time appointed with David, and a little lad with him. 36. And he said unto his lad, Run, find out now the arrows which I shoot. And as the lad ran, he shot an arrow beyond him. 37. And when the lad was come to the place of the arrow which Jonathan had shot, Jonathan cried after the lad, and said, Is not the arrow beyond thee? 38. And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, haste, stay not. And Jonathan's lad gathered up the arrows, and came to his master. 39. But the lad knew not any thing: only Jonathan and David knew the matter. 40. And Jonathan gave his artillery unto his lad, and said unto him, Go, carry them to the city. 41. And as soon as the lad was gone, David arose out of a place toward the south, and fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times: and they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded. 42. And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the LORD, saying, The LORD be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed for ever. And he arose and departed: and Jonathan went into the city.

Here is,

1. Jonathan's faithful performance of his promise to give David notice of the success of his dangerous experiment. He went at the time and to the place appointed, (v. 35.) within sight of which he knew David lay hid; sent his foot-boy to fetch his arrows, which he would shoot at random; (v. 36.) gave David the fatal signal, by shooting an arrow beyond the lad; (v. 37.) Is not the arrow beyond thee? That word [beyond] David knew the meaning of better than the lad. Jonathan dismissed the lad, who knew nothing of the matter, and finding the coast clear, and no danger of a discovery, he presumed upon one minute's personal conversation with David after he had bid him flee for his life.

2. The most sorrowful parting of these two friends, who, for aught that appears, never came together again but once, and that was by stealth in a wood, ch. 23. 16. (1.) David addressed himself to Jonathan with the reverence of a servant rather than the freedom of a friend; he fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times, as one deeply sensible of his obligations to him for the good services he had done him. (2.) They took leave of each other with the greatest affection imaginable, with kisses and tears; they wept on each other's neck till David exceeded, v. 41. The separation of two such faithful friends was equally grievous to them both, but David's case was the more deplorable: for when Jonathan was returning to his family and friends, David was leaving all his comforts, even those of God's sanctuary, and therefore his grief exceeded Jonathan's; or, perhaps, it was because his temper was more tender, and his passions stronger. (3.) They referred themselves to the covenant of friendship that was between them, both of them comforting themselves with that in this mournful separation. "we have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord, for ourselves and our heirs, that we and they will be faithful and kind to each other from generation to generation." Thus we are at home in the body and absent from the Lord, this is our comfort, that he has made with us an everlasting covenant.

CHAP. XXI.

David has now quite taken leave, both of Saul's court, and of his camp, and bid farewell to his alter ego,—his other self, the beloved Jonathan; and from henceforward to the end of this book, he is looked upon and treated as an outlaw, and proclaimed a traitor; we still find him shifting from place to place for his own safety, and Saul pursuing him. His troubles are very particularly related in this and the following chapters, not only to be a key to the Psalms, but that he might be, as other prophets, an example to the saints, in all ages, of suffering affliction, and of patience; and, especially, that he might be a type of Christ, who, being anointed to the kingdom, humbled himself, and was therefore highly exalted. But the example of the suffering Jesus was a copy without a blot, that of David was not so; witness the records of this chapter, where we find David in his flight. I. Imposing upon Ahimelech the priest, to get from him both victuals and arms, v. 1.-9. II. Imposing upon Achish, king of Gath, by disguising himself mad, v. 10.-16. Justly are troubles called temptations, for many are by them drawn into sin.

1. THEN came David to Nob to Ahimelech the priest: and Ahimelech was afraid at the meeting of David, and said unto him, Why art thou alone, and no man with thee? 2. And David said unto Ahimelech the priest, The King hath commanded me a business, and hath said unto me, Let no man know any thing of the business wherabout I send thee, and what I have commanded thee: and I have appointed my servants to such and such a place. 3. Now therefore what is under thine hand? give me five loaves of bread in mine hand, or what there is present. 4. And the priest answered David, and said, There is no common bread under mine hand, but there is hallowed bread; if the young men have kept themselves at least from women. 5. And David answered the priest, and said unto him, Of a truth women have been kept from us about these three days, since I came out, and the vessels of the young men are holy, and the bread is in a manner common, yea, though it were sanctified this day in the vessel. 6. So the priest gave him hallowed bread: for there was no bread there but the show-bread, that was taken from before the Lord, to put hot bread in the day when it was taken away. 7. Now a certain man of the servants of Saul was there that day, detained before the Lord; and his name was Doeg, an Edomite, the chiefest of the herdmen that belonged to Saul. 8. And David said unto Ahimelech, And is there not here under thine hand spear or sword? for I have neither brought my sword nor my weapons with me, be cause the king's business required haste. 9. And the priest said, The sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom thou slewest in the valley of Elah, behold, it is here wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod: if thou wilt take that, take it: for there is no other save that here. And David said, There is none like that; give it me.

Here, I. David, in distress, flies to the tabernacle of God, now pitched at Nob, supposed to be a city in the tribe of Benjamin. Since Shiloh was forsaken, the tabernacle often remained, though the ark still remained at Kirjath-jearim. Hither David came in his flight from Saul's fury, (v. 1.) and applied himself to Ahimelech the priest. Samuel the prophet could not protect him, Jonathan the prince could not; he therefore has recourse next to Ahimelech the priest. He foresees he must now be an exile, and therefore comes to the tabernacle. 1. To take an affecting leave of it, for he knows not when he shall see it again, and nothing will be more affective to him in his banishment than his distance from the house of God, and his restraint from public ordinances, as appears by many of his Psalms. He had given an affectionate farewell to his friend Jonathan, and now applies to this Ahimelech the like to the tabernacle. 2. To inquire of the Lord there, and to beg direction from him in the way of duty and safety; his case being difficult and dangerous. That this was his business, appears ch. 22. 10. where it is said that Ahimelech inquired of the Lord for him, as he had done formerly, v. 15. It is a great comfort to us in a day of trouble, that we have a God to go to, to whom we may open our case, and from whom we may ask and expect direction. II. Ahimelech the priest is surprised to see him so poor an equipage; having heard that he was fallen into disgrace at court he looked shy upon him, as most are apt to do upon their friends when the world frowns upon them. He was afraid of incurring Saul's displeasure by entertaining him, and to notice how mean a figure he now made to what he used to make. Why art thou alone? He had some with him, (as appears, Mark 2. 26.) but there were only his own servants; he had none of the courtiers, no persons of quality with him, as he used to have at other times, when he came to inquire of the Lord. He says, (Ps. 42. 4.) he was wont to go with a multitude to the house of God; and, having now but two or three with him, Ahimelech might well ask, Why art thou alone? He that was suddenly advanced from the solitude of a shepherd's life to the crowds and hurries of the camp, is now as soon reduced to the desolate condition of an exile, and is alone like a sharrow on the house-top. Such changes are there in this world, and so uncertain are its smiles! Those that are courted to-day, may be deserted to-morrow. II. David, under pretence of being sent by Saul upon public services, solicits Ahimelech to supply his present wants, v. 2. 3. Here David did not have like himself; he told Ahimelech a gross untruth, that Saul had ordered him business to despatch; that his attendants were dismissed to such a place, that he was charged to observe secrecy, and therefore durst not communicate it, no not to the priest himself. It was all false. What shall we say to this? The scripture does not conceal it, and we dare not justify it: it was ill done, and proved of bad consequence, for it occasioned the death of the priests of the Lord, as David reflected upon it afterward with regret, ch. 22. 22. It was needless for him thus to dissemble with the priest, for we may suppose, that if he had told him the truth he would have sheltered and relieved him as readily as Samuel did, and would have known the better how to advise him, and inquire of God for him. People should be free with their faithful ministers. David was a man of great faith and courage, and yet now both failed him, and he fell thus fatally through fear and cowardice, and both owing to the weakness of his faith. Had he trusted God aright, he would not have used such a sorry sinful shift as this for his own preservation. It is written not for our imitation, no, not in the greatest straits, but for our consolation, let him that heareth say, Behold he did best he fall; and let us all pray daily, Lord, lead us not into temptation. Let us all take occasion from this to lament, 1. The weakness and in firmity of good men; the best are not perfect on this side of heaven. There may be true grace, where yet there are many failings. 2. The wickedness of bad times, which forces good men into such straits as prove temptations too strong for them. Oppressors may be wise men do foolishly.

Two things David begged of Ahimelech, bread and a sword. (1.) He wanted bread, five loaves, v. 3. Travelling was then troublesome, when men generally carried their provisions with them, having little money, and no public houses, else David had not now been to seek for bread. It seems David had disposed away the seed of the righteous, begging bread, occasionally, it seems, as Ps. 37. 15, 16.

Now, [1.] The priest objected that he had none but hallowed bread, show-bread, which had stood a week on the golden table in the sanctuary, and was taken thence for the use of the priests and their families, v. 4. It seems the priests kept no good house, but wanted either a heart to be hospitable, or rather provisions wherewith. Ahimelech thinks that the young men that attended David might not eat of this bread, unless they had for some time abstained from women, even from their own wives: this was required at the giving of the law; (Exod. 19. 13.) but otherwise we never find this made the matter of any ceremonial purity on the one side, or pollution on the other. And therefore the priest here seems to be over-nice, not to say superstitious.

[2.] The priest pleads that he and they that were with him, in this case of necessity, might lawfully eat the hallowed bread, for they were not only able to answer his terms of keeping from women for three days, but that the vessels, that is, the bodies, of the young men were holy, being possessed in sanctification and honour at all times; (1 Thess. 4. 4, 5.) and therefore God would take particular care of them, that they wanted not necessary supports, and would relieve his priest to do so. And being thus holy things were not forbidden to them. Poor and pious Israelites were, in effect, priests to God, and rather than be starved, might feed on the bread which was appropriated to the priests. Believers are spiritual priests, and the offerings of the Lord shall be their inheritance; they eat the bread of their God. He pleads that the bread is in a manner consecrated. He knew that what was holily used of it, was over; especially (as Paul margin reads it) when there is this day other bread (hot, v. 6.) sanctified this day in the vessel, and put in the room of it upon the table. This was David's plea, and the Son of David approves it, and shows from it that mercy is to be preferred to sacrifice. That ritual observances must give way to moral duties; and that that may be done in a case of an actual providential necessity, which may not otherwise be done. He brings it to justify his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath-day, for which the Pharisees censured them, Matt. 12, 3, 4.

[3.] Ahimelech hereupon supplies him. He gave him hallowed bread; (v. 6.) and some think that it was about this that he inquired of the Lord, ch. 22. 10. As a faithful servant, he would not dispose of his Master's property without his master's leave. This bread, we may suppose, was the more agreeable to David for its being hallowed, so precious were all sacred things to him. The show-bread was but twelve loaves in all, yet out of this he gives David five; (v. 3.) though he had no more in the house; but he trusted in Providence.

(2.) He wanted a sword. Persons of quality, though officers of the army, did not then wear their swords constantly as now they do, else surely David had not been without one; it was a wonder that Jonathan did not furnish him with his, as he had done, ch. 18. 4. However, it happened that he had now no weapons with him, the reason of which he pretends to be, because he came away in haste, v. 8. Those that are furnished with the sword of the Spirit and the shield of faith, cannot be disarmed of them, nor need they, at any time, to be at a loss. But that David had not the swords of his officers of their warfare were not carnal; there was not a sword to be found about the tabernacle, but the sword of Goliath, which he laid up behind the ephod, as a monument of the glorious victory David obtained over him; probably, David had an eye to that, when he asked the priest to help him with a sword; for that being mentioned, O says he, there is none like that, give it me, v. 9. He could not use Saul's armour, for he had not proved it; but this sword of Goliath he had made trial of, and done execution with; by this it appears that he was well grown in strength and stature, that he could wear and wield such a sword as that. God had taught his hands to war, so that he could do wonders, Ps. 18. 34. Two things we may observe concerning this sword. [1.] That God had graciously given it him, as a pledge of his singular favour; so that, whenever he drew it, nay, whenever he looked upon it, it would be a great support to his faith, by bringing to mind that great instance of the particular care and countenance of the divine providence. Experiences are great encouragements. [2.] That he had gratefully given it back to God, dedicating it to him and to his honour, as a token of his thankfulness; and now in his distress it stood him greatly in stead. Note, What we devote to God's praise, and serve him with, is most likely to redound, one way or other, to our own comfort and benefit. What we gave, we have from him.

Thus was David well furnished with arms and victuals; but it fell out very unhappily, that there was one of Saul's servants then attending before the Lord, Doeg by name, that proved a base traitor, both to David and to Ahimelech. He was by birth an Edomite; and the high priests, except to the Jewish religion, to get the preference he now had under Saul, yet he retained the ancient and hereditary eminence of Edom to Israel. He was master of the herds, which, perhaps, was then a place of as much honour as master of the horse is now. Some occasion or other he had at this time to wait on the priest, either to be purified from some pollution, or to pay some vow; but whatever his business was, it is probable it was to get his sword of Goliath. He attended, and could not help it, but he was sick of the service, smitten at it, and said, What a weariness is it? Mal. 1. 13. He would rather have been any where else than before the Lord, and therefore, instead of minding the business he came about, was plotting to do David a mischief, and to be avenged on Ahimelech for detaining him. God's sanctuary could never secure itself from such wolves in sheep's clothing. See Gal. 2. 4.

10. And David arose, and fled that day for fear of Saul, and went to Achish the king of Gath. 11. And the servants of Achish said unto him, Is not this David the king of the land? did they not sing one to another of him in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands! 12. And David laid up these words in his heart, and was sore afraid of Achish the king of Gath. 13. And he changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scrabbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard. 14. Then said Achish unto his servants, Lo, ye see the man is mad: wherefore then have ye brought him to me? 15. Have I need of madmen, that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? shall this fellow come into my house?

David, though king elect, is here an exile; designed to be master of vast treasures, yet had been just now begging his bread; anointed to the crown, and yet here forced to run his country: thus do God's providences sometimes seem to run counter to his promises, for the trial of his people's faith, and the glorifying of his name, in the accomplishment of his counsels, notwithstanding the difficulties that lay in the way. Here is,

1. David's flight into the land of the Philistines, where he hoped to be hid, and to remain, undiscovered, in the court or camp of Achish, king of Gath, v. 10. Israel's darling is necessitated to quit the land of Israel, and he that was the Philistines' great enemy, (upon I know not what inducements,) goes to seek for shelter among them. It should seem that as, though the Israelites loved him, yet the king of Israel had personal enmity to him, which obliged him to leave his own country; so, though the Philistines hated him, yet the king of Gath had a personal kindness for him, valuing his merit, and, perhaps, the more for his killing Goliath of Gath, who, it may be, had been his friend to David. To him David now went directly, as to one he could confide in; (as afterward, ch. 27. 2, 3.) and Achish would have now protected him, but that he was afraid of disobliging his own people by it. God's persecuted people have often found better usage from the Philistines than from Israelites, in the Gentile theatres than in the Jewish synagogues: the king of Judah imprisoned Jeremiah, and the king of Babylon set him at liberty.

2. The disgust which the servants of Achish took at his being there, and the complaint of it to Achish; (v. 11.) "Is not this David? Is not this he that has triumphed over the Philistines? Witness that burthen of the song which was so much talked of; Saul has slain his thousands, but David, this very man, his ten thousands. Nay, is not this he that (if our intelligence from the land of Israel be true) is, or is to be, the king of the land? As such he must be an enemy to our country; and is it safe or honourable for us to protect or entertain such a man?" Achish perhaps, had intimated to them, that it would be policy to entertain David, because he was now an enemy to Saul, and he might be hereafter a friend to them; it is common for the outlaws of a nation to be sheltered by the enemies of that nation; but the servants of Achish objected to his politics, and thought it not at all fit that he should stay among them.

The fright which this put David into. Though he had some reason to put confidence in Achish, yet, when he perceived the servants of Achish jealous of him, he began to be afraid that Achish would be obliged to deliver him up to them, and he was sore afraid; (v. 12.) and perhaps he was the more apprehensive of his own danger, when he was thus discovered, because he wore Goliath’s sword, which, we may suppose, was well known to him, and which he had been taught or told that they would cut off his head, as he had cut off Goliath’s with it. David now learned by experience what he had taught us, (Ps. 118. 9.) that it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes. Men of high degree are a lie, and if we make them our hope, they may prove our fear. It was at this time that David penned the fifty-sixth Psalm, (Michtam, a golden psalm,) when the Philistines took him in Gath, where having showed before God his distresses, he resolves, (v. 3.) what time I am afraid, I will trust in thee; and therefore (v. 11.) will not be afraid what man can do unto me, no not the sons of the giant.

4. The course he took to get out of their hands. He feigned himself mad; (v. 13.) he used the gestures and fashions of a natural fool, or one that was gone out of his wits; supposing they would be ready to entertain him, and so CHANGE HIM IN THE STREET. It was not so. He fell into, and the troubles he was now in, had driven him distracted. This dissimulation of his cannot be justified; it was a mean thing thus to disparage himself, and inconsistent with truth thus to misrepresent himself, and therefore not becoming the honour and sincerity of such a man as David: yet it was not a downright lie, and it was like a stratagem in war, by which he imposed upon his enemies for the preservation of his own life. What David did here in pretence, and for his own safety, which made it partly excusable, drunkards do really, and only to gratify a base lust; they make fools of themselves, and change their behaviour; their words and actions commonly are either as silly and ridiculous as an idiot’s, or as furious and outrageous as a madman’s, which has often made many of the worst men of sense and honour should allow themselves in it.

5. His escape by this means, v. 14, 15. I am apt to think Achish was aware that the delirium was but counterfeit, but, being desirous to protect David, as we find afterwards he was very kind to him, even when the lords of the Philistines favoured him not, (ch. 28. 1. 2.—29. 6.) he pretended to his servants, that he really thought he was mad, and therefore did not reason whether it was David or no; or, if it were, they needed not fear him, what harm could he do them now that his reason was departed from him? They suspected that Achish was inclined to entertain him; “Not I,” says he, “he is a madman, I’ll have nothing to do with him, you need not fear that I should employ him, or give him any countenance. Have I need of madmen? (I have done good service against all the Philistines, and therefore now I am to be employed against you.)” But perhaps he shows him no kindness, but then you shall do him no hurt, for if he be a madman, he is to be pitied.” He therefore drove him away, as it is in the title of Ps. 34, which David penned upon this occasion, and an excellent Psalm it is, and shows, that he did not change his spirit when he changed his behaviour, but even in the greatest difficulties and hurries his heart was fixed, trusting in the Lord; and he concludes that Psalm with this assurance, “that none of them that trust in God shall be desolate, though they be, as he now was, solitary and distressed; persecuted but not forsaken.”

Chap. XXII.

David being driven from Achish, returns into the land of Israel to be haunted by Saul. I. David sets up his standard in the cave of Adullam; entertains his relations, (v. 1.) lists soldiers, (v. 2.) but removes his aged parents to a more quiet settlement, (v. 3, 4.) and has the prophet Gad for his counsellor, v. 5. II. Saul resolves to pursue him, and find him out, complains of his servants and Jonathan, (v. 6.—8.) and finding by Doeg’s information that Ahimelech had been kind to David, he ordered him and all the priests that were with him, eighty-five in all, to be put to death, and all that belonged to them destroyed; (v. 9.—19.) from the barbarous execution of which sentence, Abiahalar escaped to David, v. 20., 22.

1. David therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave Adullam: and when his brethren and all his father’s house heard it, they went down thither to him. 2. And every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them: and there were with him about four hundred men. 3. And David went thence to Mizpeh of Moab; and he said unto the king of Moab, Let my father and my mother, I pray thee, come forth, and be with you till I know what God will do for me. 4. And he brought them before the king of Moab: and they dwelt with him all the while that David was in the hold. 5. And the prophet Gad said unto David, Abide not in the hold; depart, and get thee into the land of Judah. Then David departed, and came into the forest of Hareth.

Here, 1. David shelters himself in the cave of Adullam, v. 1. Whether it was a natural or artificial fastness, does not appear; it is probable that the access to it was so difficult, that David thought himself able, with God’s sword, to resist all the forces of Saul, and therefore buried himself alive in it, while he was waiting to see (as he says here, v. 3.) what God would do with him. The promise of the kingdom implied a promise of preservation to it, and yet David used proper means for his own safety, else he had tempted God. He did not do any thing that aimed to destroy Saul, but only to secure himself. He that might have done good service to his country as a judge or general, is here shut up in a cave, and thrown by as a vessel in which there was no pleasure. We must not think it strange, if sometimes shining lights be thus eclipsed and hid under a bushel. Perhaps the apostle refers to this instance of David, among others, when he speaks of some of the Old Testament worthies that wandered in deserts, in dens and caves of the earth, 2. Pet. 2. It was at this time that David penned the 142nd Psalm, which is entitled, A prayer when he was in the cave; and there he complains that no man would know him, and that refuge failed him, but hopes that shortly the righteous should compass him about.

2. Thither his relations flocked to him, his brethren and all his father’s house, to be protected by him, to give assistance to him, and to take their lot with him in his troubles, and heart, for adversity. Now Joab and Abiahal, and the rest of his relations, came to him, to suffer and venture with him, in hopes shortly to be advanced with him; and they were so. The first three of his worthies were those stood about him, Hear now, ye Benjamites, will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds; 8. That all of you have conspired against me, and there is none that showeth me that my son hath made a league with the son of Jesse, and there is none of you that is sorry for me, or showeth unto me that my son hath stirred up my servant against me, to lie in wait, as at this day? 9. Then answered Doeg the Edomite, which was set over the servants of Saul, and said, I saw the son of Jesse coming to Nob, to Ahimelech the son of Ahitub. 10. And he inquired of the Lord for him, and gave him victuals, and gave him the sword of Goliath the Philistine. 11. Then the king sent to call Ahimelech the priest, the son of Abitub, and all his father's house, the priests that were in Nob: and they came all of them to the king. 12. And Saul said, Hear now, thou son of Ahitub. And he answered, Here I am, my lord. 13. And Saul said unto him, Why have ye conspired against me, thou and the son of Jesse, in that thou hast given him bread, and a sword, and hast inquired of God for him, that he should rise against me, to lie in wait, as at this day? 14. Then Ahimelech answered the king, and said, And who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding, and is honourable in thine house? 15. Did I then begin to inquire of God for him? be it far from me. Let not the king impute any thing unto his servant, nor to all the house of my father: for thy servant knew nothing of all this, less or more. 16. And the king said, Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, thou and all thy father's house. 17. And the king said unto the footmen that stood about him, Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord; because their hand also is with David, and because they knew when he fled, and did not show it to me. But the servants of the king would not put forth their hand to fall upon the priests of the Lord. 18. And the king said to Doeg, Turn thou, and fall upon the priests. And Doeg the Edomite turned, and he fell upon the priests, and slew on that day fourscore and five persons that did wear a linen ephod. 19. And Nob, the city of the priests, smote he with the edge of the sword, both men and women, children and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword.

We have seen the progress of David's troubles; now here we have the progress of Saul's wickedness. He seems to have laid aside the thoughts of all other business, and to have devoted himself wholly to the pursuit of David. He heard, at length, by the common fame of the country, that David was discovered, that is, that he appeared publicly, and enlisted men in his service; and hereupon he called all his servants about him, and sat down under a tree, or grove, in the high place at Gibeath, with his spear in his hand for a sceptre; intimating the force by which he designed to rule, and the present temper of his spirit, or its distemper rather, which was to kill all that stood in his way.

In this bloody court of inquisition, I. Saul seeks for information against David and Jonathan, v. 7, 8. Two things he was willing to suspect, and desirous to see proved, that he might wreak his malice upon two of the best and most excellent men he had about him. (1.) That his servants David and Jonathan did lie in wait for him, and seek his life, which was utterly false. He really sought David's life, and therefore pretended that David sought his life, though he could not charge him with any overt act that gave the least umbrage or suspicion. (2.) That his son Jonathan stirred him up to do so, and was confederate with him in compassing and imagining the death of the king. This also was notoriously false. A league of friendship there was between Jonathan and Saul, but no conspiracy in any evil thing; none of the articles of their covenant carried any mischief to Saul. If Jonathan had agreed, after the death of Saul, to resign to David, in compliance with the revealed will of God, what harm would that do to Saul? Yet thus the best friends to their prince and country have often been odiously represented as enemies to him; even Christ himself, and so too had as it were Jonathan. He took it for granted that Jonathan and David were in a plot against him, his crown and dignity, and is displeased with his servants that they do not give him information of it, supposing that they could not but know it; whereas really there was no such thing. See the nature of a jealous malice, and its pitiful arts to extort discoveries of things that are not. He looks upon all about him as his enemies, because they do not just say as he says, and do those things (1.) That they were very unkindly disposed, and acted against the interest both of their tribe, (for they were Benjamites, and David, if he were advanced, would bring the honour into Judah which was now in Benjamin,) and of their families; for David would never be able to give them such rewards as he had for them, of fields and vineyards, and such preferment, to be colonels and captains. (2.) That there were no faithful: 'You have shamed me. What a continual agitation and torment are they in that way give rise to a spirit of jealousy! If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked' (Prov. 29, 12.) that is, they seem to be so in his eyes. (3.) That they were very unkind. He thought to work upon their good nature with that word. 'There is none of you that is so much as sorry for me, or solicitous for me, as some read it. By these expressions stirred up to act in this manner, as the instruments of his malice, that they might take away his suspicions of them.

II. Though he could not learn any thing from his servants against David or Jonathan, yet he got information from Doeg, against Ahimelech the priest. 1. An indictment is brought against Ahimelech by Doeg, and he himself is evidence against himself, v. 9, 10. He, however, would not have given this information, if Saul had not extorted it. For he had been very forward to it, he would have done it sooner: but now he thinks they must be deemed traitors, if none of them be accusers, and therefore tells Saul what kindness Ahimelech had shown to David, which he himself happened to be an eye-witness of. He had inquired of God for him, (which the priest used not to do but for public persons and about public affairs,) and he had furnished him with bread and a sword. All this was true: but it was not the whole truth; he ought to have told Saul further, that David had made Ahimelech believe he was then going upon the king's business; so that what service he did to David, he did on Saul's account; but Saul, and this would have proved Ahimelech, whom Saul had in his power, and would have thrown all the blame upon David, who was cut off of his reach.

2. Ahimelech is seized, or summoned rather to appear before the king, and upon this indictment he is arraigned. The king sent for him and all the priests, and most probably attended the sanctuary, whom he supposed to be aiming at and tormenting him, cut being conscious of any guilt, and therefore not apprehensive of any danger, came all of them to the king, (v. 11.) and none of them attempted to make an escape, or to flee to David for shelter, as they would have done, now that he had set up his standard, if they had been as much in his interest as Saul suspected they were. Saul arraigns him himself with the utmost disdain and indignation; (v. 12.) 'Hear now, thou soul of Abiathar, who seekest by his name, much less giving him his title of distinction. By this it appears that he had cast off the fear of God, that he showed no respect at all to his priests, but took a pleasure in affronting them and insulting over them. Ahimelech holds up his hand at the hand in these words, 'Here I am, my lord, ready to hear my charge, knowing I have done no wrong.' He does not demur to the jurisdiction of Saul's court, nor insist upon an exemption as a priest, no, not though he were a High Priest, to which office, that of the judge, or chief magistrate, had not long since been annexed; but Saul having now the sovereignty vested in him, in things pertaining to the king, even the High Priest lowers himself to a level with common Israelites. Let every soul be subject (even clergymen) to the higher powers.
